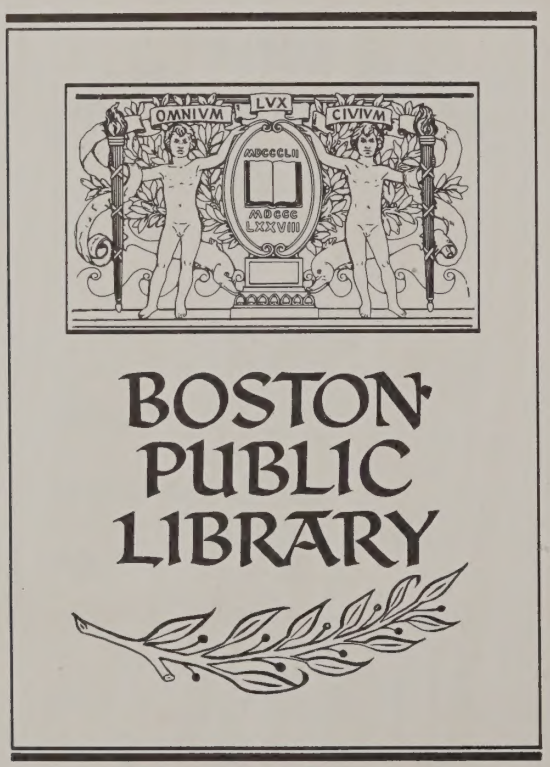
Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 650 9

PRESENTED TO

THE MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY,

BY E. F. BICKFORD.

Malden, Oct. 1st, 1885.



The Nation:

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOLUME X.

FROM JANUARY 1 TO JUNE 30, 1870.

NEW YORK:
E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS.
1870.

Periodical
AP2
.N2

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1870.

The Week.

THE golden promises made by Governor Hoffman about the future of this State under Democratic rule seem not likely to be realized—the Tammany Ring having got the upper hand in the organization of the Legislature, and being apparently likely to keep it. The opposition candidate for the Speakership, put up by the virtuous Democrats from the country districts, disappeared from the scene before the trial of strength without giving any reason, having, in the opinion of the by-standers, "sold out" to his competitor. Sweeny, Tweed & Co. are, therefore, now masters of the situation. Governor Hoffman is generally believed to mean well, being impelled to good courses, if by no higher motive, by hopes of the Presidential nomination. But Tammany is not concerned about his political fortunes; and as to the virtuous country Democrats, the Ring now enjoys means of muzzling them which are not to be withstood. It can offer a country lawyer or farmer who stands in its way the means of passing his declining years in a nearer approach to luxury than he has ever dared to hope for, and we believe that it is now a well-established law of political philosophy that no virtue will stand a strain of fifty per cent. in the way of temptation over and above its ordinary and legitimate rewards. There has been a rumor here that Mr. Tweed had got the contract for the completion of the Hoosac Tunnel, but we can discover no foundation for it beyond the fact that he is one of the bondsmen of the Montreal gentlemen who are now doing that great work for the State of Massachusetts. They declare, we believe, that they are going to do no lobbying in Boston this winter, which is good news. But what does Mr. Tweed say? He does not intend, we believe, to abolish the New York city commissions, but simply to purify them by putting good Democrats in them.

Mr. Boutwell's monthly statement shows a reduction of the debt of nearly $5,000,000 during the past month, making nearly $77,000,000 in all since March, 1869. He delivered a lecture in Boston the other day on the "Transition Period of the United States," which seems to have excited a good deal of expectation among the business men of that city, and they hoped he would make revelations of some kind about his financial policy or opinions, but he hardly touched on the finances at all, his attention being apparently occupied by slavery, and emancipation, and the war. He seemed to indicate, however, that he looked on the rapid payment of the debt as our first duty, and recommended patience under the taxation necessary for that purpose. If we may judge by the tone of the press, the opinion gains ground that coming generations ought to pay some of the debt, which has been incurred in large part for their benefit, and that the present one, which has borne the actual burden of the war, ought now to have its load of taxation lightened. Those who urge haste in paying off the debt are, or at least have been, in good part, actuated by the fear that lapse of time might diminish the national sense of obligation to pay it. But we think experience has shown that this sense has grown with the lapse of time, and that the more people have talked and thought about paying the debt, the firmer has become the popular determination to do it.

In the American necrology of 1869, the three most prominent names are those of Stanton, Fessenden, and Peabody. Besides these, there are a dozen others who once were famous, but who, when they died, made no gap which this generation observed. It is not many years since their names were in all men's mouths, but when they died no one greatly missed Amos Kendall, or John Bell, or Franklin Pierce, or Robert J. Walker, or General Wool, or Governor Pickens, or Mr. Toucey, or Admiral Stewart, or Admiral Gordon, or Mr. Baron Stow. Better than any of these, Mr. Raymond is remembered; and we think we are not mistaken in saying that, during the last ten years, not more than two or three Americans have died whose loss caused more regret than his. The spirit of candor and kindness—so in contrast with the ruling traits of many men in his position—in which he used the enormous power which he had in his hand, secured for him a respect, and, so to speak, an affection which it is well to keep in mind. Of Mr. Fessenden and Mr. Stanton we have heretofore spoken. The one seems to have been as peculiarly fortunate as the other was unfortunate in the time of his death. Mr. Stanton went just at the close of a stormy decade, in which he had had perfect opportunity for the exercise and exhibition of his peculiar powers, and just when, had he lived, he would have been entering on a period of our history and on the duties of an office for which he was rather ill fitted than well fitted. Of Mr. Fessenden, on the other hand, it might have been reasonably expected that, during the next few years of criticism and careful organization, he would have rendered us his best services. Neither man, however, died without being full of honors, if not of years. As for Mr. Peabody, his name goes among the household words of two great nations, and is as sure of immortality as Howard's.

So far as the opinion of the future can be guessed, we should say that of all the distinguished dead of this last year, Sainte-Beuve is the one whom other generations will think of as the most noteworthy. He was by nature and habit a critic—a man who surveyed things done, and the doers of them, and who was not himself a creator. It would be vain, then, to seek for any one performance of his, literary or other, which of itself would justify the respect that is paid him. Of him it is true, as it is true of all critics in their degree, that each part of him and his work was very much less than the whole. His intrinsic greatness consisted in his power of seeing and feeling the strength and weakness of other men; and his greatness in the eyes of others consisted in his power of stating with a precision almost unequalled, if not quite unequalled, the absolute and the relative values of the men who underwent his examination. Ability of this kind does not get its expression in any one work; its influence is exerted by means of a lifetime of writing and talk. And it is not upon everybody that such influences operate. Still less is such ability at once generally operative when it is exercised upon the great in literature, whose merits and demerits are to be weighed in balances of a nicety not only not understood by most, but by most not to be understood. But the great public of a truly admirable writer, especially if he is also a truly admirable artist in writing, is the contribution of generations, and he can afford to die and wait for his fame and chief usefulness.

Besides Sainte-Beuve—who was, in fact, half English in blood and nature—the other noted Frenchmen who died in 1869 were Lamartine, Marshal Troplong, and Marshal Niel. The last was a representative of the Irish blood which two centuries ago went into exile, and which in more than one country of continental Europe has reached high distinction. Marshal Niel was a thoroughgoing Imperialist as well as a thorough soldier, for he inherited without apparent diminution the Irish national capacity for attaching himself to a leader or a dynasty, and loved Napoleonic Cæsarism with a fervor not unlike that of Burke's passionate personal affection for what to anybody but an Irishman would seem a rather cold mistress—the British Constitution. Lamartine's death was a relief to all others as well as to himself. "Charlatan for charlatan," said Sainte-Beuve, speaking of him and Victor Hugo, "I prefer Lamartine." But Lamartine during his last years was a charlatan who had outlived most of those who believed in him, and who made it painfully manifest that he was as unable as unwilling to make a dignified or a decorous exit from the stage on which he had long lagged superfluous.

In England, the death of the Earl of Derby has made more noise than any similar event of the year; but except the grief of his personal friends and dependants, his death has not caused much sorrow. It is only that a brave, honorable, showy nobleman, of the old school, has gone. Aside from his latter-day usefulness, as a figure-head for his party, "the Rupert of Debate" was never, so far as concerns his public services, very much more than what Lord Lytton called him in the one line of the "New Timon" which still lives. A fellow-translator of Lord Derby's, Professor Conington, who rendered the Æneid into English in a way not previously equalled, is also among the dead of the year. There was a time when Professor Conington's success with Virgil would have given him a long lease of fame; but the age of translations of the classics has passed, and the new version of Virgil, or Horace, or Homer, must get its praise, not from the polite world in general, but from a few scholars, whose commendation is neither, for the writer, easy to get, nor of great value to the publisher or public when got. A greater loss than Mr. Conington's or Lord Derby's to the world of English literature is Mr. Alexander Dyce. He left behind him no Shakesperian scholar more painstaking, accurate, and honest, and, perhaps, none at once so learned and so acute.

The Ohio "reformers," elected, we believe, in the main from Hamilton County, appear to hold the balance of power in the Legislature, and have thus far thrown their weight into the Democratic scale, and the public is waiting with some anxiety to see what they will do about the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment. If they should follow the Democratic lead in this also, it will only show how necessary good sense is to prevent "reformers" from becoming a delusion and a snare. There is probably at this moment nothing which does more to distract public attention from municipal reforms of all kinds than the state of suspense in which the country is kept about this amendment. It is its non-adoption which still keeps reconstruction unfinished, and makes it possible for the Irreconcilables in Congress to play the pranks about Georgia and Virginia which are causing the judicious so much grief. The amendment passed, and the moral results of the war thus taken out of the arena of party politics, we should have time and attention for local abuses.

The land-owners of the southwestern corner of South Carolina have just furnished some curious evidence of the struggle that is now going on between the new ideas that new circumstances are forcing upon the Southern mind and the ingrained prejudices of a lifetime. Robertville, situated some fifty miles from Port Royal Island and the town of Beaufort, is a part of the sea-coast region which in old times was famous for its value as a country adapted for the production of long-staple cotton and the best American rice. Plantations there were large in extent, were inhabited by few whites and many negroes, were cultivated at an expense which made it necessary that the cultivator should be a capitalist, and, withal, were unhealthy, or were so considered. The pine barrens being within easy reach as places of residence during the heats of summer, the plantations—the cotton plantations, at least—were not so badly off in regard to climate as was maintained by people who willingly looked for an excuse to spend a part of the year in pleasure excursions, and who also were interested in making it believed that no man but a black man can endure existence in places where good crops of cotton can be raised. The reasons above-mentioned have, however, been sufficient, coupled with the various strong inducements to the foreigner to seek a home in the Western and Border States, to prevent any set of the stream of immigration towards tide-water South Carolina, and the land-owners of Robertville, poor, oppressed by taxes, destitute of money to buy labor, hating the system of free labor, have decided to offer farms without money and without price to all European immigrants who will consent to take up abodes among them. They say truly that should they by giving away half their present possessions double the present population—the new-comers being industrious farmers—they would in the end be greatly the gainers.

But this they cannot bring themselves frankly to do. Some of the conditions which they impose upon possible immigrants are of the most foolish and impracticable kind. First, they demand that the man who accepts a farm shall agree to occupy it five years, to improve it, and that at the end of the five years he shall sell it, if he sell at all, to other new-comers. Secondly, the donee, if without means of his own, must work for the donor, at the ordinary local rate of wages, during the first six months of possession, or else two days in the week during all of the first year. This would set the immigrant at work for another during the time when there would be most need that he should work for himself. Besides, the provision seems to contemplate the entrance of a class of people who would make an accession of no great value to any industrial community. In the third place, the Robertville men will require of their beneficiary a pledge that he will "have no dealings or intercourse with any of the African race." This, be it remembered, in a country where the blacks are the great majority of the population; where nearly if not quite every laborer is colored; where black men vote, practise medicine, act as postmasters, and hold other offices—where, in short, black men manage a very large part of the social machinery. Finally comes a more emphatic and specific pledge, with the same unattainable end in view: the immigrant must promise that never, "so long as the ignorant negro sits upon the jury," will he resort to law for the settlement of any dispute, but that always he will place his dependence upon arbitrators. In a State where the negro is always the law-maker, and not seldom a criminal, these arbitrators will have what is usually called "a good time" in enforcing their decisions. But, on the whole, the scheme reported by the Robertville committee gives proof of progress. Twelve or fourteen square miles of land, part arable and part wood-land, are already offered for acceptance, and the planters will welcome Chinese laborers, whom they boldly praise as being far better than the negro in his best estate ever thought of being.

Mrs. Stowe's new volume has reached us so short a time before going to press that we are unable to offer any deliberate judgment on its merits until next week. But we may say that it does not contain any authorization, formal or implied, for Mrs. Stowe's action in the matter; that the only additional proof of the charges offered is more extended and explicit reports of the conversation in which Lady Byron revealed the secret; and that this conversation will help to confirm the impression of many people that she was not sound in her mind on this subject in her later years. In fact, the whole story nowhere rises, as Mrs. Stowe half admits, above the character of a "drawing-room scandal," and will not bear anywhere the application of a legal test. A very disgusting addition has been made to the literature of the subject during the week by Dr. Charles Mackay, in a sensational biography of the "child of sin," Medora Leigh. We sincerely hope if anybody else has any dirty particulars about the Byron family or its branches in his possession, he will keep them to himself.

There was a report circulated widely, and with a good deal of confidence in the early part of the week, that the Cuban insurgents had, acting under the advice of the Junta, laid down their arms and abandoned their enterprise in despair, caused by the attitude of the American Government and the release of the Spanish gunboats. This has drawn forth a letter from the President of the Central Republican Junta, pronouncing the story an "absurd and malicious forgery," and declaring that the revolutionists "are every day more and more confident of success, with or without the support of foreign nations." The Junta themselves have also issued an address to the American people, in which they say substantially the same thing, and add that the Cuban army now consists of 40,000 men, and give a list of the superior officers, which is imposing. The civil government, they say also, consists of a Congress, or Chamber of Representatives, "composed of delegates from every part of the island held by the insurgents" (the italics are ours), which has been sitting ever since the 10th of April. This body has "enacted a constitution," which "abolishes slavery, dignities, and social honors," and "guarantees every inalienable right." The distinction of sex, we regret to see, it leaves standing—thus sowing the seeds of much future trouble. The address furnishes some specimens of the laws which the Congress has passed—the first of which authorizes the issue of $2,000,000 in "legal tenders," which the Republic promises "to redeem in specie as soon as circumstances will permit;" another calls the whole male population, between the ages of eighteen and fifty, to arms; and others organize the judicial and administrative systems. The judicial system seems to be very simple, and, according to the address, works as well as can be expected in the midst of such commotion, and with rigid impartiality—in illustration of which the Junta mention, apparently as an act of extraordinary virtue, a case in which a court condemned a Cuban to death for murdering a Spaniard. Finally, the Junta defend the incendiary tactics of the insurgents, and hurl defiance at the Spaniards, and predict their speedy overthrow.

The Cuban news from other sources is very varied in character; but the general drift of it is that the insurgents are still in the field, and more or less hopeful, though the circle in which they act seems to be contracting every week under the pressure of increased Spanish forces, and if a combined movement which was on foot towards the close of the last month was successful, those insurgents who escaped would be compelled to take refuge in the mountains at the eastern end of the island, where their very existence would be difficult, except as isolated marauders. It is not impossible that it is the progress of this movement which has given rise to the late stories of a surrender, and although the Junta contradicts them very positively, it acknowledges it has no news later than December 7. The Spanish gunboats have not sailed from this port at the present writing, but a Cuban yacht, the Anna, has, having on board that redoubtable chief, Colonel Ryan, whose departure leaves his bondsmen, who undertook to produce him before the United States District Court, in tears. In the meantime, the severity with which the Spanish authorities repress seditious talk even in Havana either indicates that they are ferociously cruel, or by no means sure of their game. One supposition is about as probable as the other.

The Chinese question grows in interest, as will be seen by the letter of a correspondent in another column; but the attempt made by the friends of the Burlingame mission to ascribe the hostility of the Emperor and American residents to the brutal indifference of these gentlemen to Chinese rights, is infusing a good deal of bitterness into the controversy. The Pall Mall Gazette has been abusing the American merchants with some vigor, and Mr. Jas. L. Kiernan, the late United States Consul in Chin-Kiang, has appeared on the scene, in a letter discussing the Chinese question, as that of a person "who had had much experience among the Chinese, and travelled the empire extensively," and containing statements strongly denunciatory of the British residents. Whereupon, the leading American houses join in a card against him, which appears in the Shanghae Newsletter. They say Mr. Kiernan only spent nine months in the country, part of the time in a steamboat, and part at Chin-Kiang, at his post, where the foreign population numbers in all seven souls—and with the natives his want of practice in speaking Chinese must, of course, have restricted his intercourse—and the rest at Shanghae. Of the foreign residents anywhere he saw very little, they say, and he knew none of the English, and never "travelled the empire;" and the writers close with a cutting allusion to a little balance of $1,300, which they say they had to advance to enable him to withdraw from the Central Flowery Land, and which he had, up to date of the card, in an unaccountable manner abstained from remitting. We are pleased to see, however, that Mr. Kiernan is confident "that the Chinese will accept Christianity when it becomes Christianity to them."

M. Ollivier has at last succeeded in forming his ministry, which has at least the merit of containing no decidedly objectionable person. It is one of the signs of the times that M. Pietri, the Prefect of Police in Paris, has resigned, and there is talk of Baron Haussmann following his example. With his disappearance, the Imperial régime, as established in 1851, might be said to have passed away. The Emperor, in reply to the address of the Corps Législatif, treats the change as a voluntary sharing on his part, for the purpose of lightening his burdens, of the authority committed to him by the people. The change, however, is the important thing, and he will find few Frenchmen disposed to quarrel with him about the name or origin of it. The enquiry into some of the election returns, and particularly that of M. Clément Duvernois, a favorite of the Emperor's, has revealed an unprecedented amount of indirect wholesale corruption on the part of the Government; and as the whole Chamber votes on each case, each enquiry takes the form of a great party struggle. M. Duvernois got in by a very small majority.

The news of the Œcumenical Council is of all kinds, and very interesting. The best that comes direct to this country is perhaps to be found in Mr. Ripley's letters in the Tribune—his presence in Rome being a stroke of good fortune for the foreign correspondence of the paper for which it cannot be too thankful. It would seem that the first plan of having the doctrine of Papal Infallibility adopted by acclamation, as it were on a sudden impulse received from the Holy Ghost, having failed, the fate of the dogma, or rather "pious opinion"—for that is all it is as yet—still remains doubtful. The Spanish, Italian, and American bishops are reported to be firm for it, but the recalcitrancy of the French, led by the Bishop of Orleans, and the doubt that hangs over the Germans, owing to Janus and the Fulda Manifesto, inasmuch as they seem to make discussion inevitable, seem to have greatly troubled the Jesuit counsels. The doctrine is one of those which might be carried with three cheers, or under the "previous question," but it will not bear debate. There are no arguments tending to show that a mortal man, with a liver and brain, needing sleep, and liable to have his digestion disordered by certain articles of food, never can be mistaken on any subject on which he chooses to pronounce a formal opinion, which can in our day be gravely uttered before a large assemblage, especially in Latin. If the infallibility doctrine fails to be accepted, it is doubtful whether the Syllabus can meet with any better success. The Pope has issued a decree providing for the dissolution of the Council in case of his decease, and the election of his successor by the College of Cardinals. In this he follows precedents, but the question suggests itself to many minds, why a body which is competent to create dogmas, or, in other words, reveal to the world the true mind of God on the most mysterious subjects, is not competent to elect the Vicegerent of God; or what reason, beyond the desire of the Italians to keep the papacy in their own hands, which they have always virtually done, there can be for having the election even during the sitting of an universal council confined to the cardinals. All writers, however, agree in representing the Council as a wonderful display of Papal power—more wonderful, owing to the diversity of its elements, than any which has ever taken place. Even those who doubt the assertions of the Roman papers that recent heavy rains were marks of Divine favor, intended expressly for the occasion, must admit this. Janus has been placed on the Index, which is the best way of meeting it.

In speaking last week of the Duke of Genoa, we, by a slip of the pen, alluded to the Marquis of Rapallo as his "morganatic father"—step-father we meant to say, and should have said. The Marquis married the Duchess only, if we remember rightly, six years ago. The news comes now that Victor Emanuel positively refuses to permit the Duke to become a candidate for the Spanish throne, probably owing to the failure of the Provisional Government to procure for him the requisite number of votes in the Cortes—two-thirds, we believe, being called for by the King. Prim had, however, almost staked his political fortunes on getting him elected, while Admiral Topete and Marshal Serrano were said to favor the Duc de Montpensier, to whom, as a Bourbon, Prim is violently opposed, and probably has on this point the country at his back. His failure with the Duke of Genoa, however, has doubtless made longer agreement between him and his colleagues impossible, and the latest story from Madrid announces the resignation of the Cabinet. Montpensier is now said to be about to appear prominently on the scene, and we shall probably have some weeks, if not months, of intriguing over him. The Spaniards have only one consolation in all this, and that is, that the Government is strong enough to prevent anarchy; but it is a melancholy consolation after all, for the strength comes from the discipline and fidelity of the army rather than from popular support. The finances are very near that stage in which relief comes from the impossibility of being any worse. The foreign creditors are the only ones who will receive payment for their next coupons, which shows that some of the old Castilian pride survives; and we commend the spectacle to the attention of some of our repudiators, who, in all their schemes of cheating, usually propose to begin with the foreigners.

MR. WELLS HIMSELF.

The low opinion of American honesty entertained in various countries of Europe often excites the indignation and surprise of American travellers, and many of them, knowing how unjust it is, ascribe it to rancorous hostility to our institutions. But, then, those who are most familiar with the way in which opinions are formed in foreign countries are aware that most of whatever disrepute the national character rests under with regard to all that class of virtues included under the term bona fides, is the handiwork of a portion of the American press. The bitterest reviler of America and Americans has never ventured on such foul charges and foul insinuations as some of our contemporaries hurl nearly every day against men who are put forward by American society as about as good specimens of the American man as it is capable of producing. We were told, the other day, by an American of distinction—and his experience has been that of hundreds—of the bitterness of the mortification which he endured when in Germany during the impeachment trial, at finding himself an object of daily condolence on the part of his German friends touching the corruption of Senators Trumbull, and Fessenden, and Grimes, three of the foremost statesmen of the party of virtue. And then, there was no use in his denying it or trying to explain it. It was not in a Southern paper they saw the story, nor yet in the foul-mouthed organs of Northern Copperheadism, who make vilification one of their ordinary weapons of party warfare; but in the New York Tribune, the mouth-piece of the best element in the Northern population, and which had up to the time of impeachment been holding these very men up to the admiration of mankind.

We bid fair, too, in Mr. Wells's case, to furnish Europe with another reason for believing in our utter rottenness. Mr. Wells has had everything done for him that American society can do. He has been well born, well bred, and furnished with the best education the country affords. He has lived with the best men of his day, and has won and enjoys their esteem. He has displayed very remarkable powers of analysis and induction in a field of social science which until now can hardly be said to have been explored in this country, and has for this reason been selected by the Government to perform the very important duty of supplying the data for legislation on matters of finance and taxation during a period of great public difficulty and, indeed, peril. If ever man has given the State guarantees for his good behavior, it is he. And yet, what do foreigners learn about him from the organ of the sober, virtuous, religious, reading, writing, and thinking Northern public? Why, that the minute he secured an official position, and, through it, influence on public opinion, he sold his services to a foreign government and to foreign traders, and, in consideration of a certain sum in "foreign gold," agreed to suppress material facts, manipulate figures, and construct deluding arguments for their benefit, and for the deception and impoverishment of his own countrymen.

Of course, everybody here knows how false these insinuations are; but then, unfortunately, their silliness and absurdity prevent people feeling the downright wickedness of them, and visiting the men who invent and propagate them with the indignation they deserve. These slanders do, however, in one way, recoil on the heads of their authors, inasmuch as they excite, first, distrust, and then hostility towards the cause they are intended to help. There is no cause which will bear being lied for. Even the Christian religion, strong as are its claims on the respect of mankind, has suffered, and still suffers terribly, from attempts to spread it by falsehood, and slander, and misrepresentation of opponents; and what it cannot bear we may be sure protection cannot. One marked result of the attacks on Mr. Wells has been the steady growth of his authority, and the steady increase of confidence in the statements and conclusions of his reports. Nothing, it is safe to say, has ever appeared on this class of subjects which has produced such a profound impression on public opinion. His conclusions, it is true, have borne hard on the whole theory and practice of protection; but there was only one way of upsetting them or destroying them, and that was, showing either that his facts were not facts or that the reasoning based on them was incorrect. This has not been done; and for this, naked assertions that Mr. Wells has been bribed, and that he has been guilty of suppression and distortion, are not proper and sufficient substitutes.

There is talk just now among some of the more rabid high-tariff men about not only suppressing his report as far as Congress is concerned, but "kicking him out" of the Republican party; but then, we presume, wiser counsels will prevail. The suppression of the report by the House would, of course, only increase the number of its readers, and Mr. Wells would be followed out of the Republican party by such large numbers of the present members that we doubt whether enough would be left to carry on the business of the concern afterwards with any degree of success. There is a class of men in the party who have always been a little anxious to get rid of its brains, finding the thinking faculty a nuisance, and, almost as soon as a man gives evidence of reaching his conclusions with his head, get up a movement for his expulsion. Mr. Trumbull and the late Mr. Fessenden had a narrow escape, but they did escape; and their example has had a very encouraging effect. If the protective system will not bear discussion—and from the dislike of the high-tariff men to permit the circulation of Mr. Wells's report, and the refusal of the Tribune to print it, it apparently will not—it certainly cannot stand, and there is not the slightest use, as we have more than once said, in claiming a quasi-sacred character for it, as some of its friends seem disposed to do, and treating people who question its value as bad men, to whom plunder or treason would not be particularly disagreeable. It is a theory of taxation like another, of human origin, and that not a particularly respectable one. Large numbers of some of the best, and, on all other things, at least, wisest men in the modern world condemn it, and think it a stumbling-block in the way of human progress, and some of the foremost States are gradually abandoning it. Protectionists must, therefore, be reasonable and patient, take off their sacerdotal robes and lay aside their cursing instruments, and come down into the arena among the rest of us, and give and take in the common secular game of political fisticuffs. Fair play is all they are entitled to, and that they shall certainly have. The young men, it is true, are mostly on the other side, but for this there is no help.

HIS REPORT.

In the composition of this incendiary pamphlet, Mr. Wells starts with the astounding but hardly questionable assertion, that the cost of the war was nine thousand millions of dollars; and this of itself is, it must be admitted, a good deal to recover from. To meet it, however, we have had, since the outbreak of the war, an immigration amounting to 1,664,363. Since the termination of the war, too, thirteen thousand miles have been added to the railroads of the country, opening up an area of virgin soil larger than the whole of France, while the telegraph lines have received an increase of eighteen thousand miles of wires. Moreover, the South may be fairly said to have recovered. The cotton crop has again reached its old standard in quantity, and is superior in quality. The same thing may be said of the other crops peculiar to the South, while the high prices have furnished it once more with capital, of which the close of the war found it totally bereft.

Mr. Wells estimates the total number of persons now engaged in adding directly to the wealth of the country by their labor as 10,000,000, out of a population of 39,000,000, and the total annual product of their labor at $6,825,000,000, or $682 50 each. Of this total product, about one-half is to be attributed to agriculture. The cotton manufacture only counts for $71,500,000; the woollen manufacture, for $66,000,000; the iron manufacture, $119,950,000; the leather manufacture, $222,600,000; and the railway service, $360,000,000. It will thus be seen that the iron industry, which makes most of the disturbance over the tariff, is only fourth in the order of importance, and ranks far below the leather industry, which has been seriously injured for its benefit. Of course, the country is growing in every way, but Mr. Wells holds that it is not growing as it ought to grow, and as it would grow in the absence of a vicious system of currency and taxation. He says, when we leave the region of general estimates and descend into others in which we have exact figures, the prospect is not pleasing. The deposits in savings banks have not increased in proportion to the increase in population, and there is every reason to believe that the depositors no longer belong exclusively to the working classes.

Moreover, the increase in the number of houses has not kept pace with the increase of population, which means not only that fewer families have homes of their own, but that a greater number of persons are crowded under one roof. In short, though wealth increases, it is not increasing in anything like the old ratio, and it is not distributed with anything like the old equality. The direct effect of the bad currency and bad system of taxation is to put a premium on the talents of the broker and speculator, while lessening the rewards of the producer; so that, while the great capitalists and exchangers find things very pleasant, the workingman finds things very unpleasant. In other words, the more complicated your system of taxation is, and the more variable in value your currency is, the more call there is for shrewdness and smartness in the transaction of business, and the less chance is there for simple industry and energy. The banking, brokerage, insurance, and commission businesses thrive. They draw into them all that large and able class of the community who are skilful in dealing with uncertainty, while the dull plodders, on whom the country is after all mainly dependent for solid additions to its wealth, go to the wall. To this state of our currency and taxation Mr. Wells ascribes, too, the listlessness, the dislike of labor, and the determination to do as little as possible, which are now reported as prevailing in nearly all branches of industry; but this theory is shaken by the fact that the same phenomena show themselves in nearly every civilized country. They are, in our opinion, mainly the result of growing social ambition, and a growing feeling of equality on the part of the working classes; and the discontent of these classes is stimulated by the sight of the immense rewards which the capitalist classes have reaped from the application of steam and electricity to industry and commerce within the last thirty years, and in which thus far the working classes can hardly be said to have shared. But the disadvantages of the workingman's condition, all things considered, are perhaps greater here now than elsewhere, and would be greater still if it were not for the resource offered by the abundance of fertile land.

Another cause which Mr. Wells looks upon as seriously impairing the rapidity of national accumulation is the condition of the foreign trade of the country, though, as he states the case, the condition of the foreign trade appears rather as evidence that we are not accumulating rapidly than as an agency preventing rapid accumulation. He thinks that there are now about $1,400,000,000 of American securities of all kinds held abroad, drawing annual interest to the amount of about $80,000,000, and this indebtedness to foreigners goes on increasing, owing to the now regular annual adverse balance against us in our dealings with Europe. Last year this balance amounted to about $210,000,000, and this is, Mr. Wells calculates, the average sum which now stands against us every year, and is settled by the transmission of bonds and other promises to pay. Now, the conclusion Mr. Wells draws from this is, that, if we had either the gold or the goods to pay with, we should pay with them, as we did in old times; but, not having them, we pay in bonds. "Of course, we have not the gold"—some one will say—"but why have we not the goods?" For the simple reason, that the cost of production in this country now, owing to our system of taxation and the condition of our currency, is so great that we cannot afford to furnish goods at prices which foreigners will pay for them. We make hardly anything now which cannot be found cheaper or better made elsewhere. In other words, the process of protection, as now carried on, is very like, in its effects on the national industry, the process of training to go without food to which the man subjected his horse by cutting down his allowance every day, and which was giving every promise of success, when the horse unfortunately died.

Under this state of things, not only have we ceased to export our products to foreign countries, but we have almost entirely lost the carrying trade, which was once the pride and glory of the country. The American ship-owner cannot compete with foreigners, any more than the American manufacturer, so that Mr. Wells calculates that the loss to the country from this source alone is equal to $24,000,000 per annum. In 1859, American ships did two-thirds of our total foreign trade; in 1869, they do one-third. Losses by the Alabama will not account for this. The painful truth is, that we cannot build a new ship and sail her at a profit, in competition with Europeans; and new ships would have been needed, even if Semmes had never sailed the sea. Mr. Wells has collected a great deal of evidence, also, as to what he calls "the diversion and demoralization of industry"—that is, the propulsion of capital and labor into unprofitable channels, and the decline of zeal and diligence on the part of workmen. Moreover, he confirms the statements made by the Nation two years ago, and which excited so much hilarity at the time amongst some of our contemporaries, as to the decrease in live stock, and its value as an indication of a change in the relations which production formerly sustained to consumption and population. In the State of Ohio, for instance, for the agricultural statistics of which greater accuracy is claimed than for those of any other State, the official report for 1869 shows that, as compared with 1868, the number of sheep has decreased nearly a million and a half, the hogs nearly four hundred thousand, the cattle over twenty thousand. Indeed, the Department of Agriculture estimates the decline in the number of sheep all over the country at twenty-five per cent. But we must reserve for another article Mr. Wells's account of the bearing of the existing financial situation on the farming population; that is, be it remembered, fifty per cent. of the population of the United States.

THE SENATE AND THE EXECUTIVE.

WASHINGTON, January 1.

HERE is a pungent morsel for the public to chew upon! Congress has been two weeks in session. After the stormy rule of Andrew Johnson, the executive and the legislature were supposed to have been made as harmonious as a popular vote could make them. The new President's anxiety to keep the peace was notorious, and has weighed heavily in his course of administration. He has already yielded much —too much—to the legislature, and he seems likely to go on until there is nothing left for him to yield. And yet, when, after a session of two little weeks, Congress adjourns for the holidays, a quarrel has already broken out, in which the Senate is supposed to have shown a worse temper than ever before, and given itself up to a more scandalous and utterly unpardonable attack on the executive.

Whose is the blame? Whatever passes in executive session is secret; but the press knows, or thinks it knows, everything, and among the things which the press thinks it knows, and which its agents are willing to impart to such persons as seek information in a proper spirit, is the following story: The offences of the Attorney-General have long been a matter of notoriety. Ever since he came to Washington, in the month of March, he has made it his business to override the strongest political combinations wherever they stood in his way. His appointments to office have frequently been made in the teeth of senators, members, and local remonstrances, as in the case of Barlow, and of Harlow, in New York. He has expressed, in language more simple than civil, his opinion of political jobs to senators and others who came to him with political jobs in their hands. Although a radical among radicals, and a man for whom all Massachusetts would go bail to an unlimited extent, he has done his utmost to raise the Administration above the dirt of local politics. He is accused of having acquired a commanding influence over the President and his Cabinet. After months of growing jealousy, and after infinite bitterness of spirit, caused by comparatively small matters, the Attorney-General capped the climax of his offences by sending to the Senate a list of nine Circuit Judges, among whose names were several which did not please senators; especially that of Judge Woodruff, which occupied a place supposed to have been intended by certain senators for Judge Hale. The peculiar and intolerable sting of this nomination is by most persons thought to rest in the fact that the late Attorney-General is believed to have feathered the arrow which wounded, and it is well known that, owing probably to the shocking baseness of his moral character, there are few men in America of whom senators stand in greater terror than they do of the late Attorney-General Evarts. The nominations of these nine Circuit Judges were duly referred to the Judiciary Committee, whither that of Judge Hoar himself, as Associate Justice, soon followed them in ominous silence.

The first demonstration came from the committee, and was obviously directed against the Attorney-General. It came in the shape of a request to the President to furnish all papers in his possession which in any way concerned the candidates for circuit judgeships, and it implied that the Judiciary Committee expected to find reason in these papers for attributing mistakes in judgment, if not worse, to the President or his chief legal adviser. It is further said that the President rather energetically declined acceding to this request until it had been so much modified as to include only the papers which concerned the nine actual nominees, and even to this the President is thought to have acceded, rather from a wish to smooth the path of Judge Hoar's confirmation than from any satisfaction with the Senate's behavior. In order still further to restore good feeling and to conciliate opposition, the President committed an act of very doubtful propriety, and set a dangerous precedent by nominating Mr. Stanton to the Supreme bench long before any actual vacancy existed, the immediate result of which was only the curious spectacle of a judge dead and buried in state, while his predecessor still sits on the bench and goes to the funeral. The Senate, however, was not to be conciliated, and, instead of receiving with equal good-will the President's advances, it seized the occasion to confirm Mr. Stanton with a display of energy which was no doubt intended to be, what it certainly was, an additional insult to the Attorney-General.

The Judiciary Committee then reported unfavorably on Judge Hoar. This committee consists of seven senators, and it is understood that only one of its members—Mr. Trumbull—supported the Attorney-General. Of the rest, Mr. Thurman is a Democrat, and his vote was natural. Mr. Rice is a carpet-bag senator from Arkansas, and his vote was also natural, since no one expects high political morality from carpet-bag senators. Messrs. Carpenter and Stewart, being from the far West, also enjoy a certain freedom from the restraints of elevated motives. Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, is a professional obstructionist, and may, in five cases out of six, be depended upon to oppose any measure, good or bad, wise or foolish. His vote, therefore, was quite in character. But what shall be said of Mr. Conkling? Surely, his course requires some better explanation than any which has yet been offered. In the angry debate which followed, there was no reason urged for rejecting the nomination which could possibly justify Mr. Conkling's vote, far less his attitude as leader of this cabal against the Attorney-General. The temper of the debate is said to have shown, beyond a doubt, what was the true motive of opposition in the Senate; and, at the bottom, it was pure spite, bursting into a flagrant rebellion of all the factious or corrupt elements of that body against the authority of its more respectable members. The dregs of the Senate Chamber, combining with the Democrats, and all led by Mr. Conkling, proved too powerful for resistance, and, now that this combination has learned its strength, the President may expect to hear from it with regularity hereafter.

In the whole proceeding, the Democrats alone can be justified or excused. To them Judge Hoar is the principal representative of a system they believe to be unconstitutional and outrageous. They have a right to argue that an Attorney-General who has, in 1869, decided that the continued existence of war in the Southern States involves in law the establishment of a military government, with powers of life and death, in that region, is not a suitable person to become the dispenser of justice to Southerners; and, if this is not reason enough for their opposition, they can add that, from their point of view, an Attorney-General, the first officer of the Supreme Court, who uses all his official influence (supposing the fact to be true, as is asserted) to obtain the passage of a bill like that now pressed by Senator Trumbull, by which the Supreme Court is reduced to the level of a sort of Congressional commission, is unfit to sit upon that bench. The fact is that Judge Hoar has gone a long way in helping to tear from the States and from the judiciary the last few rags which were left to cover their nakedness, and he has done as much as any one to break down all hindrances to the exercise of unlimited power by the Legislature. Democrats can afford to look on and laugh at seeing him worried and bitten by the overgrown beast he has done so much to fatten. If Mr. Conkling and Mr. Edmunds take the same ground with the Democrats, there is room for a very pretty argument in this direction; but consistency is sometimes safer than logic, and, sooner than go back on the Senate in this way, they had better avow, a dozen times over, that their sole motive for opposing Judge Hoar is that he did not appoint Mr. Hale to a circuit judgeship.

The gravest difficulty, however, still remains. No doubt it is annoying enough for Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Sumner, and such old leaders of the Senate, to find their authority suddenly upset, and the relations which they feel it so necessary for Congress to maintain with the President all at once made hostile, by a mutiny of that part of their crew to which it is for many reasons very desirable that attention should not be too closely drawn. Badly as these Senators stand, however, the position of the President is worse. It is clear that the senatorial cabal strikes not so much at the possible judge as at the actual Attorney-General. Its idea is, whether avowed or not, to drive Judge Hoar from the Cabinet as well as to block his path to the bench. Here rises at once the question of ministerial responsibility to the Senate in its most dangerous form. If the President compels Judge Hoar to remain in the Cabinet, he practically slaps the Senate in the face, and accepts the war it has declared. If he permits Judge Hoar to retire, he sets perhaps the most dangerous precedent which it is in his power to establish; a precedent which is of itself a revolution in the American form of government. The thing is, sooner or later, not unlikely to happen; but, if it should turn out that General Grant's course in the present case is to become the model for a new system by which future Presidents will be bound to allow other miserable senatorial factions to tear their ablest and best advisers from their sides, it will appear that, for a fortnight's work, the results of the session have thus far proved very creditable to the industry of Congress. The Georgia Bill has effectually put an end to all the rights formerly reserved to the States, and vested them in Congress. The Supreme Court Bill is about to vest the supreme judicial power in Congress, which it makes the final judge of the extent of its own judicial powers. Lastly, the Senate is bent upon making the seats in the President's Cabinet dependent on its own pleasure. When all this has been thoroughly brought about, and Congress has fairly assumed every branch of administration and every power known to government, nothing will remain for the public to ask except that the Senate may then be itself permanently controlled by statesmen like those who have shown such high qualities in their treatment of Judge Hoar.

THE DRAMA IN COLLEGES.

A COLLEGE (Harvard) man, reading Hamlet's question to Polonius and the reply, "My lord, you played once in the University, you say?" "That I did, my lord; and was accounted a good actor. I did enact Julius Cæsar. I was killed i' the capitol,"—is very likely to think that the old courtier must have alluded to the practices of some secret society (belonged to some Hasty-Pudding Club) of those days. The appearance of the old comedy of Ralph Roister Doister recently, in Mr. Edward Arber's series of "English Reprints," gives us a good occasion for glancing at the history of the drama in its connection with colleges and schools. Some time not long before 1550, Nicholas Udall, an eminent scholar of the time, then Head-master of Eton, wrote Ralph Roister Doister for his pupils to perform at Christmas, little thinking of the interest that was to attach to it as the first properly constituted English comedy. It is bright and witty, though surpassed by some other productions nearly contemporaneous. The Four P's, for instance, an interlude of Heywood, the jester of Henry VIII., has more humor and a higher aim, being in many parts a bold satire directed against the follies of the time. Ralph Roister Doister is much superior in refinement to Gammer Gurton's Needle, also a school, or rather college play, it having been performed at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1552; but it contains no one thing so good as the drinking song, said to be the first in the language, of which the following is the chorus, as given by Hazlitt:

"Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold;
But belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old."

The most ingenious thing in Udall's comedy is the letter of Ralph to the heroine, which is twice given, and which, without the change of a single word, is made to appear at the first reading insulting, and at the second reading an ardent love-letter, simply by altering the punctuation. In 1553 this letter was cited in an "Arte of Logike," to illustrate the "Ambiguitie," with the following note: "An example of soche doubtful writing, whiche by reason of poincting maie have double sense, and contrarie meaning." Perhaps it would be impossible, even now, to find a better illustration of the power of mere punctuation. Here, in parallel columns, are a few lines from the two forms of the letter:

"Sweete mistresse whereas I loue you nothing at all,
Regarding your substance and richesse chiefe of all,
For your personage, beautie, demeanour and wit,
I commende me vnto you neuer a whit.
Sorie to heare report of your good welfare.
For (as I heare say) suche your conditions are,
That ye be worthie fauour of no liuing man,
To be abhorred. . . . .
. . . . . .
Doe and say what ye lust, ye shall neuer please me,
But when ye are mery, I will be all sadde,
When ye are sory, I will be very gladde,
When ye seeke your heartes ease, I will be vnkinde.
At no tyme, in me shall ye muche gentlenesse finde."

"Sweete mistresse, whereas I loue you, nothing at all
Regarding your richesse and substance: chiefe of all
For your personage, beautie, demeanour and witte
I commende me vnto you: Never a whitte
Sory to heare reporte of your good welfare.
For (as I heare say) suche your conditions are,
That ye be worthie fauour: Of no liuing man
To be abhorred: . . . . .
. . . . . .
Doe and say what ye lust: ye shall neuer please me
But when ye are merrie: I will be all sadde
When ye are sorie: I wyll be very gladde
When ye seeke your heartes ease: I will be vnkinde
At no time: in me shall ye muche gentlenesse finde."

It is quite likely Udall meant to show his pupils, by means of this letter, the importance of attention to pointing. Is it not a little curious that punctuation seems to have been carefully attended to long before spelling? Many a person now is not ashamed to punctuate badly, who would be much mortified to be caught in bad orthography. Among our old writers, however, Chaucer, whom we remember our famous countryman, Mr. Artemus Ward, with some justice condemned as the "wuss speller he ever knew," was particular to write that one———"that pointeth ill,

A good sentence may oft spill."

In the sixteenth century, the spelling was worse than in previous times; the reason for which is given at length by Marsh. In Ralph Roister Doister the irregularities in spelling are very great, while the pointing does not differ much from modern standards. We have noticed the same thing in other works of that day; for instance, the "Toxophilus" of Roger Ascham, and Latimer's Sermons. Old Tusser, author of the "Five hundreth pointes of good husbandrie," a pupil of Udall in his youth, records that he received from him fifty-three stripes for "faut but small, or none at all;" and hence it has been inferred that Udall was a severe master. Whoever reads Ralph Roister Doister, however, will find it hard to believe that the teacher was not, on the whole, a genial fellow and on good terms with the boys. For a teacher or college professor to write a play for his scholars, or, indeed, to aid and abet them in any way in a dramatic performance of this kind, would be a strange thing now. There is no small amount of play-acting, to be sure, at several of our colleges. Among the writer's most vivid college reminiscences is that of personating, in laced bodice and elaborate train, the Queen in a Burlesque. We had not then lost our boyish treble, nor had the beard sprouted. We believe the best point we made was the manifestation of jealousy toward a classmate who is now one of the most eminent clergymen of the Episcopal Church, who, on that night, with his towering figure wrapped in skirts, and a plume on his head that swept the ceiling, personated the giantess who had stolen the love of our royal husband. The men of many colleges have similar recollections. The amount of play-acting done is by no means small; but it consists almost entirely, we believe, of the performance of poor and trifling things. It is generally done in a clandestine way, cold-shouldered by the soberer fellows, for the most part; and, if not frowned upon by the faculty, at any rate not encouraged. Things were once far different.

In French schools and colleges, as far back as 1315, dramas were enacted in public, on saints' days, by students. In Germany there was a similar practice. Reuchlin had especial distinction as a writer and actor of Latin plays in his student days. At Cambridge and Oxford, the practice of acting plays was very ancient, and continued to be an important feature of university life down to the time of Cromwell. At Trinity College, Cambridge, there was a special officer appointed from among the Masters of Arts, whose business it was to superintend the classical comedies and tragedies that were acted in the great hall. There were similar officers at Oxford. On these occasions, the heads of the colleges and the most eminent doctors were present. The representation of plays was adopted as part of the entertainment at the reception of eminent personages. Henri Taine, in a striking account of the circumstances of the English drama in the sixteenth century, alluding to the poverty of the stage appointments, says: "C'est l'imagination du public qui est le machiniste;" but in these college plays there was certainly other machinery and scenery than what the imagination of the spectators furnished. Dr. John Dee, of necromantic fame, says that in the representation of the Εἰρήνη of Aristophanes, when he was Greek lecturer, he introduced a contrivance which led to his being considered a conjuror even then. The play was enlivened by "the performance of a scarabeus, his flying up to Jupiter's palace with a man and his basket of victuals on her back; whereat was great wondering, and many vain reports spread abroad of the means how that was effected." Roger Ascham, in a passage of his travels where he strives to do honor to Antwerp, says it as much excels all other cities as the refectory of St. John's College in Cambridge, when furnished at Christmas with its theatrical apparatus, surpasses its appearance afterward: "Quemadmodum aula Johannis, theatrali more ornata, seipsam post Natalem superat." Thomas Warton, in the "History of English Poetry," whose account of plays at schools is minute, describes those performed at Oxford in 1566, at a visit of Elizabeth. The English piece was founded on the story of Palamon and Arcite. When the play was over, the queen complimented handsomely the author and actors. "The part of Emilia was acted by a boy of fourteen years of age, habited like a young princess, a son of the dean of Christ church, whose performance so captivated her majesty that she gave him a present of eight guineas. During the exhibition, a cry of hounds belonging to Theseus was counterfeited without, in the great square of the college; the young students thought it a real chase, and were seized with a sudden transport to join the hunters; at which the queen cried out from her box, 'O excellent! These boys, in very truth, are ready to leap out of the windows to follow the hounds!'" In 1564, Elizabeth had been entertained at Cambridge in a similar manner. The plays were given in the chapel of King's College, superintended by five learned doctors. The nave of the chapel was lighted by the royal guards, each bearing a torch. At the inferior schools the same practices were in vogue, with less pomp of representation, of course. Warton says the colleges and schools "afforded the best accommodations for theatrical exhibitions, and were almost the only, certainly the most rational, companies of players that existed."

No doubt the attention paid to the drama in colleges and schools at this time was excessive. The soberer part of the nation probably often complained in language similar to that of one of Ben Jonson's characters in the "Staple of Newes": "They make all their schollers play-boyes! Is't not a fine sight to see all our children made enterluders? Doe we pay our money for this? We send them to learne their grammar and their Terence, and they learne their play-bookes." The old condition of things is not likely to return; but we have a strong impression that a partial revival of the ancient customs might be made extremely beneficial. Capability and love for play-acting are almost universal among young people, though they seldom find any opportunity except in the performance of inferior pieces. Why not make this taste useful, so that not only recreation shall come of it, but training and valuable knowledge as well? The best part of our old literature is in dramatic form, never intended to be read, but to be seen and heard. Most youths find old plays dull reading; and there are few of them that it is well for young people to read thoroughly. We believe, however, that it is possible to arrange scenes, indeed, entire acts, from many of the best old plays, so as to make them conform to modern taste; that these can be performed by young men and women in such a way as to give recreation and elocutionary training; that in this way the mind may be refined, and both performers and spectators made somewhat acquainted with the works of our best genius. "But what!" says Fastidiosus. "Will you deliver over the masterpieces to be murdered by school-boys and school-girls?" Dear sir, when prim Madame de Maintenon saw her school-girls at St. Cyr play the Andromaque of Racine, shocked that they could do so well with anything of that profane character, she wrote to the poet that they should never play it again: "Elles l'ont si bien jouée, qu'elles ne la joueront plus," and so she begged for something more edifying. Hence Esther, concerning the performance of which in the same seminary Racine himself wrote: "Ces jeunes demoiselles ont déclamé et chanté cet ouvrage avec tant de grâce, tant de modestie et tant de piété, qu'il n'a pas été possible qu'il demeurât renfermé dans le secret de leur maison; . . le roi lui-même qui en avait été touché, n'ayant pu refuser à tout ce qu'il y a de plus grands seigneurs de les y mener." We believe our youth are as capable of doing justice to good plays as the protégées of Madame de Maintenon, and the boys at Oxford, mentioned just now, who delighted Elizabeth. There is a fine old play of Massinger, the Virgin Martyr, concerning which Pepys wrote, February 27, 1667: "Went with my wife to see the Virgin Martyr, and it is mighty pleasant; finely acted by Beck Marshall. But that which did please me beyond anything in the whole world was the wind-musick when the angel comes down, which did wrap up my soul so that it made me really sick, just as I have formerly been when in love with my wife." The writer has seen the best scenes of this play, after they had been slightly changed and combined, performed, wind-music and all, by a company of young men and women in such a manner that he has no doubt he enjoyed himself as much as old Pepys did, though it would be impossible for him to express himself in such happy phrase. There is a noble tragedy of Beaumont and Fletcher, The False One. In one very impressive scene, the Egyptians, after the battle of Pharsalia, are represented as trying to secure the good-will of Cæsar by offering to him the head of Pompey, whom they have treacherously slain; whereupon Cæsar, in a passage full of magnanimity, denounces them. It is fine to read, but vastly finer, especially to young minds, if a stage can be used. Let there be in the background a bier, covered with an eloquent pall and funereal ornaments; let a number of characters be introduced, and action enough to make it all vivid; then, when the impression has reached its deepest, let a spirited youth pronounce the lines, as he turns from gazing at his dead rival's face:

> "Egyptians, dare ye think your highest pyramids,
> Built to outdure the sun, as you suppose,
> Where your unworthy kings lie raked in ashes,
> Are monuments fit for him! No, brood of Nilus;
> Nothing can cover his high fame but Heaven;
> No pyramids set off his memories,
> But the eternal substance of his greatness,
> To which I leave him."

It is infinitely better so. It would be time thrown away for modern students, at a commencement, to represent the Andrea of Terence or the Aulularia of Plautus, as was done on great occasions by their prototypes of the sixteenth century. We have, however, seen at such a time what is far better, a performance of the Merchant of Venice, with little omitted except the rather dull business of the caskets. There was no machinery equal to Dr. Dee's scarabeus; but the stage appointments were sufficient to give good effect to the acting; and the whole affair was a delight and benefit to performers and audience. Any professor of English literature who will undertake the trouble, we believe, will be astonished to find the amount of dramatic ability he can develop. We have heard the difficult speech of Petreius, in the closing scene of Ben Jonson's Catiline, given by a college boy with admirable spirit; and even of so difficult a character as Lady Macbeth, we have seen a quiet young lady rise into the conception with unexpected power, giving, for instance, the relenting exclamation—

> "Had he not resembled my father as he slept,
> I had done it!"

in a manner to cause tears; and in the great passage where the daggers are clutched—

> "Infirm of purpose! Give me the daggers!
> The sleeping and the dead are but as pictures," etc., showing some sparks, at least, of such passion as must have filled Siddons.

ENGLAND.—PAUPERISM—UNIVERSITY TESTS.

LONDON, Dec. 16, 1869.

As the season approaches, the number of matters for legislation and the interest with which they are regarded show a steady increase. The Irish land laws will, of course, have the precedence. Education will probably occupy the second place. The partisans of the secular and denominational systems are alike agreed that something must be done, and are preparing for a determined contest. Meetings are being held; the League, which advocates a secular system, has received a large amount of very energetic support, and their opponents, the Union, are endeavoring to get up a counter-irritation. These questions will probably make such demands upon my space in future that I would at present dwell rather upon some of the minor matters, which are in some danger of being crowded out during the session, but which just now excite a good deal of interest.

One subject of the highest importance, and which daily attracts more attention, is the state of pauperism in London and throughout the country. During the last few years of commercial distress it has increased in a terrible ratio. The weekly returns now published show that from nearly 100,000, four years ago, the number of persons weekly relieved has risen to something like 150,000, and, although the increase during the last year has been comparatively inconsiderable, it is impossible to look without alarm upon the possible results of a severe winter. Mr. Goschen, who is a very promising young minister, has done much, as president of the Poor-law Board, to advocate important reforms. Of one movement in particular it may be worth while to say a few words. The system of the English poor-law was, as you know, founded on the principle that every man should have a right to be guarded against actual starvation; but, to prevent the demoralizing influence which, forty years ago, threatened to swamp the resources of the country, the relief given by the poor-law authorities was to be reduced to a minimum. The intention was that the workhouses should supply a kind of self-acting test, admission to them being generally a condition of relief, and the dislike with which they were properly regarded being supposed to repel any applicants not actually drawn into them by dire necessity. The workhouses have, in fact, become little more than almshouses for the infirm and the sick, and are, nevertheless, crowded to overflowing. Three-fourths of the persons relieved are outdoor paupers, who receive small weekly allowances in their own dwellings. The result is that the workhouse test has become practically inapplicable, and that relief distributed on such principles is incapable of any efficient supervision. The dislike which was formerly felt by the poor to the receipt of state charity has shown some unpleasant symptoms of decline. Meanwhile, the whole body of private charitable institutions, managed by clergymen or by persons connected with various religious bodies, rushes into the field, and distributes charity recklessly, with an entire absence of discrimination, and generally at a great expense. The consequence is that the less deserving poor manage to get an undue quantity of relief from the various discordant bodies, that begging becomes a better trade than honest labor, and that a serious demoralization is produced among the poor generally. It is a curious fact that the terrible distress in the east end of London caused a great influx of population, and raised the rents in that quarter. The reason was simply that the pauperized classes heard that a great deal of charity was being distributed there, and rushed in to scramble for their share of good things. It may be said without exaggeration that we are at present spending some millions annually in paying the poor of London to beg rather than work. The consequence is the natural one, that a great and growing proportion of them do beg instead of working, and that the quantity of idle and reckless hangers-on increases so fast in many districts as to press cruelly upon the rates, and, consequently, to drag down to its own level the classes which at present can just keep their heads above water. The public, with its usual discretion, oscillates between fits of profusion and severity. At one moment it cries out against the meanness of the workhouse authorities, and then, seeing that the increase of charity has increased the evils against which it was directed, it cries out with equal vigor in favor of the strictest economy. The first step towards improvement must lie in the introduction of some of that organization for which we seem to have so singular an incapacity. Efforts are being made, however, with some success, under Mr. Goschen's countenance and assistance, to introduce something like a charitable office in each poor-law district. Much good would be done by a simple publication of the lists of recipients of relief either from the poor-law or from private charity. Such a publication would prevent one man from receiving assistance from several quarters at once, whilst others are entirely overlooked. There seems to be some prospect of obtaining this much-needed reform, and the foundation will then be laid for a system of mutual co-operation between the relieving bodies instead of the present chaotic state of things, in which the one point of agreement is the demoralizing influence of the various schemes upon the poor. London is so vast and disorderly a wilderness, without any unity in government or in feeling, that the problem of bringing about any harmonious co-operation between all the conflicting agencies seems to be as difficult as it is essential; but it is at least a promising circumstance that many minds are now employed upon this important question, instead of, as hitherto, the simple multiplication of the means of expenditure. Of many other considerations connected with this melancholy subject, I shall not at present speak. I turn to a much smaller topic which is just now exciting a good deal of interest.

A long battle has been raging over the English universities which I could hardly make intelligible without assuming in your readers a knowledge of the minute details of those most complicated bodies; which, I fear, I have hardly a right to suppose. In a general way, however, it may be said that they have hitherto been more or less confined to members of the Church of England. Gradually dissenters of all classes have been admitted to them as students, and specially to Cambridge. There they have distinguished themselves considerably. Amongst others, a Jew lately took the highest honors which the university can bestow, by becoming senior wrangler. Yet a Jew, or, indeed, any dissenter, though he may distinguish himself as much as he pleases, cannot get a share of the emoluments by which those honors are generally rewarded. The great object of an English student is to win a fellowship, and to become a fellow he must declare himself ready "to conform to the liturgy of the Church of England." Nobody, I believe, can say with any distinctness what those words precisely mean; though, at any rate, they exclude Jews. A strong feeling, however, exists in the university itself that this exclusion is discreditable and injurious. Having admitted dissenters so far, they ought not to be subject to any disqualifications whatever. All manner of compromises have been proposed, and some bills have reached the House of Lords, though there they have been generally rejected. As matters stand, a dissenter may write the magic letters M.A. after his name, but he does not get a right to a vote in its senate. He may have a scholarship, but he cannot get a fellowship (the scholarship being of less value, and tenable only in his student's career); and there are other rules too minute to be described. The contest, like other English contests, has lasted fifteen years, and given rise to a succession of half measures. The last plan proposed was to leave the decision in each case to each of the forty colleges of which Oxford and Cambridge are composed. The result, however, is, that here, as elsewhere, we have become tired of compromises. It has now been demanded by a majority of the official persons employed in tuition at Cambridge, that Parliament shall interfere once for all, and sweep away all tests by a compulsory measure. The universities will then be fairly thrown open, and the question decisively settled. Oxford is nearly as strong in favor of the same course. It will, I think, be certainly adopted, either in this session or the next, and the result is worth notice as showing a growing tendency of our politics. We have become sick of half measures; and here, as in the wider question of elementary education, are demanding that a sound principle shall be embodied in legislation without taking away half its effect by a concession to its bitterest enemies. In another way, the state of feeling described is noticeable as proving the weakness of the hold of the Church of England on the sympathies of the country; there is a rapidly growing disposition to treat it as one amongst many sects of equal claims, not as the authoritative organ of the national faith.

Whilst noticing this, I may call the attention of your readers to the defence of Mr. Voysey, whose trial I lately noticed. It is published, and is a very remarkable document. It sets forth with most unusual force the consequences of our theory, that the Church of England is simply, so to speak, the religious department of the state, with Parliament for its legislature. Starting from that principle, no man can be expelled who has not in direct terms contradicted some article laid down by parliamentary authority. It was decided, subject to appeal, that Mr. Voysey had done so; but the defence illustrates very remarkably the extraordinary latitude of opinion which is in fact allowed. Broad-churchmen naturally admire a system which subjects their teaching to rules imposed by lawyers and interpreted in courts of law, instead of popular opinion or the authority of ecclesiastical bodies. But the Broad Church, whatever its merits, has not at present, and I do not think is ever likely to have, any strong hold upon the mass of the religious world. The real moral, in my opinion, is, that such a body is not only inconsistent with modern views of politics, but is, in fact, too much wanting in inherent vitality to preserve any permanent coherence. However, I must refer persons interested in the question to Mr. Voysey's defence, as illustrating with great fulness more of the consequences involved.

I will turn for the remainder of this letter to two or three literary matters. Mr. Tennyson's new volume has appeared, and will doubtless be in your hands. What judgment may be expressed by critics I cannot at present say; but this is plain, that, if the age is deficient in poetry, it is not from want of rewards to successful poets. Several of Mr. Tennyson's poems have already appeared, and I confess I shall be mistaken if the others add much to his reputation. Certainly, if published under an unknown name, they would have been a long time in winning their way to public admiration. But Mr. Tennyson's name is a tower of strength. It is said, I know not whether the authority for the statement is sufficient, that he has received £5,000 for the volume, and that 30,000 copies have already been sold. No one can say that poetical glory is an empty name. Another interesting book which has just appeared is Mr. Froude's conclusion to his history. He has stopped short at the defeat of the Armada—rather in disgust, as I imagine, at Queen Elizabeth turning out to be by no means the woman he took her for. His heroine rather broke down under the light of accurate investigation. Whatever the cause, these two concluding volumes are of great interest, and written with enough power to make us regret that they are the last.

Another change of some importance is announced in the newspaper world. The Pall Mall Gazette will appear on the 1st of January as a morning newspaper on a large scale—and, as I imagine, with the intention of taking a leading place in the English press. There is room for such an enterprise, if skilfully conducted. The Times, though it still shows great energy, as, for example, in telegraphing General Grant's message, has lost much influence of late years, and has no longer a monopoly of talent or vigor; indeed, in some respects it is decidedly inferior to the better writing of the day. The Telegraph is written to meet a low order of tastes, though, for its own purposes, it is clever enough. The Daily News has declined in merit since it sank to a penny; the Star is dead; and the Standard is of bigoted Tory politics. There is a chance for a liberal and really well-written paper, adapted for the most intelligent classes; and, as I suppose, that is the position which the Pall Mall Gazette aspires to occupy. Whether it is equal to the task remains to be seen.

Correspondence.

AN AMERICAN RESIDENT ON THE CHINA QUESTION.

SHANGHAE, November 20, 1869.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Residents in China have read with interest your exposition of China affairs contained in the issues of Sept. 2 and 9. We begin to feel that the real condition of the relations between China and the West may be at last penetrating even to America.

Meantime the violent attacks upon the character of the residents are continued—in the New York papers by one General Kiernan, and in London by the Pall Mall Gazette, which does not hesitate to return Kiernan's abuse of the English by describing the Americans as little better than open thieves. Kiernan is put to death and buried by a statement concerning his career in China, in the Newsletter, a copy of which I send you, and the Gazette can be safely left to its London contemporaries. It is a striking comment upon this question of respectability and public spirit between the foreign communities and the Chinese Government that the former have just raised a sum by voluntary subscription equal to $12,000 in currency to enable a celebrated European geologist, now here, to continue his explorations of the country in the interests of science, after his application to do it for the Government had been peremptorily declined. $12,000, for Shanghae with its limited numbers, is equal to $100,000, if not $200,000 or $300,000, for New York. The invitation to this subscription distinctly stated that no advantage to the present generation of residents could be expected from the exploration, and they were invited solely on the score of their obligations to contribute to the world's knowledge of China. I think I am quite justified in saying that there is not a community in the world which gives more attention to public affairs and to questions of general interest than this of Shanghae, and in this respect there is no absurdity in comparing it to Athens in its famous days. There is not a man of prominence in the place that does not give a great deal of time, unremunerated, to public affairs.

The matter of especial public interest at present is the convention just signed at Peking by the English Minister and the Foreign Office, revising the English treaties. Sir Rutherford Alcock has invited at various times expression of opinion from the foreign communities of China on the debatable points, and has, of course, received suggestions, practicable and impracticable, but at least covering the whole round of possible concessions. What he has elaborated is, of course, what his own judgment dictated in so far as he could induce the Chinese to meet his views. The convention is declared to be one of free will on both sides—the first treaty, or modification of a treaty, with China which does not rest on a basis of compulsion. Rabid Americans may deny this last assertion, but they can only do so by putting out of sight that the Americans and others followed in the wake of the arms of England and France, and are identified with their warlike acts by accepting, if not demanding (which I think they have done), an equal share in the fruits of those acts.

This free-will convention falls far short of the suggestions from this and the other foreign communities, but, nevertheless, is received on the whole with satisfaction. The principal points are stated in the local prints as follows: A modification of the transit dues; the opening of two new ports; the working of coal-mines by the Government, as an experiment, by foreign appliances at two ports yet to be chosen; reduction of duty on native coal and on various minor articles which experience had proved were overtaxed; establishment of bonded warehouses; navigation of inland waters by vessels not steamers; temporary residence at any inland port; an increase in the duty on opium; a slight increase also on silk, corresponding to its increased value.

The modification of transit dues is the subject that excites the most interest, the point of failure in the existing treaties being the ineffectiveness of the provisions for protecting foreign goods from illegal exactions while passing from the ports of entry to the interior. This was a great and acknowledged grievance, the exactions by local mandarins sometimes entirely stopping the consumption in certain districts.

The provision consisted in an obligation on the Customs to give transit passes to those who applied, on a further payment over the import duty of two and one-half per cent. ad valorem. These passes professed to protect the goods to a point of distribution. But, under various pretexts, the obligation was constantly evaded, the petty officials sometimes even keeping the passes when presented, and then declaring the goods were unprotected. There being no means of redress provided except reference to Peking, recovery of a squeeze once exacted was hopeless.

The new convention provides that payment of an additional two and one-half per cent., making the moderate import charge of seven and one-half per cent in all, shall be compulsory, but that its payment completely exempts the goods from all further taxation whatever up to retailing throughout nine of the provinces. Thus the goods are their own protection within those provinces; for, as no goods will be within these borders that have not paid the transit duty, their mere presence is proof that they are exempt. The restriction is to provinces having ports of entry, and the reason of the restriction that the Central Government feared their power would not reach to protection without especial passes in the more distant provinces. For them it is provided that passes shall be issued, without further charge, protecting them up to breaking of the original packages.

Means of redress throughout the empire are furnished by obliging the nearest foreign Custom House to send a foreign employee to the spot of any alleged squeeze, and if, on examination, one has been made, restitution follows at once by the Customs. The practical working of these provisions will probably be that the goods will really be protected in the nine provinces, and an improvement take place in the nearer portions of the others. In the distant extremities of the empire the passes will not, and never have been, any protection. The community, however, while they see that the measure only partly remedies the evil, acknowledge the difficulties, recognize the good intention, and are disposed to praise both the English Minister and the Chinese Government as having done their best.

The ports to be opened are Wuhn, in the province of Anhwey, on the lower Yangtze, and Wanchu, on the coast between Ningpo and Foochow. These ports are those principally recommended by the different Chambers of Commerce, and casual visitors have learned that the people at each look forward with great satisfaction to the coming of foreigners. The other changes need no especial comment.

There is, however, a further step contemplated by the Government which will be hailed with pleasure by all friends of China. At Sir Rutherford's earnest suggestion, they have determined to join in framing a code of mercantile law for international civil cases, founded on the principles of Western laws. This intention gives color to the whole convention. A network of railroads and telegraph wires is as nothing in the path of progress compared to the introduction of the principles of Western law. That course once entered upon it must be followed, for the better principle will drive out the worse, and the day may not be far distant when our criminal laws will have displaced those under which the country is now misgoverned, and then the problem of opening the empire will be solved. This contemplated step is an undoubted evidence of real intention to change on the part of the Peking authorities. That much must be admitted.

But that any such intention existed at the time the Burlingame mission was inaugurated, or has existed since, until a very late period, is abundantly disproved by Mr. Hart's notes, published by Mr. Ross Browne, in the first place, and by many indications given to resident ministers in the second place. In fact, it was notorious in Peking, up to last May, that the foreign office had resigned none of its arrogant pretensions, and was far from wishing to adopt Western ways and customs. This marked change is of very recent growth, and is in spite of the unfortunate influences of the Burlingame mission, as is proved by the fact that until the mission fell into disgrace at Peking (more or less), the Tsumli Yamen grew daily more intractable and unreasonable.

One cannot help thinking that it has been helped to a conception of the true state of things by the discussions and statements in the foreign local press. It is well known that all papers of interest to the foreign office are translated and laid before it immediately after publication.

I cannot close my over-long letter without saying something upon what seems to me the misconceptions which still prevail in the United States as to the positions of the Burlingame mission and the foreign communities on the China questions. It is generally supposed, and I have seen it stated in an article in your paper, evidently written by one of his partisans, that Mr. Burlingame inaugurated everything of a friendly character that has been done by foreigners for China, as, for one instance, the establishment of the foreign customs. But the system of friendly advice and help had in reality become the rule fully six years before Mr. Burlingame saw China, and has been the system upon which every American minister to the country has acted for the last twenty-five years. It is also supposed, and of course asserted by Mr. Burlingame, that he represents the people of China, and is their advocate against selfish traders who represent only their own interests. In truth, Mr. Burlingame only represents a small clique of mandarins, now controlling the Central Government under a regency, and does not represent the people, either in the principles he sets forth, or as in any way known to them. No one in all these myriads knows anything or cares anything for his mission, except two or three official men at Peking. One speaks to an intelligent Chinaman of it, and he with difficulty recalls the fact to his mind that any such expedition has left the country. When reminded, he is quite indifferent as to its fate. Further still, and this it is which has brought on Mr. Burlingame the distrust and ill-will of a community wholly inclined to support him at the outset, he claims that he alone favors rational progress without coercion in contradistinction to the residents who would fain coerce.

There are, of course, people in China, as elsewhere, who would always have recourse to violent measures. But the large majority wish nothing of the sort. What they demand is, simply protection of their rights under the treaties; what they suggest and advocate is such an attitude on the part of foreign nations that the Central Government will comprehend that they can only look for their favor and support by showing a disposition to ameliorate the condition of their people, and to assimilate their institutions to the superior forms of civilization prevailing in the West. When Mr. Burlingame raised a cry against the foreign communities of China as insatiable in their selfishness and bloodthirsty in their policy, as he did by implication if not by direct words, he could not expect a continuation of their good-will.

His erratic course has thrown us all into false positions. His business was simply that of an apologist for the Chinese Government, to show why they must be slow in improving, to discuss the best course to pursue in their improvement, and, by the information he could convey through his Chinese coadjutors, overcome their timidity and influence their minds towards a more rapid advance.

By overstating the case; by representing that the Government, so far from requiring encouragement, burned with eager desire to push on; by making statements injurious to his predecessors in office and to the foreign communities in China, he embarrassed the Government he represented, involved himself in contradictions, and has made us appear, against our own will and the truth, in the odious light of supporters of violence.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD CUNNINGHAM.

[Mr. Cunningham is the head of the well-known American house of Russell & Co., and also of the foreign municipal government of Shanghae.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

THERE was issued last month in this city the first number of the Bulletin of the New York Genealogical and Biographical Society, from which it appears that the Society has within the year taken a fair start, numbering thirty-five resident and five life members, with a library of not less than two hundred volumes and twice as many pamphlets, and has established itself in desirable quarters at 64 Madison Avenue (Mott Memorial Hall). The Bulletin tells of the origin of the Society, its proceedings, membership, etc., and contains besides: notes on genealogical works; lists of genealogies, local histories, and biographies in preparation; a catalogue of recent genealogies—some of which the owners of Mr. Whitmore's "American Genealogist" will like to learn of—and a list of donations to the Society from its commencement. We are glad that in this matter New York is to follow New England's example, and we trust that the liberality with which the Boston Society throws open its shelves to the public will characterize this new foundation. There is now a good opportunity to bestow works of value for genealogical research where they will be used and appreciated.

—The Bible, according to those who wish it retained in our schools, is not the only text-book which Catholics will presently object to. History, certainly; geography, more than likely; geology and astronomy, and even geometry, will perhaps be judged false or injurious or heretical as now taught. In some of the exact sciences Rome is scarcely up with modern ideas, notwithstanding Father Secchi's eminence as an investigator. While she tolerates him in her observatory, she allows the Cavaliere Agatino Longo, Emeritus Professor of the University of Catania, to publish from the press of the Civiltà Cattolica his "Dialoghi e Pensieri Fisico-Politico-Morali," in which he declares:

"Only Catholicism could produce a Dante, a Tasso, a Galileo, a Columbus. The anti-Catholic sects can do nothing but state paradoxes and sow ignorance. What has natural philosophy been from the time of Newton till our own? A myth. What is Newton's theory of attraction? The height of extravagance. Who are the most thought-confusing sophists in the world? The astronomers with their attraction of gravitation, and the natural philosophers with their mechanical theory of heat. When will an orthodox and sensible philosophy again arise? When the theories of gravitation and affinity, the central fire and Humboldt's Cosmos, are banished to the region of chimeras. A single man rises superior to all others, of whatever class and whatever station they may be. He is Pius IX., Rome's great priest. His word has authority, and before him the mighty men of earth and the wise men of this world shall bow their heads."

—History, however, we do not doubt, will be the strong card of the opposition, and we presume no Protestant would undertake to prepare a text-book that should in this respect be acceptable to Catholic priests. When the question actually arises whether we must try to accommodate these gentlemen, it will be time enough to settle it. Meantime a similar and nearer controversy looms up. The South of old not only anathematized free schools, but, as far as it could, refused to do with Northern-made school-books. Some bit of human sentiment adverse to the principle, if not to the institution of slavery, was sure to creep into the most innocent of them, unless, as was too often the case, they were emasculated expressly for the Southern market. And in the reconstructed South, with a few schools, that will presently be many, protests are already arising against Yankee text-books; and we may be sure that Readers which contain Mr. Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg, or extracts from Mr. Sumner's speech on the Alabama treaty, or some yet undelivered eulogy on Mr. Stanton, will be rejected if any others are to be had, while for a long time histories of the United States manufactured north of Mason and Dixon's line will be ruled out wherever the blacks are not in a majority. In the Louisville Courier-Journal of Dec. 25 a letter from a Mr. Mack, of Tennessee, was published to show up the partiality and inaccuracies of "Quackenbos's History of the United States"—an author whose Rhetoric was almost the cradle companion of the Southern boy before 1860, and who, as the writer says, "would not be likely to be suspected of a violation of the essential requirements of historical authorship." We are afraid Mr. Mack is right in his strictures on Mr. Quackenbos's account of certain battles of the rebellion, and at least it may be confessed that our school-histories are wretched affairs, that might be totally abolished without loss; though we cannot add that we would trust a Papist or an ex-Confederate to supply the void.

—The American Bibliopolist, which is published by Mr. Joseph Sabin, of Nassau Street, in this city, we have mentioned once or twice before, and are glad to mention again. A good part of its usefulness is dependent upon its being widely read, for it attempts to be something of an American "Notes and Queries," and, in order that it should be that, many men of many minds and various knowledge are indispensably necessary. Thus, who will tell us whether any very reputable British-born writer of English uses the word "raised" as we Americans use it—or, rather, as formerly many of us Americans used it, and as some of us use it now? In the South, and in colloquial language, we hear it pretty constantly with the meaning of "brought up," "bred," "reared;" and it has been used in other parts of the country, and in books as well as in conversation. Franklin, for instance, is quoted as writing that in his day there was a universal custom of "every mother suckling and nursing her own child," by which means more of the children "were raised." Again, is it or is it not true that Raleigh ever set foot in Virginia? When we think of him apart from the adventure of the cloak and the puddle, we very likely think of him as having come over to the colony he favored, and stayed at least long enough to acquire the art of "drinking tobacco." But a learned writer in the Bibliopolist says peremptorily that "Raleigh never visited Virginia;" and so far as he has gone into the question in the number before us, he seems to us to get the better of the writers whom he opposes. Another historical problem to which the Bibliopolist calls the attention of its readers is that of the origin of "Yankee Doodle." It has been usual to say that the words were written by an English officer, and were meant derisively, and we have seen the time and place of composition mentioned. But Mr. Sampson Walker, of Cambridge, says that, though he has tried to get the information he wants, he can nowhere learn whether the tune is of older date than the words, nor has he been able to find either here or in England a version of the song which he could accept as certainly correct. A correspondent calling himself "K. T. V." would like to be told what became of that letter of Major André's to General Washington, in which the prisoner begged that he might not be hanged, but might die a soldier's death. Another correspondent—who probably may have been moved by the earnestness of Mr. Lowell's recent adjuration—begs any one who knows to impart to him the name of the man who wrote this useful line:

"Though lost to sight, to memory dear."

If it will save anybody any trouble, we are willing to acknowledge it ourselves, and to confess that we are not particularly proud of it. We tossed it off lightly, regarding it as rather slight—a platitudinarian, spurious, antithetical little trifle, to which we attached no importance. But the least word of genius means, more or less, more than the speaker thought; and often he has to wait till what he has said re-echoes from others before he knows how good it is. There are other "notes and queries" in the Christmas Bibliopolist besides those we have set down, and there is a variety of reading matter which is of value to book-buyers, and most of which will be of interest to almost any reader. There is, for example, a column or two of chat about Christmas observances; the beginning of a biographical notice of Sir Thomas Bodley, of the famous library; an extract from Mr. A. R. Spofford's report on the Congressional Library; something about printers' name devices; and a letter—copied, doubtless, from an English or Irish paper—written by Mr. D. F. MacCarthy, from which we get some facts in regard to Shelley's "Revolt of Islam." It appears that there are now stealing into the market copies of the cancelled edition of that poem—which, first published under the title of "Laon and Cythna," was so atheistical as to frighten the publisher, who prevailed on his young infidel to alter it and give it to the world as we now see it.

—If it could be proved of any author, however uninteresting and obscure—a maker of algebras—that he had had a hand in the commission of any great crime or any great folly—that he had sold his grandmother into slavery, or frozen his twin children, or sawed off his feet—the booksellers would at once lay in a stock of his writings, and feel sure of turning a good many honest pennies by the sale of them; so it is not surprising to any one who knows human nature, and what used to be called the kindred nature of the publisher, that "Byron" and Byroniana are just now quoted in the book market as "very lively." For three or four months the somewhat queerly virtuous denouncers of Mrs. Stowe have told us that sixpenny or shilling editions of the poet's works, or some of them, are selling like fresh mackerel; that the leading libraries are not able to supply the demand for the poems, complete or separate; that "Mrs. Stowe's attack on the poet has made many of us overhaul his works again;" that since he woke one morning and found himself famous, he has never been so much talked of as since the day when he was set forth as being so infamous. No doubt this is all true, and that, so far as his repute with this generation is concerned, Byron owes more to the Atlantic and Macmillan's of to-day than to the Edinburgh or the Blackwood's of fifty years ago, or to the "Corsair" or the "Childe Harold" or the "Giaour," or even to the "Don Juan." The latest evidence we have seen as to the reviving effect on the poet of the "resurrectionizing" which the man has undergone is to be found in the last American Bibliopolist. That periodical contains a list—incomplete as yet—of the various editions of Byron, cheap and dear, illustrated and unillustrated, which have ever been published, and also a list of some of the more important of the many books and articles relating to him. Of these last there is no end, especially if we take into account the fact that the end is not yet. And, on the whole, the overhauling is a thing that is perhaps not so much to be regretted as almost everybody was, at first thought, disposed to believe. Whatever we are to say as to the particular charge last brought against him, it is well to come to a full understanding of the extent of the hollowness of a figure which once was so imposing, and which still imposes on many of us, both English and Americans, though not on so many as one might perhaps imagine who should listen only to Mr. Parton's tale of the ruined young journalists he has known—the brevity and luridness of whose careers are due to Byron's example—and to the uproar which has been made in England. Prescription is still strong in England, and there is no surer way to "fright the isle from its propriety" than to attack anything established, if only a poet. That Byron is a chief glory of Britain is to-day the belief of thousands of Britons, of whose children we may hope better things, even as we see somewhat better things in our transplanted Britons here.

—That there is nothing hid that shall not be revealed is probably a saying of more nearly universal truth than mystery-loving man is very ready to admit. At least, we may say so in the case of man's known or suspected concealments whenever they are such as to provoke interest and enquiry. It would seem as if now, after a century of controversy, and after dozens of books on the subject have done little more than deepen doubt, the question Who was Junius? has at last found an answer; as if, now that the Georgian Juvenal's laurels are pretty much mouldered away, the right head to wear them has been discovered. The Hon. Edward Twistleton's immediately forthcoming book—to be published in London—certainly brings forward a piece of evidence which those who deny that Sir Philip Francis was Junius will find it impossible to neglect, and, seemingly, very difficult, indeed, to get over. It appears that a hundred years ago, some time in 1770, a Miss Giles, who was pleasuring at Bath, received an anonymous note, inclosing a copy of verses—such, doubtless, as the "fair" of those days were not unused to receiving from the "swains" who at that time had not gone wholly out of fashion in literature, and who were very decidedly in fashion in the sort of English literature which did not get into print, and in a deal of the American literature which did. A Mr. Richard Tilghman, a relative of Francis, an American by residence, if not by birth, was in that year in England, and paid a visit to Bath with his kinsman, who, as we know from his own letters, was not at this period averse to leave the War Office occasionally for a short country trip, more or less free and easy and bacchanalian in its character. The young lady's anonymous note and its verses were in two different hands, one natural and the other evidently disguised. When, years afterward, Miss Giles—who had become a Mrs. King—saw fac-similes of the feigned handwriting of the Junius manuscripts, she declared it to be identical with that of the note she had received. She had, indeed, always believed and often said that the note came from Sir Philip Francis, but her story attracted little attention, or little careful attention; perhaps because she would not or could not furnish anything like satisfactory evidence of the truth of her suspicion. But when, two or three years later, a life of Francis appeared, she found quoted in it two lines of the verses in question. They formed a part of a letter written to Francis by Mr. Tilghman. Any of our readers who have the life of Francis, which we, as we write, have not, may find the lines in a letter bearing date of September 29, 1773. Mr. Tilghman quoted the lines in a manner which, it is said, clearly implies that he knew Francis would recognize them. This confirmatory proof of the correctness of Mrs. King's assertion led to a renewed investigation of the original papers, and it was found by the experts that the handwriting of the poem was no doubt Tilghman's. The careful editor of the "Monthly Gossip" in Lippincott's Magazine for January adds, that he has compared the chirography of the fac-simile poem with original writing by Mr. Tilghman, now in the possession of that gentleman's family in Philadelphia, and that he can assert, with the London experts, that there is not the least doubt of the identity of the two. Now, in 1770 Tilghman was reading for the bar in London, was on terms of close intimacy with Francis, and was at Bath with him in Miss Giles's year. On this showing, it seems certain that either Tilghman or his near relative wrote the note in the disguised hand—which is as positively pronounced Junius's hand as that of the copy of verses is Tilghman's own. But it could not have been Tilghman who wrote "Junius's Letters," for these began before the Philadelphian crossed over to England, and continued after he came home again. So, then, what with Miss Giles's belief, and the identity of the handwriting of the poetry, and that of the note with the handwriting of Tilghman and that of Junius, and the poetical quotation made by Tilghman, and the simultaneous presence at Bath of the lady and the two gentlemen, it is not easy to resist the conclusion that Junius and Francis were one and the same. And thus a trivial chance flirtation, as we suppose it to have been, carried on by two fashionable gentlemen during a flying visit to a fashionable watering-place, strips the impenetrable mask from our grandiose acerb patriot, whose sacrilegious lash was the terror of half England and the delight of the other half, and has been a wonder and a mystery to the literary world for the last hundred years.

—"None are so likely," says Mr. Edmund S. Ffoulkes, an English convert to Romanism in 1855, "to bring down Rome upon them as those who occupy themselves with Church history;" and as this is precisely Mr. Ffoulkes's favorite occupation, and as his later discoveries, he says, would certainly have prevented his joining the Roman communion when he did, it is not surprising that his works have been condemned without a hearing by the Index, and himself refused absolution by Archbishop Manning, until he submits to the decree of the Roman Court. This, Mr. Ffoulkes, while agreeing to humiliate himself in a way which the intellectual Protestant could not tolerate as a man, stoutly refuses to do "as an Englishman;" and he has put the whole story of the grievances entailed upon him by his book on "Christendom's Divisions," and more especially by his pamphlet, "The Church's Creed or the Crown's Creed?" into a letter, just reprinted in pamphlet form by Messrs. Pott & Amery. It is somewhat prolix—apparently because the writer was "spoiling for a fight" with the foreign body of which the archbishop may have been merely the tool—and cannot easily be condensed. We must therefore refer our readers to it for a precious study both of the Roman system as exposed by one of its victims, and of the victim's own mental condition, which is curious—and almost pitiful—enough. Mr. Ffoulkes has advanced so far as to deny that Rome and Christianity are convertible terms, and concedes that in one sense the dilemma "Rome or infidelity" does not exist. He also sees clearly enough the consequences of the arbitrary and lawless practices of the Roman Court. On this point he is worth quoting:

"As, under existing circumstances, Rome can only reach laymen through the sacraments, on this account it is that laymen are driven into absenting themselves from the sacraments, to avoid being subjected to her caprice. Ecclesiastics, being bound to her in other ways, and liable to be summarily debarred their profession at any moment, have no such escape. Laymen, sooner than risk being refused the sacraments, for objecting to be treated like schoolboys, threatened or refused absolution in the confessional for a hundred other matters besides their sins, take the law into their own hands and stay away. Then, if they happen to be absorbed in other pursuits, or are tempted to become sceptical or forgetful of their religion upon other grounds, or are from mere constitutional temperament incompetent or averse to be at the increased pains of adhering faithfully to it under difficulties, they settle down into indifferentism, exclaiming that religion has been made impossible, so far as concerns its practice, for any but women and children."

—A simple record of the current publications relating to Dante in Italy alone would amount, in the course of a year, to a very considerable list. It is seldom that these works seem to require of us special mention, but the enterprises in which Prof. Luciano Scarabelli is now engaged are certainly noteworthy. He has in press the reproduction of a valuable codex of the Divina Commedia, which has for many years belonged to the University of Bologna, but in a very ruinous condition. That finished, he announces his intention to do for Dante what is now being done in England for Chaucer: to print at one time (stampa contemporanea) twenty codices of the Comedy, of Bologna, Milan, Parma, Naples, Palermo, and other places, and including that of Casa Landi, 1336, the earliest whose date is fixed. Most of these are little, if at all, known, and all are as yet inedited. The Professor will compare the various readings of these and other published or unpublished codices of good repute, and hopes to be able to give a powerful impulse both to the study of ancient codices in general and to efforts to restore the text of Dante. The number of codices thus to be collated precludes, we suppose, the idea of printing them in one view in a single volume. It remains to hope that the undertaking will not fall through for want of support.

A MICROSCOPIC MONARCHY.*

EVERY humane person who happened to be aware of the fact must have had his heart rejoiced by the recent intelligence that his Serene Highness the Prince of Monaco had granted an amnesty on the happy occasion of his marriage. We have seen no details as to the number of criminals, nor of the nature of their offences, who are the fortunate objects of this act of clemency. We presume, however, that they may bear a just proportion to the number of his Serene Highness's subjects and to the extent of his dominions. This sovereign is distinguished among the other reigning princes of Europe by the infinitesimal fewness of the one and the homœopathic smallness of the other. Among all the emperors, kings, princes, grand-dukes, and dukes whose pre-eminences are set down in order in that Golden Book, the Almanach de Gotha, the Prince of Monaco is eminent for his conspicuous insignificance. His domains, consisting of the city of Monaco and the territory immediately appertaining to it, are about three and a half miles square, containing a population of something like twelve hundred souls. But, as this city is one of those on which flights of strangers, chiefly English, have settled down, the average of souls enjoying the protection of the Prince's beneficent sceptre is not much short of five thousand. And here let us magnify the republican principle in which we rejoice by comparing this least of monarchies with the smallest of self-governing commonwealths. The Republic of San Marino boasts of a territory of nearly twenty-eight square miles, sustaining a population of not less than seven thousand native-born inhabitants. Such is the happy influence of free institutions!

* "The History of Monaco, Past and Present. By H. Pemberton." London. 1867.

The history of Monaco is lost in the mists of mythologic antiquity. Its narrator, like the immortal historian of the Dutch Dynasty of New York, seeks to trace its annals back to "the beginning of the world," but he is obliged to stop short at the times of Hercules. This hero, when on his way to set up his pillars as the extreme boundaries of the world, where the Mediterranean weds the Atlantic, stopped long enough to found this city, which he continued to favor with his protection until he was dispossessed and put to flight at the time of the Diocletianic persecutions by St. Devotus, who has ever since presided over its destinies. Our space would fail us should we attempt even a sketch of the fortunes of this microcosm from that time to this. Enough to say that its story, like that of those macrocosms, the empires and kingdoms of this world, which fills up so many more volumes than are ever read, is made up of wars, invasions, assassinations, revolutions, and oppressions. We will, therefore, pass at once to the rise of the reigning House of Grimaldi, which came to the surface of authentic history seven years before Hugh Capet established his long line on the throne of France, to wit, in 980. For his services against the Saracens, the first Grimaldi received an appanage upon the shore of the Mediterranean, including the rock and fortress of Monaco. Though the Grimaldis could not maintain continued possession of this fief through all those troublous ages, they kept up continual claim, and were never lost sight of in the holy and unholy wars which were the only business in which gentlemen of their pretensions could engage. They were not finally and firmly put in possession of Monaco till 1339, to which were added Mentone and Roccabruna two years later. Between France, on the one hand, and Genoa and Piedmont, on the other, they had hard work to maintain a tolerable independence, which was generally but a nominal one. In 1524, however, Charles V. took the principality under the protectorate of Spain, which protection was continued until 1641, and resembled that which the same power gave to the Peruvians, if we may believe the statement of Rolla, namely, "such protection as vultures give to lambs." In this last-named year, however, Prince Honoré II., by a skilfully managed coup de main, which was also a coup d'état, drove out the Spanish garrison and let in a French one, exchanging the protectorate of Philip IV. for that of Louis XIII., and the Order of the Golden Fleece for that of the Holy Ghost. He also was created a peer of France, with the title of the Duc de Valentinois, which is still the style of the heir-apparent of Monaco.

From this time down to that of the French Revolution the French protectorate continued, and the history of Monaco presents no salient events such as rejoice the heart of the historian. At the time of that great overturning Honoré IV. reigned over Monaco; but neither his endeavors to stay the tide of revolutionary passion by force, nor yet to keep his head above water by swimming with it, were of any avail. Like his protectors, the Bourbons, he was deposed and driven into exile, and his dominions united with the French Republic under its old heathen name of the Port of Hercules. His beautiful daughter-in-law, the wife of Prince Joseph, was guillotined at Paris during the Reign of Terror, refusing to prolong her life by a false plea of pregnancy, which would, indeed, have saved it, as the fall of Robespierre took place four days after her execution. One of his sons took service under Bonaparte, and was of the household of Josephine until her death. The fall of Bonaparte brought change to the fortunes of the Grimaldis, as well as of the Bourbons and other beggar-folk. By a line added by Talleyrand to the treaties of 1814, the Prince of Monaco was restored to his estates, the protectorate being transferred to Sardinia. It was an unhappy hour for the estates, whatever it may have been for the prince that beheld that restoration. For a year or two they enjoyed a reasonably good government under the regency of Prince Joseph, Honoré IV. being incapacitated by epilepsy from exercising his recovered powers himself. But in 1816, this prince dying, his son, Honoré V., succeeded, the magnitude of whose tyranny and the immensity of whose meanness were in an inverse ratio to the size of his dominions, and on a scale worthy an emperor. In his little world he possessed absolute power over the lives and property of his handful of subjects, and he put it forth with an energy and unscrupulousness from which the present Bonaparte might have taken a lesson.

Living almost entirely at Paris, the great object of his financial policy was to extract as much money as possible out of his subjects to spend there, in which he showed as infernal an ingenuity as any of the Surintendants des Finances of Louis XV. Like a truly paternal sovereign, he assumed the charge of the spiritual and temporal needs of his people, and took possession of all funds belonging to churches, hospitals, and confraternities, which he conscientiously applied to the relief of his own necessities. The merchantable produce of his domains being fruits, oils, and wines, he taxed them so heavily as to ruin entirely the peasant proprietors. All olives had to be brought to his mill and pay toll royally. He was a pattern protectionist, beyond even the dreams of Mr. Carey or Mr. Greeley. Everything was made a monopoly. He had bad linen manufactured, which his subjects were forced to buy, under heavy penalties if they tried to import a better article. Gunpowder, pipes, playing-cards, and straw hats next received his protecting care. Butcher's meat followed, and was made to replenish his fisc, as was vermicelli, a main article of food of the poorer classes. But perhaps his most brilliant feat of financiering was that which made the staff of life a better support for himself than his subjects. Little or no wheat being raised in his dominions, his Highness established a monopoly of corn, flour, and bread, which the people were forbidden, under heavy penalties, to procure elsewhere. Unluckily he had no flour-mills, which were essential to his benevolent wish of feeding the hungry; but his genius was equal to this emergency, and met it by seizing four oil-mills of his subjects and making flour-mills of them, economizing the expense by not paying the owners, and obliging them to pay the cost of a road to the same. His agents were always on the lookout at Marseilles and Genoa for damaged grain, and, if any good corn by any accident found its way across the frontier, it was seized, and carried back again, and exchanged for bad. The bread made of this flour was sold at five cents a loaf more than good bread at Nice, and, moreover, was often further adulterated in his Highness's interest. Even travellers were obliged to eat this bread, and, if detected in bringing better at the frontier, were obliged to leave it behind them. Captains of vessels bringing good bread enough for their use in port were obliged to throw it overboard or have their vessels confiscated. More than this, watch was kept over the private families, and, if they did not consume as much of this precious commodity as it was thought they should, they were liable to punishment. These are but a part of the financial policy of this petty tyrant, by means of which he extorted a revenue of 325,000 francs from his paltry principality. The amount raised before his time was but 90,000 francs.

It seems hardly credible that this villain was allowed by his neighbors of France and Sardinia thus to grind the faces of his innocent people. His insignificance was probably his safety. But death, which comes to all, came at last to him in 1841, after twenty-five years of this tyranny. He was succeeded by his brother Florestan I., who had prepared himself for his princely duties by failing as an actor in Paris. He, however, inherited the dispositions of his brother with his principality. He had also married a wife, who was a helpmeet for him in whatever was bad. Some slight modifications in the oppressions of Honoré V. had to be submitted to; but they were still so heavy as to produce a beneficent and bloodless revolution. Monaco, including Mentone and Roccabruna under that name, set the example of revolution to the French, its movement taking place several months earlier than the days of February, 1848. The two dependent towns of Mentone and Roccabruna, from which the chief part of the taxes were squeezed, rose in rebellion, and declared themselves free and independent towns, the Sardinian garrison refusing to coerce them, at the command of the prince and princess. They were recognized as free towns, and enjoyed that dignity for a short time, but they soon consented to be united to Sardinia. Monaco, on which the hand of oppression had weighed less heavily than on the agricultural districts, remained subject to Florestan, and now, since his death, to Charles III. After the treaty of Villa Franca, Mentone and Roccabruna had the privilege accorded to the inhabitants of the other parts of Savoy, of saying whether they would consent to become provinces of France as a part of the price of her services in Italy. And with the same real regret and apparent unanimity they yielded to their fate, and are now part of the empire. Their prosperity, however, has returned with decently good government. Instead of 300,000 francs of revenue formerly paid to be spent in Paris, they raise but 80,000, spent among themselves. Charles III., however, was not wanting to himself at this crisis, and he demanded compensation for his relinquishment of his rights over two towns which had been entirely independent of him for more than ten years. And Bonaparte, in that splendid spirit of munificence with which he has given away so much money that did not belong to him, allowed him no less than 4,000,000 francs for his shadowy claims! Truly, it is a good thing to be even a little prince!

GENESIS AND GEOLOGY.*

THE very title of this little book is calculated to awaken expectation, which is increased when we remember the character and position of the author, and by the fact that the substance of the volume originally appeared in the form of Sunday evening lectures before the large audience wont to assemble in the Broadway Tabernacle. And our expectation is heightened by the very mention of the naturalist—Prof. Dana—to whom the work is dedicated, and by the quotations made with approval from the writings of men of such standing as Professors Guyot and Agassiz.

The discussion opens with an outline of those phases of creation which preceded the appearance of human beings. This is set forth according to the Mosaic account, and exhibited in contrast with various views which were prevalent in antiquity. In the second lecture, the creation of man is considered, of man the image of God and the head of creation; while the third lecture is designed to show that there has been no transmutation of species, but an orderly succession, and that man came in as a distinct creation, superior to everything that went before. The fourth lecture, which is much the most elaborate part of the book, is occupied with various considerations relating to man's dominion over nature, and closes with a glowing tribute to the memory of the late Edward Everett as a typical man. In the next lecture, the author treats of the antiquity of the race under some of the more prominent phases, in the light of which the subject has been largely discussed of late. Several of these phases will be suggested by the bare mention of Egyptology, pile-habitations of the Swiss lakes, kitchen-middens of Denmark, and the ages of stone, of bronze, and of iron. Man's higher powers are made prominent in the sixth lecture, which is entitled "The Sabbath made for Man," the Sabbath regarded at once as a recognition, and a provision made for the unfolding, of the distinctively spiritual side of humanity. "Woman and the Family" is the caption of the last lecture, in which are discussed many points touching great questions of the day, in a way to be of interest, if not of profit, to all such as will ponder them with due thoughtfulness and candor.

In his treatment of the various topics thus curiously brought into view, our author takes up, on the one side, the narrative in Genesis, and gives in brief what he regards as a fair and legitimate interpretation, in the light of the best helps now at the command of the Biblical student. Doing this, and in all his discussions, he takes for granted the genuineness and credibility of the Jewish Scriptures. This many will regard as a prime excellence; it was perhaps so considered by the larger part of his audience. But we may frankly raise the question whether it be wise, in disquisitions of this sort, to take such an attitude. Were there any in the congregation—should there be some among his readers—more or less agitated by doubts respecting the authenticity and trustworthiness either of the Scriptures generally or of the account of creation usually ascribed to Moses, they might regard his discussion as one-sided. They would be likely to feel that he begged the principal question at the outset, and that his arguments were therefore made out in a partial if not partisan way. Thus the author appears too much like a dogmatist trying to sustain his position. If the theologian is to reach the sceptic, he must have a spirit of real enquiry. And it may be well and honestly asked, whether even those who implicitly receive the Bible as divine would not by free enquiry find themselves, in the long run, more thoroughly and vitally, because more freely and intelligently, assured of the essential truth of the Scriptures.

On the other hand, our author brings forward various scientific theories as confirming the proposed explanation of the Mosaic record. Whether his interpretation be correct or not; whether, indeed, the best interpretation yet reached be not liable to many modifications, not so much perhaps as to points of duty and right as to the manifold details of philology, is surely an open question. Waiving the discussion of such matters, we may safely say that the real import of the Scriptures on all spiritual points is one thing, while an interpretation—be it one which to-day is freest from objection—may be quite another. Granting, however, that the interpretation suggested is the best yet made, and that it is for the time to be our standard of the truth, we find our author presenting what he evidently considers the best accredited results of modern science as an ally and in confirmation of the Bible. And this he does with unusual learning, ability, and skill. For the most part, his language is terse and strong; his style is usually clear; while he evinces, not only in this work, but in his writings generally, more than ordinary familiarity with what is going on in the several departments of scientific investigation. At the same time it is evident that his knowledge is second-hand—derived rather from books and periodicals than from actual contact with the objects of nature. It is none the less true, however, that the tendency of what he says in this direction can hardly fail to be in a high degree salutary; and with the abatement made in regard to any merely outward standard as an absolute criterion of truth—for no external form can be an adequate expression of the truth in its essence, or serve as an infallible guide—with this abatement his statements must be of great assistance both to such clergymen as are less well informed, and to general readers.

Another point is suggested by the work before us, and claims notice in the way of criticism. While many valuable considerations are well stated, not a few far-reaching views admirably exhibited, and various positions of fundamental importance brought into sight, there is apparent occasionally, perhaps it should be said often, a lack of completeness, both in apprehension of the whole bearing of the subject, and in its presentation. This inadequacy shows itself prominently in three directions. In the first place, positions which are true in themselves, and of vital import, are made apparently to repose on an insufficient basis. Or, as is sometimes the case, the foundation suggested for a particular view is not only unsatisfactory, but it is not the true foundation, nor the one on which it can truly and does really rest. Of course, when any such insufficiency in an argument is detected, the best position is liable to rejection. In the second place, an inadequacy is often felt because of the author's presentation of half-truths. While we recognize much that is of great moment, many important elements, in all his main statements, we yet continually fail to recognize that breadth and wholeness of view which are ever characteristic of truth apprehended as vital and presented in its native integrity. The utterance of half-truths is perhaps well enough, when the elements involved are recognized according to their exact extent and worth; but every utterance of this kind is liable to become a positive falsehood to such as take it for the whole truth. In the third place, the author's point of view is felt to be inadequate. There is a higher position than that occupied by the mere theologian or the mere scientist. This position is in the realm of pure principle, of principle in its primal and only absolute sense; in the realm of necessary and eternal truth, of truth as able to adapt itself to all legitimate conditions and relations, and yet as one and unchanging in its essence. A position of this kind may be held by a theologian, by a scientist, or by any other man who will enter into living communion with the principles which underlie all forms both outward and intellectual; who will subject himself to such discipline under the agency of truth as to learn to be guided simply by its power, and thus freed from the trammels which are so apt to be self-assumed and self-imposed in any and in every special department of study. Of such a position, of a reality of this kind, our author seems occasionally to get glimpses, and there is hope as to the utterances which are to follow; but we find little evidence that he abides in this realm as his home, while these occasional views appear to fade as the flitting shadows of a dream. And still it should be remembered, that in many cases, as in most public discourses, insufficient statements of the several kinds referred to are not rare, if they be not almost a matter of necessity. And while this must be the excuse for our author, it is none the less a fact that people should be put upon their guard, lest they take these inadequacies as arguments, utterances, and positions of the truth in its integrity.

With the few abatements which have been made, we desire to commend the little volume before us, and trust that it will have a wide circulation in all classes of society. It is our hope that those who read it, and detect instances of inconclusive reasoning, will be led to reject not the truth itself, but incogent modes in which it is occasionally presented. We also trust that the hints now given will enable many so to study the half-truths which the book contains as to discover their complementary parts. It is equally our wish that such as peruse the volume may not rest satisfied with it, but come to recognize the work undertaken by our author as only just begun. We all need to seek a higher position, one in which we shall not only feel, but also see, in the constantly advancing knowledge of details, that, while there may be seeming discrepancies, all the revelations of supreme intelligence, whether in the realm of spirit or in the world of nature, must be in substantial accord.

* "Man in Genesis and in Geology; or, The Biblical Account of Man's Creation tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By Rev. Joseph P. Thompson, D.D." New York: Samuel R. Wells, Publisher. 1869.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
A Fagot from the Coliseum, swd	(Little, Brown & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, No. 17, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Formby (Rev. H.), Life of Christ	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)	1 00
Fisher (Prof. G. P.), Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, new ed....	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Godwin (W.), Adventures of Caleb Williams: a Tale, swd	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)	0 50
Heinzen (K.), Was ist Humanität? swd	(Indianapolis)	0 20
Heaton (Mrs. C.), History of the Life of Albert Dürer	(Macmillan & Co.)	12 00
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Marcus Warland: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Maver's Collection of Genuine Scottish Melodies	(John Wiley & Son)
Preston (Rev. T. S.), Christ and the Church	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)	1 00
Robinson (Mrs. M. H.), Helen Erskine: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.), The Family Doom: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), Lady Byron Vindicated	(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
Townsend (G. A.), Poems	(Rhodes & Ralph)
Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, No. 23, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)

Fine Arts.

MUSIC.

OUR AMATEURS.

WITHOUT a doubt, music is the art that is most fostered among us. No parlor is considered furnished that lacks a piano. No young lady's education is thought complete without some knowledge of the divine art. While abroad the opera only exists through subsidies from the state, here the popular taste for music supports at least one, sometimes two and three companies at the same time. But the greatest evidence of the vital hold that this art has upon us is in the number of amateur societies that exist in this city, of a few of the most prominent of which we purpose giving some account.

And first, it may be premised that with all this broadcast culture of music, and in despite of the hundred thousand pianos that are made in this country every year, and the tons of musical compositions that are published, and of the fact that music is taught in the public schools, so that the whole people may be said to be educated in it, yet we have no national music, and have produced scarcely a single musical composition that rises to the dignity of fourth-rate merit. Drawing and painting and sculpture are comparatively neglected here—certainly are not universally taught—and yet we have produced painters who have challenged the attention, if not the admiration of the world, and sculptors who fully rank with those of other nations. The pictures of Church and the statues of Powers, Crawford, and Story are as well known on the other side of the water as on this, but though we have an army of composers there is not one among us that has risen above the rank and file, or been able to create a single composition that is really an addition to the musical literature of the world—not even a song, much less a symphony. The works that have been produced are feeble imitations of foreign models. Mortifying as the fact may be to our vanity, it must be acknowledged that the little music we have that possesses really distinctive American characteristics takes its inspiration from the negroes. Those rude refrains that tell the story of the poor black "Way down upon the Swanee River," or in "Old Virginny," or of the "Old Kentucky Home" have really found their way round the world. They are but the echoes of a miserable plantation life, but they are heard in the great salons of Europe. The rest of our music has no vitality of its own. It is constructed on either the German or the Italian models. Between these two schools our teachers also are divided, and they carry with them their pupils to the one side or the other—for the schools are, to a great extent, in antagonism.

Those of our amateurs brought up in the Italian school affect to despise German vocal music as being harsh and unmelodious, and recognize no merit in anything that is not extracted from an opera, while, on the other hand, the Germans find these Italian arias and cavatinas tiresome, meaningless, and frivolous. This division of sentiment is as noticeable among the amateur musical organizations of this city as it is among individuals: some of them sing nothing but the compositions of the Italian school, others nothing but those of the German. Of course, in the matter of musical organization our Teutonic friends altogether take the lead. They have brought with them the traditions of their fatherland, and directly they get here they crystallize naturally and as a matter of course into musical clubs, devoted to the music of their own nationality.

The best known among these clubs are doubtless the Liederkranz and the Arion. In some sort they are rivals—in a pleasant and friendly way to be sure, but still sufficiently so to make each a little jealous of the success of the other, and anxious to take the first place in the public estimation. Both organizations have brought themselves more prominently into public notice than the other kindred societies, by the masked balls that they are in the habit of giving at the Academy of Music every winter, in which each strives to outdo the other in the magnificence of the appointments and the brilliancy of the entertainment. But there are many other musical societies among our resident German population of nearly equal merit, if of less celebrity, than the two we have named. In all there are in this city and its immediate suburbs nearly a hundred, of which there are sixty-four in New York. Among the most prominent of them are the Schillerbund, the Saengerrunde, the Teutonia, the Beethoven-Maennerchor, and the Mozart-Verein.

These societies are stimulated to practise by the prize festivals that are given every alternate year. The latest of these was held in Baltimore, last July; the next will take place in this city, in 1871. At the Baltimore Saengerfest twenty-nine societies attended from this city. The Liederkranz appeared with 74 members, the Saengerrunde with 64, the Schillerbund with 59, the Arion with 52. There was intense interest felt between the Liederkranz and the Arions as to which should take the first prize. The former gained it, to the great mortification of the members of the latter society, who failed even in taking the second prize—a humiliation from which they have not yet recovered. The usual insinuations that the judges had been bought were freely made, and the Arions even, by challenge, attempted to draw their successful rivals into a supplementary contest before another set of judges; but the sagacious men of the Liederkranz felt the laurels secure upon their brows for two years at least, and failed to see the advisability of risking them to no purpose. At the contest the Arions had sung an easy and insignificant song, which had, perhaps, its weight with the judges in contributing to their defeat. Since then they have given a concert here, and, to show what they could do, sang on that occasion the most difficult of all the songs that were given at the prize contest, but sang it so badly as to reflect no credit upon themselves whatever.

The system upon which most of these societies are conducted is the same. Many of them are incorporated, and some own valuable property and have handsome club-houses and concert-halls. They are supported by the initiation fees and the annual dues of the singing and non-singing members. The Liederkranz has a double chorus, singing sometimes as a male voice chorus, but having also ladies in the society, which enables them to give compositions written for mixed voices. They own three adjoining houses in Fourth Street, where they have ample club accommodations for their members and a fine and spacious concert-hall. They support a school also, where young ladies are taught to sing and play gratuitously. The society consists of about eleven hundred members, of whom some nine hundred and fifty are subscribing or non-performing members, and among these are almost all the wealthiest and most distinguished of our German population and very many music-loving Americans. The concerts of the society are for the most part private, but the finest choral and orchestral compositions are given at them, for the club has an amateur orchestra of about fifty members. Mr. William Steinway is the president, and Mr. Pauer the conductor. This society has been in existence about twenty-two years. It took the first prize not only at the contest at Baltimore, last summer, but also at that at Philadelphia in 1867, and so feels double-crowned. Their charter enables them to hold property to the value of $500,000. They have performed all the great choral works of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and of many of the minor composers.

The Arion Society is somewhat similar in organization, except that it is simply a male chorus, there being no ladies among the singing members. It is under the very able direction of Mr. Carl Bergmann. It was organized in 1854, is an off-shoot of the Liederkranz, and has its headquarters at the Germania Assembly Rooms. The society has about four hundred and thirty members, of whom some sixty are in the chorus, the rest subscribers entitled to admission to all the entertainments given.

Last winter the Liederkranz and Arion came together at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, and sang the choral parts of Wagner's Lohengrin. Both of these organizations are thoroughly democratic.

A common love for music is the strong bond that makes of them a brotherhood. Art is the great leveller, and the wealthy merchant and broker, the barber, the baker, the tailor, the physician, and the lawyer stand shoulder to shoulder, animated by a common sentiment of artistic devotion, and clink their glasses in the genial fellowship of song.

The other German societies are so similar in their character that no separate mention of them is needed. All of them have their weekly rehearsals and their frequent social meetings, at which every kind of recreation is indulged in—sometimes a fancy-dress ball, sometimes pageants and processions and carnivals, sometimes dramatic representations, and at all times music. A pleasant example of their ways of enjoyment is found in the festival held by the Arion Club at their rooms on Christmas night. There was music and, of course, the inevitable lager-bier, and dancing—for ladies were invited—and an immense Christmas-tree brilliantly lighted and loaded with gifts, of which there was one for every member of the club, and which were presented with humorous remarks by the orator of the evening. It is impossible to overestimate the good effects of these organizations in fostering content and kindly feeling, in relieving the wear and tear of long days of hard work, in making life pleasant, and in creating a love of innocent pleasures in place of vicious ones. It is but forty years since these organizations were first started in Germany by old Zelter, Mendelssohn's teacher, and his friend, Fleming, and now they exist everywhere in Germany. A single Bund there has over eighty thousand members, while our Northeastern Saengerbund has but two thousand singing members. The drill of these clubs would be vastly better if the members did not hold the beer-glass in one hand as well as the music-book in the other—but then the good-fellowship would be less.

Just at present the Arions are hard at work at Von Weber's "Freyschütz," which the society proposes to give at the Academy of Music, in January; Mr. Candidus taking the tenor part, and Mr. Remmertz, a glorious basso, who will certainly make a strong impression, assuming the rôle of Caspar. The representation will probably be a better one than the opera has ever received here. It certainly will so far as the choral parts are concerned.

It remains for us in a future article to speak of our numerous American amateur societies, some of which are known through their public performances, for instance, the Harmonic, the Mendelssohn Union, and the Berge Choral Union, while others, though of a more private character, are accustomed to sing to very numerous invited audiences, as, for instance, the several clubs under the direction of Mr. Abella, Mr. Rivarde, and Mr. Mosenthal. In these are to be found the best of our native amateurs, and the performances of some of them attain a high standard of excellence, and give bright promise of the cultivation of a sound taste for good music among us.

No Library, however modest, should be without this work of reference.—N. Y. World.

HAYDN'S

Dictionary of Dates.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, cloth, $5; sheep, $6.

There is nothing omitted that can fairly be looked for in such a work; and the reader would very much mistake its character were he to infer, as he might from its title, that it is nothing but a dictionary of dates; for, while it is such a dictionary, it is something more, and a close student of it might pass himself off for a well-read man, were his memory good, and were he willing to practise deceit. It is well-nigh an exhaustive work in respect to its immediate purpose.—Boston Traveller.

One of the books that must be had. Not merely a convenient book, but one to have at your elbow constantly. A vast time-saver, crowding into a single volume the tens of thousands of dates which one is liable to require, and which, without such a book as this, one must hunt through hundreds of books, at great cost of time and patience, often to end by not finding them. Almost every event of any prominence is here dated; indeed, it is much as if Haydn and his successors had kept the world's diary, and, by a happy chance, in our time had selected the important occurrences and arranged them in alphabetical order, for our special benefit.—Correspondence of the Cincinnati Chronicle.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the price.

VICK'S

Floral Guide for 1870.

The First Edition of One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Copies of

Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide

Is published and ready to send out. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, with about 200 fine Wood Engravings of Flowers and Vegetables, and a beautiful Colored Plate—consisting of seven varieties of Phlox Drummondii, making a fine

BOUQUET OF PHLOXES.

It is the most beautiful, as well as the most instructive, Floral Guide published, giving plain and thorough directions for the CULTURE OF FLOWERS AND VEGETABLES.

The Floral Guide is published for the benefit of my customers, to whom it is sent free without application, but will be forwarded to all who apply by mail for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK,
Rochester, New York.

MRS. OLIPHANT.
MISS THACKERAY.
CHARLES LEVER.
ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

No. 1335—the first of the new year—of Littell's Living Age contains a story by Miss Thackeray and Part II. of a new serial by Mrs. Oliphant. Another serial by Charles Lever (which promises to be his best) is also begun in this periodical.

No. 1335 also contains an article translated for the Living Age from the Revue des Deux Mondes on University Education in Germany—an article which has attracted the attention of high officials in this country; together with other interesting and valuable matter.

To subscribers who remit $8 for the year 1870 the four numbers of December, 1869, are sent gratis. These numbers contain the beginning of Mrs. Oliphant's novel; also a complete story of Russian life, translated for the Living Age; Anthony Trollope's story of the Turkish Bath; and the usual large amount of scientific, literary, historical, and political matter.

Published in weekly numbers of sixty-four pages each, giving more than three thousand double-column octavo pages of reading matter yearly.

"THE BEST OF ALL OUR ECLECTIC PUBLICATIONS."
The Nation, New York.

Subscription price, $8 a year, free of postage. An extra copy sent gratis to any one getting up a club of five new subscribers. Address

LITTELL & GAY,
30 Bromfield Street, Boston.

The Best Home and Foreign Literature at Club Prices.

For Ten Dollars LITTELL'S LIVING AGE, weekly, containing the cream of foreign periodical literature, and either one of the leading magazines of home literature named below, will be sent to one address for one year—viz.:

HARPER'S MONTHLY (or WEEKLY, or BAZAR), the ATLANTIC MONTHLY, PUTNAM'S or LIPPINCOTT'S MONTHLY, the GALAXY, or APPLETON'S JOURNAL (weekly); or, for $8 50, the LIVING AGE and the RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE. Address as above.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE LIFE OF ROSSINI.

BY H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.

With a Portrait after Gustave Doré.

Bound uniform in style with DITSON & CO.'S series of charming works of MUSICAL LITERATURE ("Mendelssohn's," "Mozart's," "Beethoven's Letters," etc.) Cloth, gilt top, $1 75.

"An eminently interesting, readable, and trustworthy book. The salient features of Rossini's life and labors are grouped in admirable order; and the book, while it conveys everything necessary to an accurate idea of its subject, is as interesting as a novel."—London Sunday Times.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,
277 Washington Street, Boston.

C. H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION SIX DOLLARS, OR IN MONTHLY PARTS AT FIFTY CENTS EACH.

A new work, entitled

Illustrated Travels

All Round the World:

A RECORD OF

DISCOVERY, GEOGRAPHY, AND ADVENTURE.

Edited by H. W. BATES,
Assistant Secretary of the English Royal Geographical Society.

The "Illustrated Travels" is copiously illustrated with beautiful and authentic engravings, and gives accurate information of foreign countries, in the form of narratives, by travellers of the highest repute who have recently visited them.

In the choice of subjects for each monthly part preference is given to those countries which happen to be of the most general interest at the time. Thus the different parts of the world are treated of in succession, and in course of time a body of useful information and entertaining reading on the most interesting subjects will be brought together, relating to the position, physical features, and natural productions of countries, and to the characteristics of their inhabitants, their institutions, customs, opinions, and everyday life.

The political and religious aspects of nations, historical geography, and visits to the sites of important events in classical and Biblical history, physical descriptions of interesting regions, narratives of naturalists, hunting adventures in wild regions, Alpine climbing—all these will be included in the range of subjects, as well as narratives of sea voyages, journeys of discovery, and descriptions of the modern condition of countries.

The twelve numbers at present published are forwarded free by mail on receipt of six dollars.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York.

Ten Cents

Will procure a specimen copy, containing 40 pages, of

ZELL'S

POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA AND UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

The most complete and cheapest work of its kind ever issued.

READ THE OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Send for a specimen and judge for yourself.

Address

T. ELLWOOD ZELL,
17 and 19 South Sixth Street.
AGENCY OF ZELL'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
7 Murray Street, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1870.

The Week.

CONGRESS reassembled on Monday, and the principal business of both Houses was the admission of Virginia. There was some heavy sparring over the case of the State in the Senate, in the course of which Mr. Wilson seems to have let out a little of the disgust which the older members feel towards the "carpet-bag" accessions from the South. In the House, Mr. Bingham attempted to let in Virginia by a coup de main, but the attempt failed. On Tuesday the debates were continued, without result.

The State has fulfilled all the requirements of the law; her constitution is unobjectionable, and the members of her Legislature are as unobjectionable as they can be without setting up an oligarchy. It is now proposed to exact of them, however, a test-oath, as another and further condition of admission to the Union, not set down in the law, and not proposed till now. Moreover, in the Senate, Mr. Sumner asked for delay, on the ground that in certain counties life and property were not as secure as they ought to be—although no mention was made in the Reconstruction acts of any particular degree of peaceableness as a condition precedent. The state of the case is, therefore, this: It is now five years since the war closed; Congress has, during nearly the whole of that period, had the Southern States completely in its hands, with full powers both for investigation and legislation. After long debate, it passed an act prescribing the manner in which these States should be readmitted to the Union and civil government restored in them. It amended this act, on further consideration, either three or four times. It then passed special acts, containing more particular provisions for the admission of such States as showed a desire to qualify under the general law. These acts, taken altogether, not only contained the will of Congress, but were solemn national promises or contracts with certain bodies of people, that, certain specified conditions being complied with, certain other things should follow; and nothing is or can be known, or ought to be inferred, be it remembered, of the mind or meaning of a legislature except through its acts on paper. They were, in short, the law of the land in a free country, not the whim of a pasha, to be changed or modified according to the varying moods or desires of individual legislators, not to be set aside because Mr. Sumner did not feel quite satisfied or General Butler was not altogether sure. A legislative body which treats its own acts with no more respect than so much talk over-night in a bar-room, can hardly expect other people to respect it.

In the case of Georgia, an unjustifiable act on the part of the Legislature, committed after reconstruction, which Congress had not stipulated against, and which was actually in process of reversal by the State itself, led not only to the repudiation of the whole series of Reconstruction acts by the very body which passed them, but to the overthrow of the State government and the relegation of the people to a kind of sham called "military rule." This we call despotism, pure and simple. It has the one essential mark of despotism—that under it no man knows what the law is, or what will be the legal consequences of his acts; and a worse offence against the blacks and loyalists at the South Congress could not, in our opinion, commit, than familiarizing the people of the South with the notion that Federal laws are the mere caprices of the Congressional majority, made to-day and disregarded to-morrow, as the convenience of the hour may require. The success of the experiment with regard to Georgia has, as might have been expected, encouraged those in and out of Congress, whose prominence and influence, and in some cases daily bread, depend on the prolongation of the quarrel between the North and South, to try the same game with Virginia, by exacting in her case also, by mere resolution, conditions which are not set down in the Reconstruction acts, and the success of which would really hand the State over to an odious oligarchy, based—of all things in the world—on an "iron-clad oath." The best of the joke is that the people who are most clamorous in support of this scheme pretend that what they want is "a republican form of government."

We could not wish a better illustration of the soundness of our view than what is occurring in Tennessee, though some members of Congress seem to think that it shows the necessity of what they call "caution," but which the rest of the world call breaking the public faith. In Tennessee, the extreme Radicals, who are opposing the admission of Virginia, had it all their own way. They excluded the great body of the white population from the polls; they elected a Legislature of the most orthodox type, under cover of adamantine oaths; they put the most ferocious blood-and-thunder Unionist in the whole South in the Governor's chair; and drew up a constitution that ought to have brought tears even to Butler's eyes; and under it came back into the Union with a rush. According to the Congressional theory, the state of things in Tennessee ought now to have been perfectly heavenly; in fact, it was perfectly devilish. Nowhere ought the black man and white Unionist to have enjoyed so much peace and security; in reality, nowhere were their lives and property so insecure. The calling out of the militia for their protection went far to convert turbulence into civil war. The continued exclusion of the "unrepentant rebels" from all share in making the laws they lived under, and voting the taxes they paid, kept alive the most malignant passions, armed neighbor against neighbor, ruined the State credit, and not only retarded her development, but prevented the repair of the havoc wrought by the war. At last the loyal men had to give way and let their enemies into the government, and we have now in Nashville an unusually malignant Copperhead Legislature, and, worse still, a constitutional convention, presided over by a Rebel general, called for the express purpose of undoing, as far as may be, the work of reconstruction. In short, as far as we have yet gone, those great principles which underlie American polity, and have been till now its boast and glory, but which some "friends of freedom" in Congress seem afraid to trust, are receiving a triumphant vindication from what is passing at the South. Foremost amongst them is this—that the best instrument of government is frank and hearty reliance on human nature, on the tendency of men to do justice and love mercy, on the efficiency of education, and religion, and self-interest as in the long run the best guardians of individual rights and eradicators of prejudices. Test-oaths and martial law are mere blisters, good enough in times of excitement and temporary irritation, monstrous and ridiculous as permanent means of providing security for the weak, or respect for the laws, or loyalty to the Government.

Readers of the daily papers are, doubtless, aware that for some weeks, indeed for some months, there has been a prodigious reform movement going on here among the Republicans. First, there was a Reform Committee started as an improvement on the two "Gangs" by which the party had been previously ruled. Then the committee and the gangs "coalesced" under the approval of the State Convention, and then we went to work "enrolling ourselves" in a manner that made the wicked tremble. We were, when the enrolment was complete, to see what we were to see. We have of late said nothing about these performances, because, as we took the liberty of pointing out early in the fall, a mere mechanical combination of the old elements could not possibly produce any improvement. What is wanted is a chemical combination, and this is not possible. When you have several bad fellows divided into two gangs, your making them shake hands and form one gang does not change their character. So we felt sure the new coalition would leave us just where we were. The enrolment completed, the previous factions met for the first time on Wednesday week, for the purpose of forming a new General Committee, which was to purify the party in this city, and the result was simply, to speak plainly, a riot. They hustled each other, got the police to club each other, abused and swore at each other, and finally did something which produced an adjournment—inasmuch as it emptied the hall. Every faction wanted to get its own men on the General Committee, for the purpose of continuing to do what they have been doing—dividing the Federal spoils, and selling the Republican vote to the Tammany Ring. But the fact is they are only doing with the audacity peculiar to the locality what the same tribe are doing covertly all over the country. The "man inside politics" is irredeemable, and there is no use in preaching to him. If the Illinois Constitutional Convention will set the example of minority representation, other States would, doubtless, follow it ere long, and decent men would then be delivered from the body of this death, by being enabled to use their votes independently of the caucuses and nominating conventions; and it is clearer and clearer every day that there is no other way out of the slough. On Monday last the New York chiefs held another meeting, with 100 policemen in the ante-room, and, feeling that quarrelling would not pay, "coalesced beautifully, and now all is harmony."

It is at last certain that Texas has been carried by the Radical candidate for the governorship, that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments will be ratified by the Legislature just elected, and that a majority of the new Congressional delegation is Republican. It was only by the skin of his teeth, however, that Davis was saved and Hamilton beaten; for it is only by about a thousand votes that the latter runs behind his competitor. So far as we make out, Hamilton owes his defeat—for which everybody may be heartily glad—to the fact that a good many thousands of the white voters staid away from the polls. For doing this they had two reasons. When it was profitable to be a violent Republican—and, to do him justice, at a time when, as things turned out, it was not profitable, but dangerous—Hamilton was a Southern Unionist of the most pronounced type. It is not yet stale in the memory of many of our readers that, two or three years ago, he made a trip through many of the Northern cities, and delivered speeches in which he seemed to maintain that General Sherman's march through Georgia and the Carolinas was not only good war, but would do very well in the Southern country as peace. Nothing was too bad for rebels. The average white Texan, therefore, has been in the habit of looking on "Jack Hamilton" as "a full member of Parson Brownlow's church;" and although the ex-governor has of late developed a "truly statesmanlike" anxiety to pardon everybody who would only say and swear that pardoned he would not be, he has not succeeded in getting much of the confidence of his old enemies. There was, however, a disposition to make use of him; but for some time past it has been clear to most of the Texans that the admission of the State to the enjoyment of all her rights and privileges would be very doubtfully facilitated by Hamilton's election. Their feelings and their interest then conspired to induce his fellow-citizens to let Hamilton go to the wall, and, for the moment, we have an end of one of the most unsatisfactory politicians that the Southern wing of the Republican party has been infested with.

Mr. Hoar's case is still covered with uncertainty, and the rumors about the prospect of his confirmation are very conflicting. But the particular rumor which made him out likely to resign the Attorney-Generalship in a huff, because the Senate did not approve of him as a candidate for the Supreme Court, is certainly untrue. We have good reason for believing that he is on excellent terms with the President, and means to stay where he is till a better place is found for him, which is possible, and until a better man is found for his place, which is very improbable. It is said that the majority against him in the Senate is dwindling under the influence of time and reflection, which is not unlikely; but still we suppose it is hardly likely to disappear under any influences to which his opponents are amenable. One mode suggested for getting over the locality difficulty is his nomination for Mr. Stanton's vacant place; but the Pennsylvania lawyers hold themselves competent, we believe, to fill it themselves, and will not be over-modest about mentioning it. There is an amusing story in a Philadelphia paper, which, if not true, is good, of a deputation of Pennsylvanian politicians having recently waited on the President to demand the Attorney-Generalship for Mr. B. H. Brewster, and of their having encouraged him by the announcement that Cameron, Scott, and Forney were all for Brewster, and were of opinion that he was an ill-used man; and that nobody need mind Geary, for he had few friends and was in his last term; to all of which General Grant replied that he was glad to see them, but there did not happen to be any vacancy in the Cabinet just then.

Governor Geary, however, who is not dead yet, has, doubtless under the inspiration of the other Brewster (F. C.), been opening a variety of old sores in his message, and the Legislature, under pretence of economy, has retorted by refusing to print it. The pleasantest feature in the Pennsylvania news is, however, that many of the oil speculators are coming to grief in the courts. Mr. Spencer Miller, a leading member of the bar, is pursuing some of the old getters-up of swindling companies. A year ago he got a verdict for $80,000 against one of them, and, we believe, secured the money. Within the last week he got a verdict against another for $96,000, and, though the defendants have vanished into space, he has security for quarter the amount. A man who does work of this kind is a public benefactor, and ought to have a "surprise party." Nothing so promotes swindle as the readiness of the victims to pocket their losses, go their way with a sickly smile, and let the rogues begin again.

The talk of annexing St. Domingo, so rife two years ago, has at last borne fruit in a treaty, which transfers the republic to the United States as a territory. The negotiations have been conducted with great secrecy, for the purpose of preventing a loan, which the President, Baez, had put on the London market, from being taken up, as it was offered at a ridiculously low figure, and, in case of annexation to the United States, would be no longer needed. The United States gets the whole concern for a million and a half of dollars, most of which is to be expended in paying its debts; and the treaty is to be submitted for ratification to the popular vote, the result of which is still doubtful, the mass of the population not being highly educated, and being very suspicious of foreigners. Luckily, they number only 150,000, and, consequently, will not seriously increase the strain on the legislative wisdom of Congress. But they have hardly any taxes, and will consequently incur some heavy and novel burdens in casting in their lot with us, but in return will get a quiet life, under the rule of some of our finest politicians. What State is entitled to this governorship, and who has claims for the Assessorship of Internal Revenue? We venture to say that the news of the annexation will not excite so much astonishment anywhere as in Copenhagen, as the unfortunate Danes are still waiting for the money for the island they sold to the United States more than two years ago. The probabilities are that, having got St. Domingo, we shall soon have to take Hayti, on the other side of the island, as the inhabitants of that region will probably find it impossible to let their neighbors alone.

It will be remembered that in discussing "Progress in Massachusetts" a few weeks ago, we assured our readers that the Shanlys (the Hoosac Tunnel contractors) were going to apply to the Legislature of the State for a "modification" of their contract. Certain persons—among them one of these very Shanlys—were hardy enough to question this statement; and a letter was written by Walter Shanly, or his brother, to the Springfield Republican, in which it was said that if they could not get through their contract without going into the lobby of the State House, they would not get through it at all. When we read this letter we felt sure that something better than ordinary lobbying was in the wind; and so it turns out. Governor Claflin reviews the work of the past six months in his messsage; and, after admitting that the rate of progress required by the Shanlys' contract has not been kept up, uses the following language: "I would suggest that some provision should be made whereby the contractors may receive additional compensation for an earlier completion of the work than the contract requires. A moderate sum would be of much importance to them." Here we have the first step toward a "modification," and it is only the first which costs—at least when the Governor of a State takes it. And the best of it all is, that the State, if it is dissatisfied with the rate of progress attained, has only to terminate the contract, and relieve itself from all liability to these contractors; instead of which, it is proposed to give them a little more money.

We have discussed elsewhere the elaboration which the great impeachment mystery is undergoing at the hands of those two single-minded men, Messrs. Butler and Wendell. Senator Ross having understood that Wendell had designated him by implication as a person bribed, or bribable, wrote asking for answers to several interrogatories on this subject. In reply, Wendell says he never said Ross was bribed, and never believed he was bribed, or that anybody received money for the purpose of bribing him; but this he does say—that Perry Fuller was offered several thousand dollars for that purpose, but refused to receive it on the ground that Ross was incorruptible. This is all very fine, but, inasmuch as we have long known the very room in which the money was paid over, the kind of "dinner" the conspirators were eating when the transaction took place, and the exact amount which passed over the table, this kind of by-play produces little effect on us. If these men do not drop the subject and keep quiet, the whole thing will come out. General Butler is dying to make a clean breast of it, and, if we are rightly informed, whenever he does speak he will also give General Gordon his quietus about that little charge of trading with the enemy which Gordon got up against one of the staunchest, etc.

The Turk, it must be admitted, has, since the accession of the present Sultan, been playing his cards with unexpected skill. He took advantage of the revelation made to him by the Crimean war of his value to Western Europe, to put down the Cretan insurrection, and repress Greek interference; and this year he has reduced Egypt, which apparently escaped from him thirty years ago, to vassalage once more. The Khedive has, during the whole of that time, regarded himself to all intents and purposes an independent sovereign, and it must, therefore, have been a good deal of a shock to him to find himself called on to sink into a mere viceroy—levy no more taxes, and contract no more loans, than the Sultan permitted; give up his iron-clads, and hold no intercourse with foreign powers except through the Ottoman ministers. But, despite the strong encouragement and assurances of support he received from our barbarous contemporary, the Tribune, which had actually made arrangements for him to go to war, and fight till he died, he has succumbed, and humbled himself in the dust. The Sultan, meanwhile, is really pushing on with internal reforms, but under difficulties which seem almost insurmountable. He has established a Polytechnic School at Constantinople, in which it appears not improbable Turkish statesmen may be trained. The attempts made hitherto to produce educated Turks by sending boys to school in France have been miserable failures—the young men coming back with all the French vices, without a shred of the Turkish virtues. He has also established common schools in the capital, to which he is forcing the Mussulmans to send their children; and as in addition to all this he lives—like a Sultan—money has to be had, and his civil service is even worse than ours, he has put a fresh loan of $60,000,000 on the market, which is going off very well; but he has to pay about twelve per cent. for it. It is four years since he raised the last, but he sets forth that he has kept scrupulous faith with his creditors, and sets apart certain taxes in pledge as security for the present one. It is worthy of remark that he also pledges himself never to tax the creditors' coupons, of which we beg the Butlerites to make a note.

Some remarkable stories are coming from India, in a report from the Cotton Commissioner, as to the effect of the high prices of cotton in certain parts of India, and particularly in Berar, during our war. It appears that no less a sum than $253,675,000 in gold and silver was sent to Bombay in payment for cotton, from 1861 to 1868, from the United Kingdom alone, not counting what went from the continent of Europe. The effect on the people was something marvellous. They first paid off the debts which had been transmitted from father to son for generations, and which few of them had ever thought of getting rid of any more than of the ordinary taxes. They then ran into all sorts of extravagances. Some had silver tires put to their cart-wheels; others, by way of compliment to mother earth, used silver ploughshares; others paid enormous prices for bullocks of a favorite color, or possessing ideal tails. But vast numbers used the money to plant mango groves, and dig wells, and make conduits for irrigation, and to reclaim waste lands, improve their dwelling-houses and furniture, and import better breeds of cattle. In fact, the whole people have been raised several degrees in the social scale. Even the outcast Mhangs, or pariahs, have felt the change, and acquired some self-respect. A curious story is told of a Dher, or one of the lowest of the outcasts, who, before the cotton revolution, would never have ventured to approach a European official, soliciting an interview with an English officer, and sending before him, instead of the customary native offering of disgusting sweetmeats, a tray with two bottles of brandy, two bottles of soda-water, a bottle of pickles, and a tin of sardines on it—the poor fellow's enterprise, as he felt himself rising in the world, showing itself in this bold adaptation of his presents to the Englishman's tastes. The Commissioner mentions, by way of illustrating the degradation of the class to which this man belongs, that, some years ago, in Gujerat, "if a Dher had the audacity to appear in public, he was obliged to drag a bramble-bush behind him, to wipe out the trace of his obnoxious footsteps"—a device worth the notice of any of our politicians who may have occasion to "cover up their tracks."

Mr. Maine, the jurist, with whose celebrated book on Ancient Law most of our readers are familiar, and who may be said in it to have completed the work begun by Mr. John Austin, and laid the foundations of the first school of legal philosophy the Anglo-Saxon race has ever had, is at last on his way home from India, where he has passed seven years of extraordinary brilliance as a legislator, having enjoyed there an opportunity such as no jurist in modern times has ever had of embodying his conceptions in positive law, without let or hindrance from any quarter. The materials with which he has had to deal, too, made his work one of great interest, being neither more nor less than the regulation of the relations with one another, and with the British Government, on principles of international law, of a great number of states which have lost their independence while preserving their autonomy. He has had to deal, too, with some very curious social questions, arising out of the gradual disorganization of the old Hindoo society—such as the marriage of the new rationalistic sect of Brahmos. It is expected that on reaching home he will embody some portion of his experience at least in a book.

The début of the Ollivier ministry has not been propitious. At the premier's very first appearance a discussion was raised about certain soldiers who had been punished for attending a political meeting; and as military discipline is a very delicate point with all Continental military men, and one with which it enrages them to see pekins meddle, and as Marshal Lebœuf, the Minister of War, is one of the touchiest and fiercest of his profession, the Government appears to have been plunged at once into an exasperating discussion, in which a breach which it will be hard to heal took place between M. Ollivier and his old associates of the Left. But, judged by other signs, the new Cabinet is holding its own as constitutional ministry very successfully. M. Pietri, the Prefect of Police, has had to go; Baron Haussmann is also going; and various other old adherents of the dynasty are being cast aside. The murder of one of the editors of Rochefort's paper, the Marseillaise, by Prince Pierre Bonaparte, promises to be a sore trial for the dynasty. The French are as severe about assassinations as they are indulgent for duels; indeed, their indulgence for duels is likely to make the murder of a second in the course of the preliminary negotiations for a duel wear a look of unusual atrocity. The Prince will have to be tried, and his relation to the Emperor will make the trial a fierce political conflict; and, whether he escapes or is convicted, the Empire will suffer.

HOW ABUSES GROW INTO INSTITUTIONS.

THERE are probably few Americans to whom the state of public opinion which in England permits commissions and even promotion in the army to be bought with money, or which in Prussia practically restricts commissions to men of noble birth, and which, in pre-revolutionary France, made even seats on the judicial bench merchantable commodities, and which in many other parts of Europe make institutions, which to us seem senseless or injurious in the highest degree, wear to those who live under them the appearance of ultimate social facts, to be made the best of, but not to be got rid of, does not seem all but incomprehensible. There is not a stump orator in the country, no matter how fluent he may be, who does not find his vocabulary exhausted long before he has expressed his sense of the stupidity and degradation of the people who suffer these things to be. Can anything, for instance, equal in absurdity the chamber of hereditary legislators, to whom Englishmen have submitted for a thousand years? Fancy a man being allowed to legislate for a great people simply because his father did so before him, and without being responsible for his votes to anybody but his precious self! And then, look at the feeling of loyalty to hereditary monarchs. How is it possible that generation after generation of a highly civilized people can carefully cherish and train up their children in feelings of devoted and even enthusiastic attachment to the members of a particular family, not one of whom nine-tenths of them have probably ever seen or even experienced any benefit from; and even prescribe and live under a rule by which one member of this family in each generation, for the performance of a few trifling duties to which the meanest capacity suffices, is taken, and paid an enormous salary, sumptuously lodged, treated with the profoundest reverence, has all the virtues, including almost supernatural wisdom, carefully ascribed to him, his vices either denied or carefully concealed, his dress, gait, and personal defects made objects of admiration, and even worthy of imitation, and his silly whims gratified with the greatest alacrity as the indications of an exceptional and mysterious organization? When "the average American" plants himself in the middle of an Illinois prairie, and takes a close look at all these things, he has to hold his sides, or would have to hold them if it were not for the "divine pity" he feels for the degraded beings to whose delusions they owe their existence.

Nevertheless, one has only to examine the opinions which now exist amongst large numbers of people, and which the whole band of politicians proper carefully preach, touching the civil service of this country, and especially that feature of it known as "rotation in office," to understand fully the process by which the European nations have got into their present state of mind about hereditary monarchy, and legislators, and purchasable commissions, and the restriction of certain offices to certain classes. The doctrine that a complete change of officers, from top to bottom, every time there is a change of administration, is a necessary feature of party government, is not over forty years old. It derives not a particle of support from history. No government of party in any other country or any other age has ever had any such feature. The government of this country was carried on for half a century, and with a purity, economy, and skill which it is now far from showing, before any such doctrine was ever heard of. It is a recent invention of a few men whom nobody respects, and yet almost in a single generation has taken such root that it is now looked on by a large portion of the American people, and treated by most orators and newspapers, especially by the philosophers of the caucus and committee-room, as an essential feature of party government, which was from the beginning and shall be till the end. Moreover, it is not, and never has been, a feature of democratic government. The only governments which have ever been administered on the principle that every citizen should not only vote for officers, but hold office himself in his turn, were in reality aristocratic governments, and the "rotation," so far as there was rotation, went on amongst a small picked and really highly trained class, whose sole occupation consisted in preparing themselves for the administration of public affairs; whose only study was the political science of the time, and to whom it was a disgrace not to be equally competent to sit on the judicial bench or set squadrons in the field. The notion that Tom, Dick, and Harry are fit for and have a right to all places of trust and profit is a recent American invention, and has no more connection with democratic government than with astronomy or navigation.

The European peculiarity of which we have been speaking, too, will appear all the more comprehensible when we remember that the influence of hereditary monarchy, and hereditary legislation, and vendible judicial and military offices, on human character during their centuries of trial have many noble results to show. Loyalty to kings can produce plenty of justification which, as long as men and women are human, will never lose its force, both in the splendid examples of heroism and self-abnegation it has wrought among subjects, and the splendid contributions which kings have made to the history of the race. Officers who bought their commissions, or who got them by mere right of caste, have left us a type of soldier which certainly has great traits, and have played no inglorious part on a thousand famous fields. The military gentleman of Europe is assuredly not a character which the world can ever afford to forget or will ever come wholly to despise. Moreover, the French parliaments, vendible as their places were, and with all their other faults, bequeathed to modern France an ideal of the lawyer which she has preserved and which has stood her in good stead, and an ideal of the judge the disappearance of which in practice from her courts is one of her greatest curses, and that one which the best Frenchmen most deeply deplore.

If we were to apply this test to the system of rotation in office and Congressional patronage, and ask what effect it has had on the character of officials and on the transaction of public business; whether there is an excuse for it to be found in the manners and morals of that portion of the community which it reaches, or in the condition of the public service; whether the type of American office-seeker was in any way a valuable or respectable one, or whether, in spite of his way of getting into the public service, his behavior in it was in any way so commendable as to affect the popular imagination, everybody knows what merriment we should excite in any assemblage, except a nominating caucus, that could be got together in this country. Some minutes would certainly have to elapse before we could resume speaking. Indeed, the office-seeker and his friend and patron, the politician, have come to be a byword and a shaking of the head in American society. In looking through our exchanges, we constantly find their baseness and contemptibleness treated as a reason why the community should not bother itself about their condition, why their tenure of office should not be made more certain or their wages raised. Comments on the cruel treatment they often experience under the present system often excite only laughter. The press abuses them; business men despise and distrust them; to be one of them is not simply a sign that a man has been beaten in the honest walks of life, but that he will never again be fit to enter them; that a little of the sneak, and liar, and cheat, and trimmer, and coward has got into his composition, and made his highest use that of a warning to thoughtless and idle schoolboys. And yet there are men who maintain habitually that the creation and preservation of this animal is not only a function of democratic society in general, but of American society—the foremost and most enlightened of democratic societies—in particular; and that if we extirpated him, and put a decent, modest, well-educated, honest man in his place, and kept him there with an easy mind and assured future, something dreadful would happen. Humanity would bellow in despair; American citizens would lose all interest in their own Government. There would be nobody to nominate Congressmen, or get the tickets ready, or have the documents circulated, or the stump speakers sent out; nobody to manage the post-offices, or the mint, or the Custom House, or to bring in bills, or move the previous question, or "claim" or "yield the floor;" that, in short, the whole system would collapse if we had no "men inside politics."

The subject is now coming up once more in Congress. Mr. Carl Schurz is worthily signalizing his appearance in the Senate by the introduction of a bill, which has been printed and referred to the Committee on Retrenchment, and which we hope to see debated in February. It resembles in its main features Mr. Jenckes's bill, with which our readers are familiar, but differs in some important particulars. The number of offices to which he extends its operation is much larger,

Mr. Jenckes's bill only applies to such civil officers as are not now by law required to be appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate; Mr. Schurz's applies to all officers except judges and clerks of the United States courts, members of the Cabinet, ministers plenipotentiary and resident, and members of Congress. Both bills provide for the appointment of a board of examiners, Mr. Jenckes's containing four, holding office for five years; Mr. Schurz's containing nine, a third of which go out of office at the end of four, another third at the end of eight, and another at the end of twelve years; after that, the term of all to be twelve years. Both provide for the examination, by this board, of all candidates for places in the civil service, and confine the selection of officers to candidates who have passed, and empower the body to make such regulations as may be necessary for the exercise of their powers. Both boards are to have the power of trying offences committed by officers, and reporting the result to the head of their respective departments; but Mr. Jenckes's bill looks to tenure of office during good behavior, while Mr. Schurz's, by way of compromise, provides for the retention of their offices for five years by actual incumbents, unless removed for incompetency after examination, which their superior may order them to submit to; and makes the tenure of all subsequent appointees eight years, and makes the first year of every appointee a year of probation, hoping that in this way the public will be weaned from its present habit of looking for a general upturning every four years, as part of our system of Government, without being brought face to face with a "bureaucracy." Even if officers were turned out regularly eight years from the date of their appointment, their dismissal would be distributed through the year, and the executive would have time and leisure for the choice of proper successors, instead of, as now, the new President being compelled to fill every office in the gift of the Government in the very month in which he himself needs all his time to make himself familiar with his own duties.

One of the signs of the advance of public sentiment on this subject is the admission which even hardened politicians now begin to make, that Congressional patronage is an abuse, and has in reality altered the character of the Government by wresting the appointing power from the executive, besides degrading the public service, and that, if "rotating" is to continue, the job ought to be left to the President alone. It is amusing, however, to watch them crying out by way of compromise, "Give us a good President, and all will be well." No; we won't let it depend on the character of the President whether we are to be burdened with them or not. We are determined to get rid of them somehow, no matter what the character of the President may be. It is time for them to select an honest calling. They have lived long enough on the substance of decent people, and have done enough to befoul and degrade the best ideas of the age. They shall not have "justice" for a cloak and "humanity" for a blanket much longer.

MORE LIGHT ON AN ABSTRUSE SUBJECT.

Mr. Emerson, in one of his later lectures—we forget the title, but that is of small consequence—narrates a story which frequently has recurred to us in connection with recent political events. It seems that once upon a time there were two Congressmen who, unlike most Congressmen, were profoundly interested in the most abstruse philosophical questions, such as the origin of evil, the nature of God, his purposes with man, and, indeed, one may say, the cosmos in general. The Congressmen in question, being intimate friends, naturally discussed these problems together, and, gradually becoming more and more interested in their solution, resolved, one with the other, that, if either should at any time discover anything of importance, he should let the other know. Time rolled on, and nothing came of the agreement; the two friends separated, and did not see each other for years. At length they met again in Washington, at one of the President's receptions. They recognized one another across the room, and, as they approached, one said, "Any more light, Thomas?" and the other said, "No more light, Samuel." Then the other said, "Any more light, Samuel?" and the first replied, "No more light, Thomas;" and so they separated for ever.

It has often struck us that the attitude of these two simple-minded Congressmen towards the cosmos was not unlike that of the American public towards the impeachment investigation of two years ago—an attitude of respectful but despairing enquiry; and the recent appearance in the Cincinnati Gazette of some more letters on this subject, from the Washington correspondent of that paper, has tended to confirm the impression. The correspondent in question—"H. V. B."—is one of the few Washington letter-writers who can be relied upon for trustworthy and impartial accounts of political transactions, and he has recently been interesting himself in looking anew into the celebrated senatorial corruption investigation, conducted to such a triumphant issue by General Butler at the close of the impeachment trial. Most of our readers remember, of course—if they do not, it is not our fault, certainly—that at the close of the great State trial, which was to have brought Andrew Johnson to the block, and to have taught a lesson to all future despots, which should have made them tremble as not Harmodius nor Aristogeiton nor Oliver Cromwell himself had caused to quake the despots of the past—at the disastrous close of that trial, when the villany of Evarts and the machinations of Satan had secured an acquittal, General Butler rose in his place and proposed a committee of investigation; that the committee was appointed, with himself as chairman; and that, not long after, the General made a report to the effect that immense amounts of money had been used to bribe senators to vote for acquittal; that several senators had been corrupted, and that the most convincing proof of this was that no evidence implicating any one could be found, so carefully had the guilty traitors concealed all traces of their crime. This was perplexing to the ordinary mind, but not half as much so as the controversy which has succeeded it. The moment General Butler had concluded his investigation, the correspondents began theirs, and, as they have been conducting it ever since, the result has naturally followed that the whole matter has been involved in a hopeless maze of assertions, answers, counter-statements, anti-counter-statements, and "final exposures of the whole thing." At present there is, perhaps, no subject before the public which is more entirely and profoundly confused, unless it be the Byron story. Indeed, the methods of investigation, and the kind of evidence produced in the two cases, are, if Mrs. Stowe will pardon us, very similar; and one of the most amusing situations in modern times was that in which the General, taking under his custody the rules of evidence, read Mrs. Stowe a severe rebuke for violating them in her true story of Lady Byron's life.

The chief trouble with the investigations carried on by newspaper correspondents is that, being almost entirely ex parte, they are about as valuable as would be an unsworn statement made by an unknown witness before an equally unknown magistrate, produced in court by some third party who was a stranger to both. For example, we read in the daily Tom-Tom (an impeachment organ) that the Washington correspondent of that paper knows, as a matter of fact, that so many dollars were paid to the late Mr. Fessenden for his vote, and that remorse for his crime drove him to an early grave. Now, of course, the Tom-Tom is not responsible for this statement, for it is not made editorially; the correspondent and his informant are unknown. As a matter of fact, the information reached the correspondent in this way: He is known in Washington as being connected with the Tom-Tom, and known to have the same principles professed by the editor of that enterprising journal, and this affords him an acquaintance with gentlemen of the same kind who happen to have seats in Congress; in short, he learns to know and love many of them—among others, General Butler. The General invites him to dine, being pleased with his manly and earnest tone; and when the feast is over, and the genial glow of post-prandial conversation ensues, and the General becomes communicative, the correspondent of the Tom-Tom sees that his opportunity has come. The General will allow himself to be pumped. Then, beginning quietly, he says: "General, you must have valuable information in your possession, now, about the impeachment trial. It is a pity the public cannot be fully informed about that matter." Then the General, lowering his voice, replies: "Sir, it would be too dangerous; why, I have information that would damn to eternal infamy half the Senate of the United States. No, no, sir; sorry this cannot be divulged."

Correspondent—"You mean that you have information obtained since the trial?"

Gen. Butler—"Ay, sir; since the trial."

Correspondent—"And it implicates—?"

Gen. Butler—"All of 'em."

Correspondent—"What! Then Fessend—"

Gen. Butler—"As for him—" (taps his pocket and shakes his head significantly). "I wish to be explicit about this. You understand me, I suppose."

And straightway the public is regaled with the announcement of the additional information on the subject of the impeachment trial we have just quoted from the Tom-Tom. Most of the correspondence on this subject has been of this sort, and the public cannot be said to have gained much more light from it as to the true grounds of the acquittal of Johnson than they have from the original report of the great investigator himself.

Not such a correspondent, however, is "H. V. B.," of the Cincinnati Gazette, and this fact makes it not inopportune to call our readers' attention to a letter of his, recently published under date of December 31, 1869, the opening paragraphs of which are as follow:

"A late letter in this correspondence, upon the subject of impeachment, has called out some very pointed denials.

"Some of the main statements of that letter were these:

"1. Three attempts were made to use money, the first involving a bet of $50,000, the second an offer to Wendell of $100,000 for evidence that money was being used to influence senators, and, third, that $165,000 was raised to secure acquittal, and that it passed through the hands of Wendell and others who were before Butler's committee.

"2. There was a political bargain, worked up principally by Senator Henderson, by which President Johnson agreed to reorganize his Cabinet, as an assurance that he intended to make no trouble in case he was acquitted, and that the names used as among the new appointees were those of Reverdy Johnson, Evarts, and Groesbeck.

"3. A statement that the President's nearest friends assert that he was at no time a party to the use of money, and always expressed himself as strongly opposed to it, and that it must be distinctly understood there was no intention of saying that any senator was approached by money.

"4. An intimation that the farce of the House investigation may have been made such by the complications arising from the offer to Wendell of $100,000 for evidence that senators had been approached with money, as it would have been awkward to examine witnesses in regard to their knowledge of the use of money, and have them answer that an offer of $100,000 for evidence against senators, which they understood had been made by General Butler, had come to their knowledge."

When we read these four statements we confess that we glow with that temperate glow of journalistic delight which weekly papers always feel at the discovery of truth. Here, at length, was the solution of the problem; here was the key to the riddle; here was the reward of patient investigation. Money had been used, and it had been used not for acquittal, but to procure evidence which might lead to conviction. "H. V. B." had at last succeeded in doing what Butler had so signally failed to achieve. Unfortunately, however, certainty is not reached yet; for the General has twice been interviewed on the subject of this letter, and has made so many statements as to "H. V. B.'s" statements, who in his turn has replied with so many counter-statements, that the celebrated Chancery suit in which Mr. Packer made his name famous, fades into insignificance by the side of this controversy. In the first place, General Butler said that "H. V. B.'s" letter was "a most absurd collection of falsehoods" as far as he was concerned. But then, further on in the same interview, the General admitted that he did know something of the facts alleged in "H. V. B.'s" two first statements; and this admission "H. V. B." considers as militating against the general denial first made. The second interview seems to have been more important. The interviewer appears to have entered the warrior's chamber melodramatically, with the guilty issue of the Cincinnati Gazette in his hand, and to have at once silently presented it to the General. The latter read it carefully, and then, as another veteran, celebrated in verse, is said to have done,

> "De Shen'ral he uttered no hymn und no psalm,
> But he opened his mout, und he priefly say"—

"Bosh! It is a story Cornelius Wendell has been trying to get into print for some time," and then followed this dialogue:

"Correspondent—You do not believe these so-called revelations?

"General Butler—I do not. I know there is very little truth in it. It is a story Cornelius Wendell has been trying to get into print for some time. . . .

"Correspondent—Well, General, don't you think Wendell was the ringleader of, or deep in, the conspiracy?

"General Butler—He no doubt was in it, but did not know of all the operations. The others did not trust him implicitly. He is now trying to make himself the Boanerges of the affair, but I would not believe a word he would say, unless it was corroborated by other testimony.

"Correspondent—General, who was the leading spirit in the money matters—that is, to the buying of senators?

"General Butler—Cooper managed the whole affair.

"Correspondent—Did not Wendell buy any senators?

"General Butler—He may have arranged something in reference to them, but Cooper was the man."

Let us pause here for a moment, and consider the characteristic cleverness of the General, displayed in this interview, supposing for an instant that "H. V. B." is correct in his assertions of the offer to Wendell. Of course, this being taken for granted, it would be obviously for his interest to make Wendell out a wholly untrustworthy witness; and in the way of defamation could anything be neater than the artless manner of saying, "It is a story Cornelius Wendell has been trying to get into print for some time"? The picture is called up of the old villain Wendell sneaking about from newspaper office to newspaper office, trying to get his lying accusation into print, and failing miserably until he actually finds in "H. V. B." a suitable tool, surpasses anything we know of in literature for pure effectiveness. And it not only has a primary defamatory effect, but a second, no less important, one on the understanding of the reporter, who is at once made to perceive that Wendell is not his true game at all, and so the conversation gradually leaves the original subject, the question of the credibility of "H. V. B.'s" statements, the General's connection with Cornelius Wendell, and the rest, and of a sudden we find ourselves discussing the character of one Cooper, whom the General describes succinctly as "the man." And so the reporter finds himself at the door, as wise as when he entered it. But we cannot go through all the details of the controversy; suffice it to say that "H. V. B.," not being quite satisfied with the General's denials, examined the archives of the Investigating Committee, of which he was once chairman, and made discoveries which he thus epitomizes:

"So it appears from General Butler's own reports that he traced much more money than was claimed in the letter he regards as 'bosh;' and that, while he thinks Wendell was an operator, Cooper was the man. He knew something about the $50,000 bet, and all about the pledges of good behavior made by the President.

"He denies that he was a party to an offer of $100,000 for evidence that money was being used to secure acquittal, and attempts to raise a laugh over the absurdity of his going to meet Wendell in a close carriage, and thus discredit the material portion of the statement. There was no assertion in the letter that he did take this ride, but, instead, a statement that those who went to Wendell told him that Butler was near at hand, and would meet him in a carriage.

"Of course General Butler did not walk up to Wendell, and, handing over his check, say, 'Old fellow, here's a hundred thousand dollars; tell me what you know about corrupting senators.' But, because this was not done, it does not follow that an indirect transaction, which meant just that in plain English, did not take place. And that his broad denial by no means meets the case, may yet be made to appear."

And now if any one thinks he knows anything about the impeachment trial more than this, that a distinct charge is made by "H. V. B." that Butler offered Cornelius Wendell a sum of money for evidence, we should like to know what it is that he knows. This charge we are ourselves very much inclined to believe, both on the strength of "H. V. B.'s" reputation, and on that of General Butler's. But there is one thing that might be done. General Butler and Cornelius Wendell might unite in a card to the public, denying formally that any such offer was made, and calling upon "H. V. B." to produce his witnesses, and, if that does n't satisfy everybody, we shall be indeed surprised. It is true that General Butler has thrown out hints that he did not consider the uncorroborated evidence of Wendell very valuable. But then, corroborated by his own, he could not object. A little more explicit denial than that contained in the word "bosh" is what is wanted.

THE BURDEN ON THE SUPREME COURT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the columns of the Nation of August 15, 1867, was one of a series of articles written by the author of this letter, then and now a member of the Federal judiciary, and addressed to the State Constitutional Convention, then sitting in Albany. That article predicted the inevitable coming of some such movement as the one just begun by Senator Drake. It was written on the judicial side of the subject, yet it earnestly urged upon the Convention that the power to declare laws unconstitutional be taken from the judiciary; and it pointed out the fact that the present system of allowing courts to annul laws because of a mere difference of opinion as to the true theory of the Constitution was dragging down the courts, undermining the law-abiding character of our people, and releasing the Legislature from the strict accountability to the Constitution which the people of England exact of their representatives in Parliament, and which has made Parliament the jealous guardian of the British Constitution, and relieved the British courts of endless exciting and distracting adjudications upon the never-settled doctrines of "constitutional law." The article also said: "The Constitution of the United States has thrown upon the judicial department the entire responsibility of protecting the Constitution. This responsibility the judiciary is the least able to bear, and its errors are the most difficult to be corrected. The body of the people, moreover, have instinctively known that these political decisions were political and not legal; and while upon matters of law the Supreme Court of the United States has ever been heard with profound and undoubting respect, its decisions upon matters of political power have been received with constantly growing contempt; so that, if things go on as they are going, no distant day will see an amendment adopted cutting down the powers of that tribunal, and declaring that no statute properly enacted by the people through their lawful representatives shall ever be adjudged unconstitutional and void."

The prediction is the more noticeable because Senator Drake announces that "two years ago he recognized the right of the Supreme Court of the United States to declare an act of Congress invalid for unconstitutionality;" and that a few months afterward he first found himself doubting that right against all his "legal education and preconceptions; against the reiterated rulings of that court; against all professional tradition, and against the authority of all the writers on American constitutional law."

It was never supposed by me that this change could be effected by an act of Congress. The contemporaneous, the continued, and the unquestioned construction given to the Constitution must be taken as conclusive as to its meaning. The clause just cited from Senator Drake's speech in itself conclusively shows that the people of the United States did vest this authority of supreme arbitrament in the Supreme Court. Such a power, constitutionally vested, can only be constitutionally taken away. Right or wrong, it exists; wisely or unwisely, it has been entrusted to that tribunal; Congress, doubtless, may regulate it as they regulate the jurisdiction of the Court; but the constitution, that is to say the people, alone can take it away.

Still speaking on behalf of the Federal judiciary, and more deeply than before impressed with the truth of what I then uttered, and with the apprehension of a greater evil to come, I earnestly appeal to the editor of the Nation, and to all thoughtful men who desire to preserve the moral power of the judiciary and the law-revering character of our people, to assist in taking from the judicial branch of the Government a burden which it is the least able to bear, freeing it at the same time from the popular clamor and odium which is flung at it whenever an unpopular constitutional decision is rendered by a divided court, and at the same time bringing the responsibility of guarding the Constitution home to the legislative branch, where it properly belongs. This responsibility is dragging down the judiciary. Congress and the people have bullied and starved the Supreme Court, and Congress is still paying off old scores, and the Court is slowly and insensibly yielding. I have watched it for years, and see that it is yearly failing. If the conflict is kept up, it, being the weaker, must fail first.

It must be admitted by you—by all men—that this work of annulling what purport to be laws—of annulling, it may be, a statute that has been well considered in two distinctive legislative bodies, and that has, moreover, passed the third ordeal prescribed by the Constitution, the Presidential approval—is a serious business, one to be well considered, and which should not be dismissed, alone, on the ground that it is presented to public consideration by a politician and a partisan irritated at and jealous of the Supreme Court. It is undeniable, too, that the most important constitutional decisions have come to us from a divided court, and that the views of the judges have generally gone according to their former political opinions; so that the public have often been able to predict the decision before it was announced; while the judicial opinions within the Court have been little else than a reflex of the political opinions without. Witness the decision of the New York Court of Appeals in the canal loan case, of the Supreme Court in the Dred-Scott case, and, more recently, in the test-oath case. It may also happen that a statute which has been passed by large majorities in the two Houses of Congress, and which has been maturely considered and deliberately approved by the President, examined, moreover, by the Attorney-General, and sanctioned by all of the President's constitutional advisers, and, finally, which is pronounced constitutional by four judges of the Supreme Court, may be absolutely annulled, and declared not to exist, by five. When this divided Court and bare majority move counter to the general public sentiment of the day, it is needless to add, the general public sentiment of the day seizes on the opinions of the four dissenting members as conclusively right, pronounces the five controlling members prejudiced, dishonest, and, perhaps, corrupt, and thinks the Supreme Court, and, mayhap, the Constitution itself, a nuisance used to thwart the people in making their own laws.

Furthermore, the members of the Supreme Court, holding for life, and changing at rare intervals, must, in the nature of things, hold to the public sentiment of the past rather than the public sentiment of the day. It is not wonderful, therefore, that there have been these jarrings of opinions; and so long as the public sentiment travels rapidly and the judicial sentiment slowly, such jarrings may be expected and will be inevitable. There was something more than sad in the sight of the moral part of the community waiting with angry impatience for the death of their chief judicial officer, whom they were accustomed to regard as a great jurist and a stainless judge, till an unfortunate decision came to drag him down, and make his death not a judicial loss but a political gain.

I may point also, in this connection, to the popular, though it may well be unfounded, belief on the legal-tender question. There probably is not a lawyer in the United States who will not undertake to marshal the judges on this question, and who, if he had been told that Mr. Justice Grier had determined to maintain its constitutionality, would not have exclaimed that that settled the matter and made a majority of the Court. Is there not something positively awful in the thought of a statute, on which the entire community has moved through the most trying period of their financial as well as national existence—a statute by which they still move in every money matter of their daily lives—swaying backward and forward, from law to nonentity, on the enfeebled mind of a single aged man? Can a people maintain a profound reverence for that which thus trembles in a quivering balance?

In my previous article on this subject, I went, as men are apt to do when breaking new ground, further than my maturer judgment does approve. Congress differs from Parliament in this: 1st. That its members, though well versed in the laws of their own respective States, come into the national legislature, for the most part, ignorant of the Federal statutes, and knowing little of the subjects to which those statutes relate. 2d. That its general laws are enacted with none, or at best but little, of the care, study, and particularity that shine in the English statutes and give lustre to the British Parliament. And, especially, there is none of that deference to the opinion of the judiciary, that submission of legal questions to the judges, that seeking the guidance of the law and judicial officers of the nation, which makes the work of Parliament so cautious on the one hand, so complete on the other. While these imperfections last the people of the United States will be tardy to vest this supreme power of final censorship in Congress. It remains, then, for thoughtful men to think of a remedy. Perhaps Mr. Trumbull's earlier plan, requiring a concurrence of two-thirds of the Supreme Court to declare a law unconstitutional, is a step in the right direction. Yet, so long as part of a court uphold a law as constitutional, and its validity or annulment depends on the accident of judicial changes or on the political training of the majority, will it not be more logical and rational to require a concurrence of all the judges? A decision which makes a law void affects not merely the John Doe and Richard Roe before the Court, but affects directly, and perhaps equally, every man and woman in the country. We are all parties plaintiff or defendant in the legal-tender cases, though not appearing on the record. When an act of Congress is so clearly void that no member of the Supreme Court pronounces it valid, and the judicial mind of the Court as a unit stamps it as a legislative inadvertence, then the decisions of the Court will be restored in public estimation to their former majesty, and then, I presume, not even my friend Senator Drake will care to quarrel with the conclusions of the Court. A MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY.

WASHINGTON, January, 1870.

[We agree with our correspondent that it remains for thoughtful men to think of a remedy. But Mr. Drake's bill is not a remedy: it is simply a proposition to substitute one disease for another. Mr. Drake mistakes the petulant irritation of members of Congress for the will of the people; and he forgets that the people have the right to vest this power of final censorship where they please. He also forgets that the action of Congress of late years has not been such as to entitle it to this supreme power; that laws have been enacted under the party gag, without time for consideration, without liberty for discussion; that the last hours of every session witness legislation conducted amid the tumult of a mob; that the Senate has too often adopted and abetted the tumultuous proceedings of the House; and that the House, after earning the popular cognomen of "the Bear-Garden," is now seeking to make itself worse by increasing its noisy numbers to three hundred or three hundred and fifty members. The Supreme Court may not render decisions on constitutional questions in accordance with the popular judgment, and its conclusions may often be prejudiced, biassed, and unsound, yet still with these defects it will be a safer tribunal to judge of the constitutionality of a statute than the most radical of bear-gardens. So long as Congress holds thirty-hour sessions, and members vote in complete ignorance of what they are voting upon, and general laws are hitched on to appropriation bills, and statutes go upon the statute-books which indicate chiefly the ignorance and inability of the men who made them, just so long it will be idle to talk of placing this supreme infallibility in the halls of Congress.—ED. NATION.]

MRS. STOWE'S "VINDICATION OF LADY BYRON."

THERE is one question between Mrs. Stowe and the public which her first article in the Atlantic left somewhat in doubt, and which many people hoped she would decide favorably to herself in the volume just issued, and that is her right to make the revelation she has made about the causes of Lord and Lady Byron's separation. The impression left by the article was that she had been consulted by Lady Byron as to the propriety of making it, and advised against it; and that Lady Byron had acted on this advice by refraining from making any revelations during her lifetime. It further appeared that she had left it to the discretion of certain trustees, of whom Mrs. Stowe was not one, to decide whether any such revelation should be made after her death; and that they decided against it, or against even the supply of materials for her biography from the papers in their possession. What the public would have been glad to learn was that she had, expressly or by implication, left some discretion in the matter to Mrs. Stowe, which she had overlooked or forgotten in making her will; but this does not appear to have been the case. Mrs. Stowe alleges that, "by leaving the whole ("statement of the case for advice") unguarded by pledge or promise, it left discretionary power with her [me] to use it, if needful" (pp. 403, 404). We presume we have here got at the misapprehension which has been at the bottom of Mrs. Stowe's course. "A statement of the case for advice" as to the propriety of making certain facts public is, in its very nature, a confidential communication. It does not need to be "guarded by pledge or promise." If the person of whom advice is sought advises against publication, and his advice is taken, he is, as the lawyers say, functus officio. His own lips are closed by the very terms of his counsel, and he has no further duty in the matter. Lady Byron appears to have acknowledged the soundness of Mrs. Stowe's opinion. She died, and made no sign. Mrs. Stowe was bound to follow her example, even if she believed herself to be the sole depositary of the secret. That her error, in making her revelations, ought not to have exposed her to the coarse abuse she has received is quite true; but it was nevertheless an error, based on a misconception, from which, one would say, a few minutes' talk on the matter with a sensible lawyer, or man of the world, would at the outset have saved her.

Another thing to be regretted about the present volume is its tone. The fault of the article in the Atlantic was its mixture of fact and feeling —the high-strung, sentimental, and, in some places, rhapsodical vein in which some of the most awful charges ever made against two human beings were brought before the public. People said that, when a story of this kind, damning the memory of two persons to everlasting infamy, and plunging their surviving relatives in a sorrow without hope, was told, it should have been told with all the calmness and precision of which human language is capable; facts and conclusions should have been carefully distinguished, and the feelings of the narrator, no matter how respectable, have been kept as far as possible out of sight. In charging a crime against a man, all displays of emotion on the part of the prosecutor are improper, for the simple reason that they are a covert begging of the question. He has no right to get indignant or sigh or weep over what he has still to prove. It is only to the defence that it is permitted to be pathetic. Mrs. Stowe, it is true, seems to have throughout labored under the impression that she was simply acting on the defensive; but from this, too, advice such as we have spoken of would have saved her. As between Lord and Lady Byron, it may perhaps be said that her theory of her position is correct; but it must be remembered that, as between Lady Byron and Mrs. Leigh, Mrs. Stowe's procedure is an assault of the most terrible kind on a woman of hitherto blameless repute, who was in no sense a public character, and who, if we are not mistaken, has children or other descendants still surviving, for whom Mrs. Stowe's charges, if sustained, mean social damnation. We were in hopes, therefore, that the defects of form in the first indictment would have been amended in the supplementary volume, and that we should have been supplied with a passionless and unvarnished statement of the proofs, such as would have been proper had Mrs. Stowe been called on to submit them, in Mrs. Leigh's presence, to a competent tribunal. Whatever delicacy, or avoidance of color or overstatement, would have been due to her if living, are certainly due to her when dead. In this expectation, however, we confess we have been disappointed.

And now as to the charges themselves. All the earlier part of the volume, down to page 152, describing what Mrs. Stowe calls the "conspiracy," or "concerted attack on Lady Byron's reputation, begun by Lord Byron in self-defence, and transmitted to his friends to be continued in self-defence," may be dismissed as irrelevant. Mrs. Stowe produces no evidence of "conspiracy" whatever. All that appears is that Lord Byron was coarse, brutal, unprincipled, and that he had friends and admirers who were little better than himself; that when he and his wife separated they took his side, but each in his own way, and used such facilities as they had to defame her. But there is no trace of a "conspiracy" amongst them, and Mrs. Stowe's loose use of the word is another indication of the absence of a proper sense of the gravity of the task in which she is engaged. The only bearing of the story on the present controversy lies in the support it affords to the presumption that Byron was capable of anything, however bad; but then this presumption must rest, after all, on Byron's own behavior to his wife, of which there is plenty of evidence, and which has nothing to do with the "conspiracy." We may fairly dismiss "the physiological argument" in the same way. We cannot allow Mrs. Leigh to be convicted of incest on a statement that "modern physiological developments would lead any person versed in the study of the reciprocal influence of physical and moral laws to anticipate the most serious danger to the "organization" of somebody else; in other words, that the intemperance, licentiousness, and hereditary defects of organization of Lord Byron made it probable that his sister was a disgusting wretch. We are not engaged here in the study of morbid psychology. The sole question between Mrs. Stowe and the public is, What reason has she for believing that Lord Byron committed this crime, which the rest of the world had not, and which therefore gives to what she says of the cause of his separation from his wife the character of a revelation, which, in the interest of truth, or for any other good cause, she was bound to make?

The only thing, therefore, as it seems to us, which we are called on to examine, is the value of Lady Byron's testimony as reported by Mrs. Stowe. This testimony is furnished in the new volume much more fully than in the article, and, though Mrs. Stowe tells her story somewhat differently in the volume, more importance has been attached to this circumstance by some of her critics than we think it merits. The article was evidently not carefully composed, and was put forth rather as a tragic tale than as a chain of reasoning. The last version is the only one we need consider. According to this, Lady Byron, knowing what the habits of young men in fashionable life in London were at the beginning of this century, and knowing that Byron was one of them, was, after two years of doubt and delay, and great admiration for the poet, induced by the beauty of his correspondence to marry him. Finding him gloomy and depressed during his engagement, she thought perhaps he did not feel sure of his feelings, and offered to release him, whereupon he fainted away. This circumstance derives its importance simply from the construction which Lady Byron, looking at it "in the light of subsequent events," put on it in talking to Mrs. Stowe. Her theory was that Byron was engaged in an incestuous intrigue with his sister when he offered her his hand; that the reason of his offering her his hand—supposing him not to be in love with her—was, not as ordinary people might think, the desire of an extravagant young rake, overwhelmed with debt, to get possession of her large fortune, but to secure a cover for his wickedness, and he fainted away simply through "fear of detection." That is, though dreadfully afraid of being found out, he deliberately went to work to bring to the house where this guilty intrigue was going on, the one person in the world from whom its concealment was impossible—a wife; and it appears that from the day of his marriage concealment was the last thing he thought of. He was gloomy and even ferocious with his bride, and began almost immediately to preach to her the gospel of "free love," as if to put her on the lookout for the abominations of her new home, and finally, before very long, proceeded to extremities in her immediate presence, and made insulting avowals, which sent her to her chamber and to her knees to pray for himself and his paramour. How he could have expected "marriage to cover this abyss of infamy," and why he needed a wife "to be the cloak or accomplice of his infamy," Mrs. Stowe does not explain, and apparently neither did Lady Byron. Had the partner of his alleged guilt been any other woman, it would be easy to understand; but his sister could have lived with him without exciting scandal, and his remaining unmarried was an essential condition of concealment. A wife could not appear on the scene except as a detective.

All this is extraordinary; but it is not so extraordinary as the part Mrs. Leigh is made to play in the affair. This lady was not brilliant nor handsome, but she seems to have been good enough to win the esteem of Lady Byron and retain it until after her separation from her husband. During their married life she remained in the house with them, and was the object of criminal attentions on the part of her brother, even in his wife's presence. To these it does not appear she ever made any particular objection, although they naturally filled Lady Byron with horror, and although Lord Byron made no secret of their meaning, and tried to prove their legitimacy by a series of elaborate arguments, some moral and some physiological; and Mrs. Leigh's passiveness in the matter, instead of striking Lady Byron as something astounding and revolting, she apparently considered quite natural. Mrs. Leigh, too, "though not distinguished for genius or talent of any kind," a "poor woman," and "weak, relatively to him," succeeded, it appears, in satisfying Lady Byron that this beastly behavior on the part of Lord Byron was the result of insanity, and that there was not only nothing improper, but something highly praiseworthy in his sister remaining within his reach and exposed to it, for the sake of his wife. The arrangement of the household as it then stood, according to this story, was more extraordinary than anything ever conjured up by the imagination of the foulest romance-writer. It is difficult to say which of the two women—the wife or sister—who consented to remain shut up with this disgusting lunatic, was most worthy of reprobation.

It appears, however, that, even after this awful experience, Lady Byron did not want to separate from him, and was actually turned out of the house by him, leaving his sister behind; but though she knew that this sister was every day and night exposed to the assaults of this man, whose wickedness she felt bound, for the honor of human nature, to ascribe to mental derangement, she was so delighted at the thought of her remaining with him alone, that she wrote to her after the separation to say "that it was her great comfort that she was still in Piccadilly"—that is, in his house. This expression of satisfaction did not form part of Lady Byron's narrative to Mrs. Stowe, but it throws light on it. It is satisfactory to know that Mrs. Leigh "afterwards repented, and became a truly good woman." Her repentance we can readily understand; but her "becoming truly good" must have been a very troublesome process. This strange story was not, however, for the first time told by Lady Byron to Mrs. Stowe. There were rumors of it afloat in London society from a very early period, but Lady Byron, in her latter years, appears to have told it somewhat indiscriminately. Mrs. Stowe had heard the main fact before Lady Byron told it to her, the announcement of which to Lady Byron seems to have excited no surprise. We have the evidence of Mr. John Robertson, of Brighton—a relative, we believe, of the late well-known minister—that he knew Lady Byron well, and lived in the same circle; that she had told this story to three other persons, one of them an American, but that they paid no attention to it, because towards the close of her life she was in the habit of making serious charges against people with whom she had to do, and had been remonstrated with by her friends on the impropriety—to use no stronger term—of the practice. He also testified—and his testimony is corroborated by Mr. William Howitt—that she was given to taking sudden dislikes to people, and, in these fits, was capable of committing acts of gross injustice, while preserving a calm exterior. Of this testimony Mrs. Stowe takes no notice, though we hold it to be most important, and by no means disposed of by Dr. Forbes Winslow's letter to the London Times on monomania. Of course, this letter is worthy of great consideration, but it hardly affords any more help than the evidence usually given by medical men about insanity before courts of justice. We may add that Dr. Lushington's and Sir Samuel Romilly's decision does not help Mrs. Stowe's theory of the case as much as she appears to think, inasmuch as it is no secret that the opinion current amongst the English bar, and held, we have been informed, for good reasons, by Mr. Crabbe Robinson, was, that incest was not the offence on which Dr. Lushington's opinion was taken, but another equally unpardonable. The loving letters to Mrs. Leigh from Lady Byron, after the separation, Mrs. Stowe meets simply by a hypothesis of her own, that they must have been written while Lady Byron still supposed her husband insane and her sister-in-law an unwilling victim.

We may add, in conclusion, that some of Lady Byron's reasons for making the revelation—such as her supposition that Byron himself, from his place in the other world, seeing the mischief his influence was doing, must wish to have himself exposed—were of themselves indications that there was a weak point in her mental organization, and ought to have put Mrs. Stowe on her guard, or at least led her to make careful enquiry amongst persons of sound judgment, who were on terms of frequent intercourse with Lady Byron, and did not regard her, like the two ladies who were with her at the time the story was told, with "a sort of worship." But we confess we have no theory to offer in place of the one we are rejecting, and happily we are not bound to offer one. It is enough for us that the case is not proved, and that it is a kind of case which, unless provable beyond the shadow of doubt, ought never to have been touched upon. The result of the attempt in the present case is its best condemnation. Not one person in a hundred thousand has been convinced by Mrs. Stowe's arguments; the dying interest in Byron has been revived; the sale of his works has been greatly stimulated; the name of a woman hitherto unknown to fame, or only known for good, has been foully besmirched, and her descendants covered with shame; and the public of England and America plunged, during six months, into the discussion of a revolting and nameless crime; Lady Byron has been exposed to injurious suspicions; Mrs. Stowe's own influence shaken; and "the truth," for which she believes herself to have been contending, is not triumphant, or anything like it.

FRENCH WOMEN.

PARIS, December 24, 1869.

IT is hard to imagine a situation more confused than the present one here. There is no ground, morally speaking, under one's feet—no ground of any kind, political, religious, or social.

Politically, it is felt that liberal tendencies and creeds are in the air; that they, so to say, pervade the atmosphere, and are involuntarily inhaled by each man as he breathes and lives. Yet the outward, palpable form of all this liberality of opinion is more wanting than ever; nay, there is obviously hostility towards it in the minds of those who still govern.

Religiously, there is light breaking in on all sides, and the men of any importance, as believing thinkers, are all ranged in the body of the so-called Liberal Catholics. But the more it becomes evident that faith must be free, or degrade itself into idolatry, the narrower grows the formula into which Rome seeks to bind all really pious and elevated spirits. The attitude assumed by mere material force—by stupid brute power—is one and the same in Paris politically and in Rome religiously. In both, there is a latent feeling that the time for applying their dogmas is past; but in both there is a hankering after the impossible—a wild desire to resuscitate that which is for ever extinct.

Thus far, then, politically and religiously. But, socially, how stands it? This is so completely a different case that the very instruments that are working in one sense in the two first directions, are working in the sense diametrically opposite in the third. They are, as it were, undermining with their feet the superstructures they are endeavoring to raise with their hands. They say to people: You shall subject your intellect to the superior ecclesiastical authority, and your will and activity to the superior political one—but (now, mark this well!)—but you shall socially spurn all the trammels that have ever been placed over the complete and entire independence of the individual. Respect you shall know no more. If you are a wife, you shall not look up to your husband, or guard the purity of his name as befits a pure matron; if you are a son, you shall have no reverence for your father, but shall despise his advice as that of an old "ganache." So long as materially, positively, literally, you avoid crime, you shall be reputed innocent. Within that limit you may trifle with the most sacred things. You may trifle with the honor of your name or with honesty and uprightness of all kinds. So long as you do not steal, you shall be said to be of decided probity; so long as you do not commit adultery, you shall be esteemed pure. But what you shall venerate and bow down to humbly—and enthusiastically—is wealth, no matter how acquired.

The law-givers, and example-givers, and philosophers of our day do not see that these things are incompatible, and that they must choose between them. If men and women are to be so capable of submission in the highest of all regions—faith—that they can receive blindly the decrees of one recently self-constituted judge, you scarcely fit them for this docility by emancipating them rudely from every other check; and, if you try to educate youth according to what you term modern notions, you will find it difficult to crush them later into the most antiquated shape of subjection. However, such now, in this country, are the two elements at war. The strongest and worst influence is evident upon women. The large portion of men are, more or less, even in Latin nations, brought into contact from childhood with the realities of life, and, therefore, whatever the fictions of their instructors, truth somehow is busy with them from their cradle upwards. A man cannot be a soldier or a sailor, or a doctor or a shopkeeper, or, for the matter of that, a private gentleman, without in some degree affronting the mass of the moral atmosphere which is formed by the collective thought of the public at large. He may choose to fight against it, but he must acknowledge its existence—must take it into account. But a woman need not ever submit to this healthier air. She may be thoroughly brought up in a hothouse, trained the wrong way, and, when the world is brought to bear upon her, and she upon it, she may be all false, which it is next to impossible for a man to be, unless you have succeeded in making him quite an idiot—in which case, as far as society goes, he carries his own antidote about with him.

There perhaps never was an epoch at which education in France was so thoroughly un-French as it is now. The fault of Frenchwomen during long ages has been pedantry. In even the Middle Ages they were easily disputatious and "blue;" from the Fronde to the Restoration they preserved the qualities and defects of their mental Adam and Eve—M. de la Rochefoucauld and Madame de Rambouillet; they were full of wit and refinement, critical to excess, but placing intellect above everything else, and gaining from that a certain elevation of thought that, upon trying occasions, stood them in good stead. As they were the most cultivated women in the world, so was their taste the most refined, and this showed itself in every detail: in their dress and manners, and in the internal arrangements of their dwellings. But, as it is impossible to develop equally two such forces as the heart and the brain, the women of France, over-developed on the side of the latter, were singularly deficient on that of the former. Be their sins on their own heads! There never, perhaps, existed a Frenchwoman who need have erred. Sentimental weakness is not hers; but hence that immense superiority which belongs to the Frenchwoman almost exclusively, and is so little known abroad as her great virtue. I allude to her genius for administration; to her extraordinary capacity for business, and for whatsoever regards calculation. The Frenchwoman is by nature (or, by the nature which centuries of a certain education have endowed her with) the first housekeeper in the world. Be it great or be it small, the sphere in which she reigns—be it a kingdom or a back shop—her administrative qualities show themselves equally strong. She "organizes" down every obstacle, "administers" every person, first of all her husband, and mostly dies leaving considerable savings. In this line the Frenchwoman is naturally great. But this holds together with many other things which are of the past. Since the Second Empire, great pains have been taken to destroy the national type of the French woman, and you do not perhaps know to what an extent your example in America is invoked to help the transformation. Somehow or other, the pure British female, in spite of all literary efforts in her favor, never made any converts in this country. In spite of Ossian and Walter Scott, and a host of others, "la Miss Anglaise" remained a mark for ridicule; and probably the reason was that, whatever her merits, she dressed ill. But with your "girls" the case is quite different. Both women and maidens from the "States" dress beautifully, and consequently the Parisian consents to admit them as examples. Permit me to say—with all the respect with which whatever is great in your country inspires me—that this example has not been a beneficial one. When young American women and girls come here to Paris, they seem purposely to avoid letting their better qualities be seen—they hide even their acquirements, except music only (for obvious reasons), and "out-Herod Herod" as far as "cocodetterie" goes. How many could I name—and whom some of those who read this will name with regret—how many, I hope in reality, innocent girls, accomplished even, and fit for better things, who have made themselves notorious here for the outrageous fastness of their manners, their dress, their flirtations, and their language; and who, being estimated erroneously, have served as models for native unseemlinesses, at which they hardly perhaps guessed!

During the Emperor's stay at Compiègne this year (in the absence of the Empress), the tone was one not befitting the presence of young girls. Yet, as the Emperor and his entourage wished for "young girls to amuse the Prince Imperial," Americans were invited; and, it is said, some were there who went without their mother's guardianship, and some whose mothers were only invited at the eleventh hour! "Do they know where and to whom they are going?" was the outcry of respectable men, both among French and Americans. I do not accuse or judge; I merely state facts that the public judges—mis-judges, perhaps. But I do repeat that, for the fast tendencies of the modern Parisian woman, your countrywomen are somewhat to blame. On the one hand, rich imperial democrats (who fancy themselves such), and to whom gold has come in a day, say, "Well, these seem to be the ways of the women and girls of the great nation of the future; let us copy them. They don't suit us, or in fact please us; but never mind, let us copy them." On the other hand, severer moralists and thinkers, who know the worth of America, turn aside sadly, and say, "Is this truly the feminine civilization of the transatlantic world? Whence, then, does it draw its Longfellows and Peabodys? And, in such a world, if it be thus, who appreciates and honors them?" The truth is that, from various causes, the education given within the last fifteen years to women in France (in all classes) is one which tends to destroy the Frenchwoman such as, with her qualities and defects, she has been for many centuries, and predominated in the vast, slow, gradual operation of the modification and expression of the national thought and character. I believe it is a moment of transition, for fast frivolity is not a natural tendency of the practical, unpoetical daughter of Gaul; and, however in a certain class she may play to perfection the rôle of a cocotte, she is too logical to be long incarnate in that of a cocodette.

Correspondence.

THE NEW YORK PLAN OF PERSONAL REPRESENTATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your article on Personal Representation, you object to the "New York Plan" on the ground that it rests upon the "theory of delegation."

Now, the whole gist of the New York plan is to give to the legislator who has received fifty thousand votes five times as much weight in the Legislature as a member who has received ten thousand votes only; and that every single elector shall have a representative in the Legislature for whom he has voted either directly or indirectly. All the other features of the plan as proposed are subsidiary and open to modification. But, taking the plan just in the shape proposed by the New York Personal Representation Society, I fail to see how it can be said to be based upon the "theory of delegation" in any peculiar sense, or in any greater degree than other systems of representation. Under any system whatever, citizens must choose their representatives in view of the political situation as it presents itself to them at the time; so that, whatever plan we may adopt, we should not escape the difficulty you mention, that "the power of members of Congress upon the issues of to-day would be proportioned to their position upon the dead issues of two years ago."

This difficulty, which you imply to be a special objection to the New York plan, is an equal objection to our existing system, as you show by your illustration in the case of our present Congress. In fact, it is one of the necessary weaknesses of any plan of representation; but I claim that the New York plan avoids the difficulty at least as successfully as any other system, since it secures to every elector the largest liberty of choice, and thus provides a means by which those of them who are intelligent may give their votes to such persons as they may deem best adapted by general character for the office of legislators, instead of being forced (as at present) to vote for one of two men who are nominated solely with reference to the transient issues of the moment, and as between whom a non-partisan generally finds his choice governed only by the question of which is the least objectionable.

Toward the close of your article, you say that "the New York plan, if modified by confining the votes of members to the round numbers, and restricting that method of voting to questions where the ayes and noes are called, might work well." The latter feature, which you thus suggest as a modification, has always been a part of the plan as proposed. As for the former suggestion, it was considered by the Society, but they thought that it could make no practical difference (in the comparatively few cases where yeas and nays are taken) whether members voted according to the number of electoral units or according to the number of electoral hundreds which they might represent.

The Chicago Republican plan seems to me far worse than our present system of representation. Under our present plan, citizens have at least the poor privilege of being able to defeat the worst of the two candidates whom the politicians nominate; but the Republican system would ensure the election of both the caucus candidates, however objectionable. It would remove the sole remaining check upon the tyranny of the wire-pullers. The vice thus pointed out in this plan is common to all systems which aim at minority representation, as distinguished from personal representation. Even Mr. Hare's scheme possesses this fault (though in so slight a degree that to point it out may seem like hypercriticism); but even in his system personal representation is not complete unless the voter shall so give his vote that it may be counted as one of a quota. The New York plan is the only project ever proposed which enables every voter to cast his ballot wholly without reference to any caucus or combination whatever, and without any risk of throwing away his vote. The friends of the plan claim this as its crowning excellence; and they are puzzled to find that this distinguishing feature of their plan is so generally overlooked by the advocates of representative reform.

I will only add that the New York plan can be easily adapted to the election of a Legislature on the quota system, if an unvarying number of Representatives is deemed desirable; and that its essential features could be retained in the election of members of Congress, in all States choosing more than one member. In either case it would possess demonstrable advantages over any other system—even that of Mr. Hare, which (leaving out of view its alleged complexity of detail) is less thorough than the New York plan in the essential feature of securing a real personal representation to every voter.

One of the New York Personal Representation Society.

EQUITABLE REPRESENTATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I beg to protest against your dismissing Mr. Hare's scheme of representation from consideration on the ground that it is "too complicated for our community." It must be admitted that Mr. Hare's own statement of his system, encumbered as it is with special provisions to meet the special prejudices of English electors, makes it seem very complicated and difficult to understand. But the main principle is easily intelligible, and the machinery needed to carry it out simple enough. Our own community, accustomed to the detail of political work, would have not the slightest difficulty in comprehending and running the machine, if the politicians could only be induced to set it up and to lend a friendly hand to start it. The part each man would have to perform in signifying his preferences among the names on a given list, scratching such as he disapproved and adding such as he chose to add, is not above the capacity of the ordinary American elector. Those who are too stupid or careless to do it for themselves, could get their friends to do it for them; an office, however, in which political friends, who must exercise such functions under any system so long as there are careless and stupid voters, would find much fewer chances for mischief than in the enjoyment of their present opportunities. The method of counting and sorting the votes, though not so easy to explain in a single sentence, would explain and justify itself on trial. A single experiment, conducted on a scale of sufficient magnitude, would probably show that the difficulties of administration have been immensely overrated. It does not appear that, in the limited trial the principle had in Denmark ten years ago, any difficulty was found either in working the scheme or in understanding it. It would be well if the Illinois reformers would try the experiment for themselves in their own convention, and nominate some of their committees by Mr. Hare's method. It would be found that there is no practical difficulty in the problem. Solvitur ambulando.

Of course, the system would be harder to work on a very large scale, and there are limits beyond which it would not be practicable to extend it. It would be impossible, for instance, to choose the whole House of Representatives on a single ticket by vote of the whole United States. But there is no reason why the half-dozen members of Congress, more or less, who form the delegation from any one State, should not be chosen in this way; and a hundred good reasons why they should be. Something might be gained in convenience, and nothing lost in principle, by dividing the large States, like New York and Pennsylvania, into two or three districts, each returning eight or ten members. In the same way in State elections, which is the problem in Illinois, each county might act by itself, or two or three counties together, as might seem most convenient.

Two things about this system ought not to be forgotten. First, it embodies a scheme of nomination as well as of election, thus striking at the root of all our trouble. So long as the people outside of politics have no fair chance in naming the candidates, there is only a half reform. Secondly, while all other schemes profess to be mere palliations, ensuring, in spite of avowed imperfections, a measure of reform, Mr. Hare's plan claims to be theoretically perfect. It is in its provisions, as you say, "most complete and equitable;" and I believe this has never been contested. The only objections that have ever been urged against it with any success have been that it is impracticably complicated. The point can only be decided by experiment. It may prove upon trial that this is so; but until it has been so proved, those who believe the objection to be unfounded must protest against its being taken for granted. W.

Boston, December 31, 1869.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce as nearly ready "The Code of Health of the School of Salernum," translated from the Latin, with an historical introduction and appendix, by Prof. John Ordonaux, of the Law School of Columbia College. This poem is famous as one of the landmarks in medical history, rather than in medical science, and, having had the least possible value for the health of any generation that has risen since it was first composed, it long ago became merely a literary curiosity. Lenormant's "Student's Manual of Oriental History" will also shortly appear. Of works in press, besides two or three novels, the following are most noteworthy: "The London Friends' Meetings, being a history of the rise of the Society of Friends in London, with various accounts of the meeting-houses, burial-grounds, etc.," by Wm. Beck and T. Frederick Boll; "School History of New Jersey, from the earliest settlements to the present time," by J. R. Sypher and E. A. Apgar—that is to say, a history for schools and not of schools, but also designed for families and libraries, and, if well done, likely to raise the State in the estimation of non-residents; "A Hand-book of Reference and Quotation," an alphabetical arrangement of mottoes and aphorisms from Shakespeare, "with a copious index of words and ideas;" and, finally, the two concluding volumes of Allibone's "Dictionary of English Literature."——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "A Treatise on the Christian Doctrine of Marriage," by the late Hugh Davy Evans, LL.D., formerly lecturer on history and civil and ecclesiastical law in the College of St. James, Maryland. The recent discussions on the subject which this work passes in review, will probably secure for it attention independently of the reputation which the author has left behind him. The same publishers give notice of their intention to remove in March from the Broome Street knot of book-houses to the uptown group, in Astor Place (No. 13) and Eighth Street—a change which, as retailers, they will undoubtedly profit by.

—The Young Men's Christian Associations of this country cannot in all things be judged as one body, since much depends on their local management and enlightenment; but the one particular social problem which they have undertaken to solve—the rescue of young men from the temptations of city life—reflects credit upon them all. The nearly seven hundred associations of the United States and Canada now meet in annual convention and provide for community of action, and they have just converted their quarterly journal into a quarto of twenty-four pages, called the Association Monthly, the first number of which, for January, has suggested the foregoing remarks. This periodical is naturally published in this city, where the greatest need of the associations exists, and which has an organization strong enough to erect a building of its own, the size and beauty of which are known to most of our citizens. It cost, the Monthly informs us, including the land, nearly half a million of dollars, and lacks but twenty thousand dollars of being paid for. This last sum, it is hoped, will be soon obtained, and the present mode of raising it is the course of four lectures to be given by Professor Doremus—on the history of creation—for which the outlay will be considerable, but likely to be more than returned into the treasury of the Association. The building on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street has, besides the usual reading-room, a gymnasium and a bowling-alley, and in its appointments offers a powerful counter-attraction to places of evil resort; but it ought to have a coffee-room also, or restaurant.

—Information has reached us which may serve as a sequel to our recent article on "Pennsylvania Dutch." As announced, the annual meeting of the German Press Association of Pennsylvania was held on the 30th of December, at Philadelphia, and it was there stated that during the last few months the German element in the State had made considerable progress. In several of the public schools instruction in German has been introduced by popular vote—for example, in all the grammar-schools of Allentown. The Association proposes to agitate the matter still further, and their proposition to make German instruction obligatory in all the public schools will be recommended by the State Superintendent, in his report to the Legislature, as an amendment to the school laws. Among the obstacles found to impede the furtherance of this project are the indifference of the German population towards the German language and literature, want of efficient German-English teachers, and insufficient use of the existing means of instruction. The prime cause of indifference is that mentioned in our previous article. The second obstacle is accounted for by the statement that of the students of the State normal schools hardly one-tenth study the German language; while the third is found in the notion, often entertained and expressed by Anglo-Americans, that one language ought to prevail in the country, and that several languages cannot exist advantageously together; thus overlooking the value of the comparative study of languages for intellectual training. A number of old German publications, printed in Pennsylvania, were laid before the meeting with interesting comments. While the first English Bible printed in the United States was not published till 1782, twelve years after an unsuccessful attempt had been made in that direction, a German bookseller, Christoph Sauer, of Philadelphia, had already published in 1743 a German Bible, followed by two other editions in 1763 and 1776 respectively. Up to the present time eleven German editions of the Bible have been manufactured in America. Sauer was, however, not the first to print German in this country. Before him, Benjamin Franklin had printed German books, but in Roman type.

—To their previous debts to Mr. Henry Morley, students may now add another of some magnitude: he has just published a set of "Tables," which will be found useful to almost all writers and readers who have to do with English literature. Consulting it, one may readily learn the titles of the works of any prominent English, Scotch, or Irish author; the time when each work of such an author was first published; the year of his birth and of his death; who were his contemporaries; what books, unacknowledged or of unknown authorship, made their appearance in Great Britain and Ireland during his life; what works of distinguished authors of other European countries were published, and what great historical events more or less nearly affecting literature occurred in his time, in Europe, Asia, and America; to what school any writer belonged; with what other writer, as a co-laborer, he was connected; what important books have been written about him since his death. In short, it is a valuable skeleton history of the literature of the British Islands, and, also, it is of me small value as a record of the foreign literature, other than American, which has exercised influence upon British authors. These tables—which may be bought separately or in a bound volume—make a book of about the size of a school atlas. As the volume lies open, we have before us a folio, ruled across both pages with some forty or fifty lines, each of which marks the end of a period of two years. At the left and right hand of the folio is a perpendicular line of figures marking the years; and just beside this line, and also perpendicular, are words telling what monarch reigned during the lives of the men whose books are mentioned on the horizontal lines. Up and down each page of the folio go black lines—a name at the top of each—beginning at the horizontal line that tells the year of an author's birth, and ending at the line that tells the year of his death. Across this black line of his life are written, at the right places, the titles of his works; and these are written in red letters. By means easily intelligible, numerous facts in the history of literature, which are not principal, but which are worth bearing in mind, are indicated in the tables. Thus, the "Lyrical Ballads," of which Wordsworth wrote a part, and Coleridge a part less important—less important so far as concerned the filling of pages, and so far as concerned their immediate influence on writers of poetry—are put down under the name of Wordsworth, but an arched red line here connects Wordsworth and Coleridge. Again, anonymous works are set down on the horizontal line marking the years when they appeared, but between the perpendicular lines representing the lives of writers—unless strong suspicion of his being the author of such a work attaches to some writer, in which case the first letters of its title are placed upon the line appropriated to him, or very near it.

—That there should be omissions and errors in tables like these was of course a thing to be expected; and that there are not a few such, most persons who have examined the volume have probably discovered. Never does any one man do such work perfectly, however well he may do it, and however much gratitude may be due to him and given to him. But whosoever holds it for true and well proved that Master Nicholas Udall was the father of English comedy and wrote Roister Doister, and whosoever wants to see "The Newcomes" put down among the rest of Thackeray's works; and whosoever is angered because "Foul Play" is not credited to Mr. Reade and Mr. Boucicault, may easily supply all such omissions, and make all necessary corrections. The tables are so prepared that changes and additions may be made without much trouble. Titles may be put in; there is room for new authors; remarks may be jotted down; in short, the book may be made over. For instance, any one making a special study of any period in English literary history, and who wants for reference a list of books and authors too obscure for mention in Mr. Morley's more general list, may very easily interleave with these pages pages of his own, made on the same simple plan. But the general student of our literature will find that what Mr. Morley has done for him is a very great and satisfactory help; and any student whatever will gladly acknowledge that what Mr. Morley has here done for him is much, and is well done. "Our" literature, we say, meaning, for the moment, the English literature written in the British Islands. Mr. Morley takes the pains to give us Miss Adelaide Anne Procter, and Henry Kingsley, and Mr. Gerald Massey, and Mr. F. D. Maurice, and a hundred more authors British-born who are not important, nor interesting, nor characteristic of their age; but if any one wants to know about Edwards, or Franklin, or Hawthorne, or Emerson, or Lowell, or Longfellow, he must go elsewhere than to Mr. Morley's tables. There he would not discover that now for some time our better poets—and somewhat better poems—have been produced in the American parts of our Greater Britain, and not on the other side of the water; nor that Mr. Cooper as well as Mrs. Anna Maria Hall has written novels; nor that Mr. Parkman, no less than Mr. Smollett and Tommy Moore, has done something in history; nor that Mr. Hawthorne as well as Mr. Disraeli has tried romances; nor that Mr. Marsh and Mr. Whitney have published works in linguistics which a majority of us would find it good to read. Perhaps, though, it would be fair to say that the fault which an American reader would find with Mr. Morley would be called out not so much by any deficiency in the tables as by their too great fulness. Many of the later names might, we think, have been omitted.

—The Paris correspondent of the Publishers' Circular was an acquaintance of Sainte-Beuve's, and has recently been relating some reminiscences of the great critic which have more or less of the interest which inheres in all gossip about distinguished men of letters, and some other interest besides. The Empress hated him, it appears; or, at all events, had no marked liking for him; and when—rather late in the day, as Sainte Beuve thought—an invitation to Compiègne was given him, he was not once honored by being asked to Eugénie's "afternoons," which are parties of her favored guests who meet her for three or four hours before dinner. He was not "trusted" by the inner circle of Imperialists—as, indeed, no eminent man of letters is any more than these on their part trust the Empire. Here, at Compiègne, on this occasion, is said to have occurred an incident which—whether or not it makes some revelations as to his literary vanity—certainly exhibits in a favorable light Sainte-Beuve's independence and high spirit. "M. Sainte-Beuve," said the Emperor, taking him aside, "I am gratified to meet you, and to express something of the pleasure your articles in the Moniteur have for years given me." Sainte-Beuve had long been eager for a visit to Compiègne, whither, to his displeasure, many of his less distinguished and younger contemporaries had preceded him; but he flushed at this speech, and said in reply, "Your Majesty probably means to say that my articles in the Moniteur had given you pleasure." During the two years then just passed it was in the Constitutionnel that Sainte-Beuve had been writing, and he was too nettled at the Emperor's ignorance and pretence of knowledge to refrain from administering a rebuke. We may imagine that Napoleon made genuine efforts at retrieving a blunder disgraceful to him in his character of educated Parisian, and the commission of which was no doubt a source of peculiar regret to a man of his disposition; but the critic was not to be appeased. Indeed, for the matter of that, the genus irritabile was never anywhere more easily to be wounded than to-day in France, where the sensitiveness of men of letters would seem to be such as would be thought absurdly excessive by an American; and American authors are not wanting in degrees of touchiness that are almost childish. The French, too, have in operation a system of mutual compliments between authors which is a cause, as it is an effect, of their being too thin-skinned. It has long been a charge against Sainte-Beuve, for instance, that, for the sake of their "most sweet voices," he would stoop to placate all sorts of writers whom he should have despised. And akin to this fault was a fault he had of speaking very severely, when death had taken them out of the way, of people with whom he had not only been friends, but with whom, in their lifetime, he had exchanged laudations. They count up few of his friends whom he had outlived whom he did not treat with what seemed like undue harshness. But the melancholy fact is, we suppose, that critics ought to have no friends, or else better ones—friends who love faithful wounds, and otherwise put humanity to shame. The correspondent relates that he called on Sainte-Beuve a week or two before his death, and found him lamentably ill—in a room "furnished, like all the rest of the house, in execrable taste"—and reconciled to the thought of speedy death. "I have here an unforgiving enemy," he said, drawing his hand across the part of his body that was the seat of disease, "who has resolved upon my death." The two talked of American matters, and Sainte-Beuve spoke of having not long before received from this side of the water a handsome letter, accompanying a volume containing the essays of his on distinguished Frenchwomen which Miss Preston had translated. The correspondent—a little unnecessarily, though the book was not exceedingly well translated—said, "O M. Sainte-Beuve! blunted as you are to praise, you cannot receive any pleasure from such a book and such a letter." To this Sainte-Beuve replied with earnestness that it gave him very great pleasure to find that he was liked in this country, and he went on to say that he was highly gratified when Mr. Bigelow—"your minister here (a literary man of considerable merit, is he not?)"—applied to him on behalf of a gentleman whose name the critic pronounced so very badly that the correspondent could not make it out, "to contribute to their magazine"—which, we take it, was Putnam's. Then he went into another room, and, to prove that he was not ignorant of American literature, brought out an armful of American books, the titles of which our careless correspondent omits to detail. Were they presentation copies, we wonder? But, so far as concerns that, Sainte-Beuve's curiosity was great, and he was a very enquiring and various reader.

ART.

The Third Exhibition of the Fine Arts as applied to Industry.—"L'Union Centrale des Beaux Arts appliqués à l'Industrie" is the awkward-seeming name of the association which has recently held, at Paris, its third annual exhibition. The chief purpose of these exhibitions is the display of modern decorative art, such as artistically designed jewelry, bronze, porcelain, glassware, paper-hangings, furniture, and the like. There were exhibited magnificent specimens of that "painted tapestry," or stuff for hangings painted in imitation of tapestry—a new, or, rather, a revived manufacture, according to a rediscovered process. Pieces of this fabric have been imported into America at different times during the past two or three years; but the demand for it is naturally small, as our wealthy householders have scarcely begun to care for richly decorated interiors. The enamelled jewelry in imitation of Japanese work, the bronze enamelled in imitation of ancient cloisonné enamel, the stamped and richly colored and gilded wall-paper in imitation of ancient stamped leather, and the "modern majolica," or enamelled and painted earthenware—of each of which "industries" a splendid display was made at the Exposition—are somewhat known to those persons in New York who watch the importations of Marcotte & Co., Tiffany & Co., and other houses. But, as a general thing, the most admirable specimens of any decorative work of these or other kinds are avoided by the importers into this country, and this not merely because of the high cost of the best pieces. The best pieces do not always cost the most. But it is always assumed by those who buy for this market that the best designed work will not "take" well in this country. The difference between the importers is, it is true, very great in this respect, one house offering a vastly better chosen stock than another, and this for season after season; but the "classical" bronzes of Barbadienne, and those of Mr. Guichard's painted tapestries that are copied from high-class originals, and, generally, works addressed to amateurs as distinguished from the crowd of buyers of fashionable articles, are carefully avoided by our caterers. They ought to know best; but it is certain that great success has rewarded those dealers who have ventured something on the good taste of people this side the water. It is fair to say that the largest dealers are not the most backward, and yet it is the conviction of many who watch these tendencies closely that a little more confidence in their customers here would reward them more often than it would deceive them.

—In connection with this matter, the modern Venetian glass lately imported by Tiffany & Co. deserves mention. It seems to make against our theory that the public here can be trusted a little way to like and to buy what is good, that these beautiful pieces of glassware have not been sold as fast as one would have supposed. Of course, as long as the taste for cut glass was alone in vogue, anything more rational and tasteful would be disregarded; but an active demand exists in Europe for thin moulded and blown glass of all kinds. And in this country, also, bubble-like wine-glasses and egg-shell decanters sell readily, and would sell much more readily if our over-conservative dealers would import them. The modern glass of Murano, from Dr. Salviati's factory, of course includes no cut glass whatever. Glass is a very ductile and tenacious metal when hot, and the most fantastical and the most graceful forms and the most brilliant colors can be produced in it at pleasure and at small cost: it follows that the rational thing to do is to mould it and color it while hot, and not to cut it at great expense when cold, and hard, and brittle. It is in this way that the Murano work is done. The colored, the gold-powdered, and filigree glass is as brilliant, perhaps, as the famous Venice glass of four hundred years ago. It is not equally likely that the exquisite grace of the old forms is preserved in the modern work. So far as our observation of the modern glass has gone, it is inferior to the ancient in this respect.

—In connection with the Paris Exhibition of the Fine Arts applied to Industry a superb loan collection of Oriental art was formed—perhaps the finest that has been brought together. It seems from all accounts—we have not yet received the catalogue raisonné—to have been singularly complete, doing full justice to and fully representing the great departments of porcelain, faïence, bronze, enamel, and glass, and the only less important ones of lacquer, carving in stone and ivory, and embroidery. Chinese, Japanese, Indian, Siamese, Persian—all Oriental styles were there. The classification was careful and accurate, made in the light of the most thorough modern criticism. One thing was done which it was well to do: the influence of the Oriental arts over Europe was shown by a special collection of such Moresque, Spanish, Byzantine, and Italian works of industrial art as reflect the Oriental style of design. To trace through these the influence of the East upon all the art of Europe is a most curious and interesting study, but possible only in a slow and tentative way except when such a collection as this is brought together. Another curious collection was that showing the reflex influence of Europe upon the East—that is to say, the Eastern treatment of subjects furnished by Europe, particularly coats of arms, crests and mottoes, and stories from European literature.

—It is a rather remarkable coincidence that efforts for the promotion of artistic education in this country, through the establishment of public art-galleries, should be simultaneously made in two of our largest cities. What is doing here in New York we have discussed on another page.

Practical results seem, however, to be promised sooner by the movement which has for some time been carried on very noiselessly in Boston. It seems that a committee of the American Social Science Association—which has had the subject earnestly in mind for upwards of a year—under the chairmanship of Mr. Charles C. Perkins, the well-known writer on Italian art, elaborated a plan for the establishment of a Museum of Art, after the model of the celebrated one at South Kensington, England. His plan was submitted to a number of prominent Bostonians, who approved of it heartily. It so happened that the trustees of the Athenæum were considering at the same time a long-cherished project of providing additional room for the numerous art-treasures of that institution, by either the extension of their present edifice or the erection of a separate one. The immediate occasion for such a step was the bequest of the late Colonel Lawrence of his magnificent collection of mediæval armor to the Athenæum, and the offer of Mrs. Lawrence to give $25,000 additional in money towards suitably providing for the exhibition of the collection. As a new extension of the Athenæum would afford at best but temporary relief from overcrowding, the trustees were seriously inclined to undertake, partly with their own means and partly with expected outside aid, the erection of a building wholly devoted to art, and capable of development into a regular museum of the fine arts. When it was found that two parties—namely, the Art Committee of the Social Science Association and the Trustees of the Athenæum—were moving in the same direction, efforts were made to unite them for a joint pursuit of the common object. And this combination has been happily achieved, with the following result: A committee, consisting of Mr. John H. Lowell, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Athenæum; President Eliot, of Harvard University; W. W. Greenough, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Public Library; President Rogers, of the Institute of Technology; Messrs. Martin Brimmer, C. C. Perkins, B. S. Rotch, H. P. Kidder, Samuel Eliot, and other well-known gentlemen, has been chosen, for the purpose of obtaining from the State Legislature a charter for an Art Association, under whose auspices a Museum of Art is to be established in Boston with as little delay as possible. The plan is to provide an institution that will prove the means of developing a better artistic taste among our people in general, and among our artisans in special. The purpose of the gentlemen who have the enterprise in hand is to make a safe beginning with a building of modest dimensions, which may serve as a central repository for all the works of art now scattered in different public institutions in Boston and vicinity, and shall contain a full collection, such as is found in the South Kensington Museum, of reproductions, in plaster and other materials, of statues, architectural fragments, coins, gems, medals, and inscriptions, and of the best photographs of drawings by the Old Masters. With a view to the probable growth of the proposed museum into one that will in time compare favorably with its European prototypes, it is intended to construct the building so as to render it capable of extension; and we trust that the architectural opportunities which such a design both affords and suggests, will be improved in the interest of people who may never see more than the outside of the museum.

GRAY COLLECTION OF ENGRAVINGS.*

The Gray collection of engravings, bequeathed by the late Francis Calley Gray to Harvard College, is deposited in "Gore Hall," in an alcove of the library of the university. Mr. Louis Thies has general charge of this collection, and has added to it somewhat since its transfer to the college, as there are funds available for this purpose, which also are the bequest of Mr. Gray. The handsome square octavo volume of catalogue which Mr. Thies, assisted by Mr. Ezra Abbot, has published recently, affords a means of judging the collection as a whole. Engravings stored in portfolios need, even more than pictures hung in galleries, full and instructive catalogues. The student cannot pass freely from one to another, examining again what he saw before, and now wishes to compare with something else—even the works of one master, collected in one portfolio, are harder to refer to, backward and forward, than if they were hung on walls or arranged in cases. The catalogue of such a collection must be full enough and systematic enough to tell the student just what he will find by consulting any portfolio—just what portfolios he must consult if he wishes to study such and such works.

Let us say here, that it is very much to be regretted that the collection cannot be displayed in a different manner. Engravings in portfolios cannot be easily studied by any one, and cannot be studied at all by most persons. The precautions necessary to take are greater than those required in other cases. At the Athenæum or the Astor Library, a folio volume—even a heavy and a costly one—can be entrusted to a student of known or assumed good character and definite purpose; he must be warned against tracing from the engravings, and against using ink or color in making notes, except in rare cases. But a portfolio of loose engravings, each print fastened by one edge only to a separate sheet of stiff paper or card-board, cannot be handed to the student at all; it must be turned over for him by an attendant; those only can be entrusted with the portfolio and its contents who are intimately known to the custodian; those, that is to say, for whom he is willing to become responsible. Now, it is not necessary that every print in a collection should be exhibited; the general run of prints may remain in their portfolio limboes; but the principal works of the great masters, and something of every master at all considerable, ought to be offered to the examination of every one who can be induced to spend an hour in the rooms. It is not the only task of teachers, animate or inanimate, to teach those who at all hazards will be taught, who know, in the case before us, what engravings to ask for, and who long for them to the point of seeking them out. In a community like ours, profoundly ignorant of art, containing not hundreds nor scores, nor even dozens of people who know anything of the technical or the artistic side of engraving, but enquiring, diligent, studious, when it has a moment's respite from breadwinning, and beginning to feel that it has not been exploring all the paths to civilization—in such a community every accessible work of art of any importance should be forced upon the notice of all those who can be made to look at it. Young students of art who are in the way of thinking too highly of modern French eaux-fortes, good as these latter often are, should have the chance of seeing what a Rembrandt etching is. Half-a-dozen Dürer prints of fine quality would keep many a too slovenly young sketcher working more resolutely, and conscious of what thorough and unsparing but well-applied and economical work is in a work of art. Moreover, original inventions of great power and beauty, designs that rank among the noblest of nearly all kinds, are to be found in any good collection of engravings. Harvard College, Cambridge, Boston—the United States has no public collection of works of art of high rank; this, or another collection of engravings, would do something, if exhibited, to fill the void. The difficulties in the way of doing this we can imagine; that it ought to be done is not less certain.

The most important part of a collection of engravings is always the work of the peintres-graveurs, the "painter-engravers," the men who have both designed and engraved, or etched, or drawn on the wood-block, the works that go by their names. The preface to the catalogue before us calls attention to the fact that Mr. Gray took an especial interest in the works of these masters, and rightly names Albrecht Dürer as the chief of all original engravers, and Rembrandt of etchers. Dürer and his school, are well represented in the Gray collection, except that there are very few wood-cuts, while much even of their important designing was done in that way. Of course, a collection of engravings may leave out wood-cuts, or may include them; but, as offering facilities for the study of the works of an engraver or a school, the presence or absence of these is to be noted. We know of no reason for supposing that the series of "The Life of the Virgin," and the cut, "The Rhinoceros," were actually engraved in wood by Dürer; the catalogue gives these under his name, and does not give, in that place at least, either the "Great" or the "Little Passion," or any other wood-cuts of Dürer's designing, and does not give under Burgkmair any of the works ascribed sometimes to him and sometimes to Dürer. Considering work on copper alone, Dürer and his contemporaries are well represented; the impressions are generally fine, if not of extraordinary fineness; the choice good. The collection of Rembrandt's etchings it is hard to speak of comparatively; it seems to be ample for purposes of study. Mr. Gray was wise not to make a special point of multiplying "states" of the different etchings. The managers of some great European collections seem to us less temperate in this respect.

Marc Antonio Raimondi is very well represented. In fact, the portfolios of his works are among the strongest parts of the collection. Volpato's works are perhaps as fully displayed, in proportion to their importance. There are a great many and the finest of the works of Raphael Morghen. Müller, the engraver of the Madonna di San Sisto, seems to have secured the especial attention of the collector. Everything of importance by him is in the collection, including several copies of his most renowned work, the one named above. The Edelincks are numerous and fine. On the other hand, many less important names are perhaps disproportionally neglected; thus, three works of Dietrich and three of Chodowiecki are but slight instalments of their works, and Waterloo is poorly represented.

* "Catalogue of the Collection of Engravings bequeathed to Harvard College by Francis Calley Gray. By Louis Thies." Cambridge. 1869.

Modern engravers it may be the fashion to disregard; certainly the time has not come yet for collecting Henriquel-Dupont's and Förster's works with the same care as Raphael Morghen's. But this preference of the old over the new arises, so far as it is rational and sound, from the natural feeling in favor of that which has borne the test of time and criticism. The buyer may feel, also, that he must buy, first of all, the engravings which are growing scarce the most rapidly; for nowadays the prices are rising so steadily and rapidly for all works of art which have been taken up by connoisseurs and collectors, that this consideration must influence every one. We are glad to see that, in spite of all these inevitable tendencies, so many works of François Förster are included in this collection. Richomme, too, can be judged by his works contained in these portfolios. Henriquel-Dupont, however—and, by the way, this name should be catalogued not under D, but under H—Louis Pierre Henriquel-Dupont is represented by only six works, and among them we do not find the great Hemicycle des Beaux Arts, after Paul Delaroche, one of the most masterly engravings, after all is said, that any copyist engraver has produced. The English engravers are neglected. If we grant that their huge mezzotints and mixed-style works, taken from modern pictures of popular subjects, are rather poor material for the collector, and beneath the dignity of any real collection which does not aim at absolute completeness, still there is no reason for the entire absence from the catalogue of the names of Armytage, Britton, William Cooke, Le Keux, John Lewis, and Wallis; and for the almost complete absence of Blake, Goodall, Miller, and Schiavonetti. It is strange to miss Jacquemart altogether; and, indeed, the modern peintres-graveurs are just such men as he, with Blake, Cooke, and Lewis named above, George Cruikshank, and perhaps Whistler. The independent works of these men, designed originally for rendering by etching-needle or burin, are among the most important engravings of modern times, and have something of immortality which will fix them firmly in the galleries of the future.

It is to be noticed also that nothing engraved after Turner, or for which he furnished designs, can be found in this catalogue, so far as the absence of an alphabetical list of painters allows us to judge, except one engraving by Miller. But Turner, apart from his pre-eminent rank as a designer of landscape subject, was in a sense a peintre-graveur himself. The prints of the "Liber Studiorum" were etched by him, and engraved partly by himself and partly by Charles Turner, under his own immediate direction. A set of the "Liber" is about the most valuable addition that any friend of the Gray collection can make to it. Of engravings after Turner enough would be found among any considerable gathering of the works of the English engravers whose names are mentioned above; there are hundreds of them, large and small.

The catalogue, while containing much information drawn from good sources and from original investigation, is uneven. Mr. Gray's wish, stated in the preface, page vii., that the book should be a guide to the student, and supply a gap which has always existed in this department, points to a completeness which we hope subsequent editions will reach. It seems to need a reference index to the portfolios, or else to have after the title of each engraving the number of the portfolio in which it is placed, or both of these aids to the student. An alphabetical list of painters and designers Mr. Thies speaks of as desirable to have in manuscript at the gallery. Added to the volume it would be still more excellent. But there remains the question of cost; and these additions would swell the size of the volume, which is already large, handsomely printed on fine paper, and with very wide margins.

Historical Sketches of the Reign of George Second. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Boston: Littell & Gay. 1869.)—By no means the worst criticism ever made upon the works of the late Lord Macaulay was made, privately, some years since, by an American young gentleman of no great learning, and of limited intellectual power—an accomplished billiard-player, however, and a skilful performer on several stringed instruments—who was just making acquaintance with the celebrated essays—the essays more celebrated once than now. He was driven into doing a reluctant perusal of them because of a necessity laid upon him of writing "an original exercise in English composition," the subject of which had been treated of, he had been led to believe, in one of his lordship's performances. "I say, he'd be the very devil to write themes for a fellow, wouldn't he?" was our young friend's first effort in criticism. His lordship's easy omniscience, and the slash of him, and the glitter, as of cast-iron gilded, of his not very complex rhetorical devices, had completely captivated the perturbed theme-writer, who had long been inured to seeing brief sentences of pity mingled with contempt pencilled down in the margins of his themes when they were returned to him by the instructor. If it were not for the impoliteness of it—the writer of them being a woman—this same criticism might very well be passed upon these "Historical Sketches." Mrs. Oliphant's trick of being philosophic and learned at second and third and fourth-hand would stand her in very good stead if only she were a writer of themes. She makes over into better than ordinary magazine articles most that has been commonly said of a dozen distinguished Englishmen and Englishwomen of a hundred and fifty years ago; writes of Caroline as the queen of George the Second's reign; of Sir Robert Walpole as the minister; of Chesterfield as the man of the world; of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu as the woman of fashion; of Pope as the poet of that day; of John Wesley as "the reformer;" of Anson as "the sailor;" of Berkeley as "the philosopher;" of Hume as "the sceptic;" of Hogarth as "the painter;" of Richardson as "the novelist." Of some of these personages and their characters and works and ways, Mrs. Oliphant has something to say that is at once worth saying and not hackneyed; but usually her remarks are aged, or else they are worth but little attention. What, for example, is the good of giving us a Lord Chesterfield "sad as any prophet, stern as a Roman, patient as a Christian," and "the central actor in a life-long tragedy"? That Chesterfield was a kind and very painstaking father to a rather dull son, who never rose higher in the diplomatic service than to be a sort of a consul at Hamburg, and who was never a light in the world of fashion and of affairs, does not make of his life a deeply pathetic tragedy, in which he stands as the most imposing and most touching figure—a father with an anguished heart. But the magazine writer must do a certain quantity of philosophizing, and so much the better if this is of the "brilliant" kind—that is to say, philosophizing of the kind not done by philosophers. Still, though Mrs. Oliphant's remarks are often feeble and impertinent, and though she is not at all to be recommended as a guide, her book will be found to be worth reading. It gathers up in one volume a deal of knowledge about the men and events of a time which has a peculiar interest and well repays study, but whose history is recorded in a thousand scattered books less read than they are famous, or than they are readable. Possibly it may do more good by sending the reader to its own original sources, than it does harm by filling his mind with views either false or only very doubtfully true, and by confirming him in the notion that every smatterer may teach. No man of sense is an enemy of smattering when the smatterer gets his half-knowledge for his own pleasure. We all must be smatterers, more or less; only a very great ass indeed could nowadays hope to hold all or any large proportionate part of the Pierian spring—which of late has much increased in depth as well as in its other dimensions; and yet for a thousand reasons one may do well to get a bowing and speaking acquaintance with half a million things of which not very much more than the names is known to him. But to set up as a teacher is a different matter from indulging one's self as a learner. Yet hosts of people whose deficiency in wisdom must be greater than one likes to think, else they would make less parade of their other deficiencies, are marching in the same army with Mrs. Oliphant. And each new-comer is a probable recruiting officer. Had it not been for the lecturing of previous lecturers without any adequate knowledge of their subjects, should we to-day have Doctor John Lord organizing innocent Boston ladies into classes which listen agape to his disquisitions on history? That able expositor, whose praises we have recently been reading in some half a dozen newspapers, may very likely this winter be the progenitor of two or three authors who will please the next generation as much as Mr. Abbott or Mr. Headley pleases his.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.*

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
André (Major), The Cow Chace, swd	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)	$0 75
American Horticultural Annual, swd	(Orange Judd & Co.)	0 50
American Agricultural Annual, swd	" " "	0 50
Austen-Leigh (Rev. J. E.), Memoir of Jane Austen	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Barnes (W. H.), The Fortieth U. S. Congress, 2 vols	(Geo. E. Perine)
Comfort (Prof. G. F.), a German Course	(Harper & Bros.)
Edwards (H. S.), Life of Rossini	(Oliver Ditson & Co.)	1 75
Edwards (M. B.), Kitty: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50
Fullerton (Lady G.), Mrs. Gerald's Niece: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 60
French (B. F.), Historical Collections of Louisiana and Florida, New Series	(J. Sabin & Sons)
Grote (G.), History of Greece, Vols. I., II., new ed	(Little, Brown & Co.)	4 00

Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Ernest Linwood: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	$1 75
Lewin (Rev. R. D'C), What is Judaism?	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Littell's Living Age. Vol. XV., Oct.-Dec., 1869	(Littell & Gay)
Mackay (C.), Medora Leigh, swd	(Harper & Bros.)
McGee (T. D'A.), Poems	(D. & J. Sadlier & Co.)
Scott (Sir W.), Waverley	(Little, Brown & Co.)	1 75
Stayman (Prof. J. K.), Flowers and Fossils, and Other Poems	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Tennyson (A.), Poetical Works, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50
Thackeray (W. M.), Book of Snobs, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 50
The Workshop, No. 12, swd	(E. Steiger)	0 50

Fine Arts.

A MUSEUM OF THE FINE ARTS FOR NEW YORK.

WHETHER the right moment has arrived to establish one will depend upon the amount of real desire for it that may be found in the community. That the majority are indifferent to a good thing need not prevent its succeeding, if the minority are zealous in proportion to the smallness of their numbers. Are there persons willing to do their neighbors' work as well as their own? and if so, is their collective strength sufficient for the task? The question whether "the time has come" is to be answered by the answer to those former questions, and not by reference to any widespread popular demand, which it is notorious does not exist. Things proposed for the general good are wonderfully helped when a few persons find out that they cannot longer dispense with them. Does the community want cabs? It may keep on wanting them, until the time comes when a hundred party-going gentlemen conclude that they can't exist without them any longer, and that it will be worth some trouble to have them introduced, or until the time when another, and perhaps smaller, body may conclude that more money can be made by starting the cabs than by selling out to the hack-drivers. The Government will not establish cabs, or museums, or parks, or a free academy, or an inebriate asylum, until the majority of citizens demand it. And what the Government will not establish will remain unestablished until a certain number of people want it badly enough to pay for it, in purse and in person. The time always comes at last when some one man is found willing to do all the needed work, his neighbors' as well as his own, for his own share of the common good.

And in saying that one man must be ready to do his neighbors' work as well as his own, we mean not only that a society or body of men must labor for the community, and to advance what the community refuse to care for, but also that a few individuals must be found who will do most of the work of the society or body of men itself. And this not merely in the sense in which the officers of a society do the society's work; the few must find not only time for the work and a knowledge of routine business, but also and primarily the conception of the thing needed, and the strong sense of its necessity.

On the 23d of last November, a meeting was held in the theatre of the Union League Club to consider the question of forming a museum of fine arts. At this meeting, after speeches and resolutions, a committee of fifty gentlemen was elected to provide for carrying into effect the object of the meeting. This committee met for the first time on the 7th of December, added to their own numbers, and elected a sub-committee of thirteen to report a plan of proceedings. These facts appear from a pamphlet which has reached us entitled "A Metropolitan Art Museum." The steps next in order are, of course, the adoption of a constitution, the election of officers, and the continual enlargement of the committee or association by the election of those citizens who are supposed to be interested in the undertaking.

It seems, from the above-named pamphlet, that some members of the committee hope for the aid of the State or of the city. The cost of the first preparation should be included in the next tax-levy, say these gentlemen, and year by year a sum appropriated sufficient for what promise to be the needs of the year. If this should be done, so much of our above remarks as relate to difficulties in the way have little application. A commission will be appointed, a superintendent chosen by them, his subordinates selected by him under the direction of the commission, time will be taken for judicious consideration, plans for temporary buildings will be made and decided on, purchases will begin to be made in Europe. If this is done, all is well; there can be no doubt that it is in this way that a thoroughly civilized community proceeds, letting the whole community bear the cost of so universal a benefit; a cost, too, which would be a mere nothing to the State, and but small to the city; intelligent men can be got to sit on the commission, and the Governor's—even the present Governor's—appointment can be secured for intelligent men. It has been proved by experience that such a commission can exist, and can carry on an important labor free of jobbery and political scheming. The difficulties in the way will be not such as we have spoken of above, but only in the finding of "experts," competent executive officers, buyers, cataloguers, and custodians.

But if this action of the State cannot be brought about—and we confess that we do not expect to see it within the next twenty-five years—it is then to be considered whether the community includes such persons, who, being both interested in the cause and able to advance it, may have aggregate power enough to establish a museum of art; that is, to raise in the course of a few years some hundreds of thousands of dollars to be spent upon a collection of works of art, and a simple fire-proof building to contain them. And, first, it appears to every one who looks into the matter that very few persons in the land know even what is meant by a Museum of Art. How many in this city at this moment can give to their friends a tolerably clear account of what is contained in any first-rate or any smaller museum abroad? The travelled young lady will tell you that there are so many miles or metres of pictures in the Louvre, and that the rooms in the Pitti are the prettiest, and that she saw such lovely old jewelry in the Green Vaults, and such splendid Egyptian necklaces in the British Museum. And it is doubtful but she may be the best informed upon the subject, of all the people you may have a chance to consult in the course of an average week. It is not to be wondered at nor exclaimed at; but the fact is that the class of amateurs of the esoteric, so to speak, does not exist in America, and that few individuals are to be found who have gained any accurate knowledge upon the fine arts of the past, or even of the present, except so far as one observes the pictures of some friend of his. But, second, without some tolerably extensive knowledge of the subject diffused among this new association, there can be no very ardent desire felt to bring about the proposed result. Without knowing just what to say to the rich man whose contribution they ask for, how can they hope to inspire in him any willingness to give? Rich men give money, generally, to what they understand and have learned to believe in; the college where they were educated or where their sons are studying; to the missionary cause in some special field; to some charitable society whose objects are particularly well known to them; or, if to art at all, to buy some picture of the painter they have learned to admire; not, certainly, to buy the works of artists of whom they have never heard, or porcelain, bronze, and enamel, which they consider as mere toys. So that, if a fervent desire for this museum and a willingness to work for it be needed, as we have seen reason to believe, the first and the all-important step is to inform as thoroughly as possible as many people as possible. It is a delightful and all-absorbing task this society propose to themselves; it is notorious what extravagant enthusiasm art and art collecting are capable of inspiring, but it becomes delightful only as one grows very familiar with it. The interest of the uncritical visitor to a gallery is languid; when he turns upon his more exacting friend with the remark that "he would n't be so particular for the world—losing the enjoyment of so much that he can now enjoy," he is wholly mistaken, and has not the faintest suspicion of the enjoyment possible to an enthusiastic and discriminating love for art, when it can be amply indulged. If a hundred gentlemen talk to-night about an art museum, then separate and go to Europe to study for a year the collections of works of art, when they meet at the end of the year the new discussion will be totally different from the old one, the company will be intent upon reaching a result; humanly speaking, the success of the art museum will be assured.

As this general adjournment to Europe cannot take place, it will be necessary to adopt some other means to disseminate accurate and applicable knowledge of the subject. At the very outset the condition must be filled, that one must work for many, two or three for all. Those members of their body thought most competent must be selected by the association to collect material for, draw up, and print an exhaustive report. It will take a year, and require hard work; information must be collected from every side, the experience of every custodian and director of a museum in Europe must be sought for, the merits and shortcomings of each great gallery pointed out; the distinction must be carefully drawn between that which would instruct and delight as a work of art and that which would only charm the connoisseur of some special branch of handiwork; the questions as to how far the New York Museum should seek large collections of casts, reproductions, etc., and how far it should affect only originals of costly rarity must be carefully considered and answered in all their bearings. Indeed, the subject is very large, and to get it into two hundred pages and yet make it interesting will be a nice bit of jugglery.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1870.

The Week.

For another week Virginia has afforded Congress its main business. The debates in the House, which grew towards the last to be very animated, closed on Friday with the unexpected passage of Mr. Bingham's bill, declaring Virginia entitled to representation in Congress, for the simple reason that she had complied with the requirements of the act providing for her restoration. The Senate debated its own bill till Monday, with a good deal of personality and a great waste of words and time, and then abandoned it incontinently for that of the House, which, as we write, seems likely to pass, though not improbably saddled with an amendment of Mr. Edmunds's, expelling members from the Legislature disqualified by the Fourteenth Amendment. This may amuse or please somebody, but it would leave the essential facts of the Virginia case just as they are. A bill has been introduced looking to Congressional interference with the performances in Tennessee. If it passes, which is very unlikely a job will have beenundertaken in the line of reconstruction which none of this generation will see finished.

The Virginia case is causing no small bitterness and excitement in Congress. General Butler heads the opposition in the House, and is followed by about the same devoted band of Republicans who voted with him last session to cheat the public creditors by taxing the interest on their bonds. When the condition of the various irons he has in the fire in the lower branch will permit it, he transfers himself swiftly to the Senate Chamber, and acts as bottle-holder to Mr. Sumner, whom he sponges and supports between his rounds with the traitorous conservatives who are in that branch of Congress, indulging in their favorite amusement of betraying the good and true. A petition presented last week from loyal Virginians against the admission of the State, and which was, to say the least, peculiar in its terms, led to an encounter of unusual ferocity between Mr. Sumner and Mr. Trumbull, in which "they handled each other without gloves," Mr. Sumner relying a good deal on the argument a gaudio infidelium, and Mr. Trumbull making a dreadful exposure of one C. H. Porter, who, as a persecuted loyalist, has been acting of late as a kind of prompter or attorney to Mr. Sumner in his opposition to the bill. It appeared—we blush as we write it—that Porter was tried by court-martial during the war for having been drunk and disorderly, at Norfolk, for an indefinite period, and also for having while sober abused the United States Government in the grossest terms, and expressed in profane but forcible language his preference for that of Jeff. Davis. He was convicted and punished on both charges. The number of saints like this at the South whom reconstruction will force into either crime or industry, we fear is very large.

The organization of the Legislature in Georgia is proceeding under the superintendence of a military board, the two factions into which the Republican party is now divided being in the wildest state of excitement. Bullock, the provisional Governor, who made the arrangements with General Butler by which the State was put out of the Union, and a new oath concocted for the legislators, is accused of manipulating the reconstruction process with the view of securing his own election to the Senate—which, indeed, his enemies say, was the source of his objection to the old Legislature—and of fraud in so doing, and General Terry has had to call the good man to order. Bryant, another Republican, and Union soldier, and late postmaster at Augusta, heads the opposition to him, and is supported by the whites and moderate Republicans. On the opening day of the reorganization of the Legislature, the Radicals were carrying things with a high hand, and Bryant protested, whereupon he was charged with drawn pistols, his friends "rallied round him," and it seemed likely for some minutes the floor would be dyed with the commingled gore of these two schools of politicians. The Bryant party are filing protests against the whole proceeding as illegal and void, and the whole scene at Atlanta is one of the greatest confusion, from which it is impossible to see what anybody but intriguing politicians can gain anything. The leader of the colored radicals is Alpeoria Bradley, who served, we are glad to say, a tolerably long term in the State Prison.

We have several times said our say in regard to Republican political management in Tennessee during the last five years; and, as our readers know, we have been better able to give our sympathy than our respect to the managers. For years the Unionists of Tennessee were doubtless most sorely tried, and their past miseries were, when they came to legislate, their temptation and their partial excuse; but how little wise they were in their generation the event has proved. Nor does it appear as yet that they have not something more to learn. They are again demanding that Congress should put the State under Federal control, as being threatened with by-and-by having a government not "republican in form." The late Legislature, elected with Senter, was in many of its acts as wise and temperate as if all its members had been born and educated at Mr. Nasby's Confedrit Cross-Roads. Even the wildness of their predecessors was good sense and sound learning compared with much of the legislation of the new Democratic Solons. Among other things that they did was to order the election of a convention which should revise the Constitution—the end in view being to take away from the negroes certain rights which they now enjoy. The election has been held, and, of course, a vast majority of the members of the convention are gentlemen who have never at any time been troubled by any non-Scriptural views in relation to Onesimus. But it seems that in the present Constitution it is ordained that amendments are not to be made by a convention; that each amendment is to be proposed in the Legislature; that then the next Legislature is to submit it to the people; and the next Legislature in session after such submission has been made is to declare the amendment ratified—a part of the State's organic law. So Senator Brownlow is declaring the convention a revolutionary body, asserting that under the new Constitution Tennessee will have a government not republican in form, and is demanding that the United States shall interfere. There is a probability that he will have some supporters. This action that he asks for—if it were possible that Congress should decide it feasible and advisable—would have the effect of making the Tennessee Democrats wait some two or three years before they could accomplish all their desires, or, rather, before the statute-book would afford evidence that they had done so. The difficulty of the case, and of all cases like it, so far as regards the Federal Government, is this—supposing the government of Tennessee to be overturned as "not republican in form," the only government we can substitute for it will be a military government or a government of the minority. What will that be? Moreover, there is no such thing known to American jurisprudence as a "revolutionary body." A body not possessing legal power is simply a public meeting.

The Fifteenth Amendment gets on. Rhode Island, Minnesota, and Mississippi have ratified it during the week along with Kansas; and Ohio has made a beginning with its Senate. The need of it is nowhere more strikingly shown than in the Democratic proposition before the Illinois Constitutional Convention, to insert "white" in the new instrument, and submit the striking out of the word to a separate popular vote—thus, of course, greatly increasing the chance of its being retained.

Mr. Sumner has introduced a financial scheme into the Senate which proposes to issue a series of three loans of $500,000,000 each, at five, four and a half, and four per cent., the first ten-forties, the second fifteen-fifties, and the third twenty-sixties; to enlarge the National Bank circulation to $500,000,000, but cancelling an amount of greenbacks proportionate to the increase, which increase is to be secured by a deposit of the new bonds in the usual manner, and to make greenbacks receivable at par for customs duties whenever the premium on gold shall fall to five per cent. Mr. Sumner's idea is, that the rate of interest and length of these loans would make them acceptable, and enable the Government to offer the holders of the six per cent. bonds their choice of coin or new bonds; and he thinks the proper use of the latter would bring all the United States securities to par, and enable the Government to resume specie payment without difficulty and at once. Mr. Sherman has also introduced a bill for the expansion of the currency to the tune of forty millions. There is little use in commenting on all these measures, brought in from time to time by individual members. The finances of a great nation cannot be managed in this way. Somebody has to take authorized charge of the matter, and be permitted to make the plans. Any other system breeds chaos. It ought to be the Secretary of the Treasury, and he ought to have the means of explaining and defending them before the body which is to adopt or reject them, which he now has not. Or if the work is to be done by the committees, they ought not to be made up, as they are largely, of the attorneys of particular "interests." Nay, connection with an "interest" ought to disqualify a man for a seat on them.

Mr. Commissioner Wells is catching it, but then he catches other people sometimes. Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and heavily interested in iron and coal, made a long attack on him in the House last week, teeming, as usual, with insulting personalities, and the New York Tribune publishes it full length, though it did not dare to publish the report to which it is a reply—one of those pieces of professional dishonesty which make the success of a certain class of newspapers as teachers and guides one of the puzzles of the Christian era. Mr. Kelley, also, we need hardly say, is fully satisfied that Mr. Wells is paid for his report by foreign manufacturers, repeats his assertion of it incessantly, which is nothing very wonderful, considering the kind of mind Mr. Kelley's is; but what is wonderful is, that he does not see the ludicrousness of such things coming from a man who, in defending protection in the legislature, is actually defending his own pocket and that of his personal friends, and makes no secret of it. We do not say that this affects his honesty, or that he does not sincerely believe that the success of his opinions would enure to the national advantage as well as his own; but then is it not surprising that an advocate who is himself in this position should not see the impropriety of impugning his opponent's motives on similar grounds?

One of Mr. Wells's peculiarities is that his explanations and defences are, on the whole, a great deal more unpleasant reading for his enemies than his reports. In the last report, he set down the cost of producing pig-iron in America at $24 to $26 a ton currency; the cost of English or Welsh pig, at $27 12, counting gold at 133, to which have to be added freight, insurance, and other expenses, before it can be delivered in this country. But the average price of American pig during the year 1869 was from $36 to $38, from which Mr. Wells deduces the not unnatural conclusion that the present duty of $9 a ton is unnecessarily high, and has taken from eight to ten dollars a ton out of the pockets of the American people during the past year without necessity, and that $3 a ton duty will give American manufacturers all the protection they need. To which Mr. Kelley replied that Mr. Wells had corruptly erred with regard to the cost of producing American iron, and presented a petition from thirteen prominent Pennsylvania iron manufacturers, begging Congress not to believe the Commissioner, and declaring that the cost of production was over $29 a ton, and calling loudly for the data on which his estimate was based. Whereupon the remorseless Wells produces, as his authorities, Mr. G. T. Lewis, of Tennessee, a "thoroughly experienced iron manufacturer," and endorsed as such by the Pottsville (Penn.) Mining Journal; Professor Waterhouse, of the Washington University, Missouri, reporting under the auspices of the Governor, the St. Louis Board of Trade, and Union Merchants' Exchange; and Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of this city, another great iron manufacturer. There is one joke in the reply, but it is not a bad one. Messrs. Brown, Bonnel & Co., of Youngstown, Ohio, writing to Professor Waterhouse for his report in aid of emigration last year, as to the cost of iron, assured him that "they produced pig-iron at $25 a ton." But when the Commissioner's report appeared, a meeting of iron manufacturers was held in this same Youngstown, Dec. 31, at which it was resolved that Mr. Wells's assertion that the cost of iron "was from $24 to $26 was utterly untrue," and Mr. Joseph H. Brown, of this same firm of Brown, Bonnel & Co., was put on a deputation to go to Washington to lobby against his recommendations. A good memory is apparently as necessary in the iron manufacture as in some other callings. We should add that the Pennsylvania manufacturers refused to give the Commissioner any information whatever, so he was forced to take Mr. Hewitt's testimony that the cheapest place to produce iron in this country was the banks of the Lehigh River. The Tribune takes no notice of this rejoinder. How does Mr. Greeley defend this sort of editing, on grounds of morality? We should really like to know, and ask in a candid spirit.

A correspondent writes to us from Indianapolis, in reply to some of our strictures on the divorce laws of Indiana, alleging that the badness of those laws—which he admits—is not an indication of "the inherent depravity of the citizens," which we never asserted; that the origin of those laws is lost in the night of time, but is supposed to have been either a "desire to encourage immigration, or to have been mixed up with some case of special legislation." If the settlers, however, were not particular about the kind of immigration they attracted, the total abolition of marriage would, we think, have peopled the State far more rapidly than easy divorce. The discredit which, in most parts of the country, now attaches to concubinage, is a source of real discomfort to large numbers of energetic, pushing persons, and if there had been a State in which "the freedom of love" was frankly recognized by law, thirty or forty years ago, we have no doubt it would, by this time, be one of the most populous in the Union. Our correspondent adds, that the main obstacle in the way of reform has, hitherto, been the ordinary dislike of people to change the laws to which they had become accustomed on a matter so delicate as marriage; but public sentiment has been roused, he says, by recent events, and there is now a willingness, as well as determination, to make whatever modifications are necessary to prevent the State being made the sanctuary of matrimonial malefactors and malcontents. Governor Baker promises, in a correspondence with Dr. Lilienthal, the Jewish Rabbi in Cincinnati, to use his best efforts with the Legislature in the coming session in favor of reform.

We hope it will be remembered in the debates that marriage differs from other civil contracts in that it affects the rights of third parties, who are helpless and incompetent to protect themselves—children; that the manner of entering into it and dissolving it affects the family, which is the basis of civil society, and in the preservation and purity of which nearly everything that is good in civil society depends; and that, therefore, the contract of every married couple is, in a certain sense, the concern of every other man and woman in the community; and, lastly, in that, inasmuch as one of its objects is the regulation of a powerful passion, that passion is constantly at work for its dissolution, and that "incompatibility of temper" may be, and we have no doubt is, in nine cases out of ten, a euphemism for satiety and desire of change, and that easy divorce may become, in practice, a cover for the most revolting libertinage, of which women would, wherever they became plenty, be the chief victims.

There are few things of the kind more curious than the difficulty English writers have in grasping the New York Herald. That journal remains to this hour a complete puzzle to them, but a fascinating puzzle, over which no accounts from this side of the water of the decline of its influence prevent them from cudgelling their brains. In fact, they apparently look on it as the organ of a distinct philosophy, to which they are for ever trying to find the key. Its humor they have never comprehended, and apparently never will; indeed, it is doubtful whether, without the local atmosphere, anybody can. When it got up the Miles O'Reilly hoax, and reported the speeches made at the banquet given to that hero, it made General Dix, in discussing the St. Albans raid, claim what he called "the right of hot pursuit"—that is, of following fugitives over the border in unbroken chase—as a recognized rule of international law. The town here was in a roar over the speech, but the Saturday Review gravely tackled the General and made mincemeat of him. It showed that no such right ever existed, that no mention was made of it by text writers, and read him a severe lecture on his unscrupulousness in inventing it; though, considering the nation to which he belonged, one could hardly be surprised at it. The Herald is now engaged in the production of a batch of those profane jokes in which it has always excelled, and the fun of which consists partly in their grotesqueness, and partly in their blasphemy—in the shape of burlesque sermons, with a text taken from the Bible, in its Sunday edition. They are doubtless the composition of a young man with a talent for buffoonery and no particular belief on any subject, and their object is to make a laugh in the bar-rooms. But to our serious contemporary the London Spectator, they are the solemn utterances of a wild and outlandish faith. In its last number it subjects one of them, which shows that New York is to be the holy city of the future, to a careful, though of course contemptuous, examination, as something "formidable," as a "confused and sensational exaggeration of the industrial arts into mighty spiritual powers"—as, in short, a revelation of tendencies "which seem more and more likely to undermine Christianity altogether." How the concocters of the trash must enjoy their English commentators over their evening toddy!

It is not often that the newspaper accounts of a contemporaneous event are so confusing as the correspondents' letters about the Œcumenical Council. The painful truth seems to be that not one of them knows anything worth repeating of what is passing behind the scenes, and they are all consequently reduced to speculation, to which, however, they make desperate efforts to give an appearance of body. It is said that some of the bishops are leaky; but then even the leakiest Catholic bishop is as unpromising a subject as a newspaper man ever took in hand. Of what is going on outside the Council, however, we get, by putting a great many versions together, a tolerable idea, and it may be said to be in substance this: A strong opposition went to Rome, composed almost exclusively of German (including Hungarian) and French bishops—the former under the lead of Cardinal Schwartzenberg, and the latter of Bishop Dupanloup, both able, energetic, and independent men. The Cardinal is a secular as well as ecclesiastical prince, a member of a great house, and enormously wealthy; and Dupanloup is well known to our readers as a man who means what he says, and is not easily disposed of. The difficulties of organizing the opposition, though, partly owing to difference of language, partly to the skill displayed by the papal functionaries in lodging the malcontents, have been almost insurmountable. Moreover, a good many who were very brave at home seem to have been struck, when at Rome, with that awe of the Pope which is one of the most striking results of Catholic training, and have showed the white feather. The recusants, however, made sufficient show of resistance at the outset to upset the Jesuit plan of having the dogma of the infallibility adopted by a coup de main, as the soldiers say, and as the priests say by an afflatus, or blast of divinely inspired enthusiasm. Delay taking place, they set about signing a protest against the papal mode of arranging the whole proceedings, when, to their astonishment, Schwartzenberg, their foremost man, gave way, refused to sign, and is now in a state of moral collapse, an object of pity to friends and foes. The effect of this defection on the opposition is thought likely to be disastrous; but the fate of the infallibility is still in doubt. The doctors are said to be agreed now that adoption without discussion would be dangerous, and discussion, as involving time and risks of all kinds, is also dangerous. The bishops in partibus, two hundred strong, are curiously enough serving the Pope in good stead. They are not learned, nor permeated by "modern ideas," but are devout and devoted. The latest news speaks, however, of the opposition having been once more roused and concentrated by an attempt to get a petition for the dogma signed.

The Pope, in the meantime, follows up his advantage, and nearly every week drops a bomb into the enemy's camp, which shakes their nerves, and drives them in on their last line of defence. His last is a "Constitution," limiting and defining excommunications latæ sententiæ, that is, excommunications which follow certain offences, ipso facto, as matters of course—specially reserving whole batches of them for his own jurisdiction—that is, withdrawing from the local bishops the power of raising them. Some of these excommunications touch the relations between church and state very closely—that, for instance, which befalls anybody who compels a lay judge to summon an ecclesiastic before him, or "put forth laws or decrees against the rights or liberties of the Church." It is quite plain that, whatever else the Council may do, there is one thing it is sure to do, and that is, furnish materials for an indefinite series of broils between the clergy and Catholic governments.

Affairs in Spain become more and more complicated. Prim has been persistently urging the Duke of Genoa as a candidate for the crown, though the Duke and his mother say he will, under no circumstances, accept it; and Victor Emmanuel is apparently not particularly eager that he should. In the meantime, the suggestion apparently makes no progress either with the Cortes or the public, and Prim's support of it is attributed to his hatred of Montpensier. Señor Castelar has delivered one of his great speeches against it, in which he denounced the House of Savoy for several generations, besides paying some attention to the Bourbons, of whom he has, of course, an equally low opinion. His power of invective is wonderful, and his command of the Cortes seems to grow. He was loudly applauded. All other parties except the Prim party seem in the meanwhile to gain ground. The Carlists are again raising their heads, and there is talk of a union between them and the Christinists—if that term be still applicable to the adherents of Isabella—in support of the claims of the Duke of Madrid. Nobody gains so much by the delay as the republicans. Prim, whose main support is now in the army, is becoming an object of increasing suspicion, and there is constant talk of a coup d'état.

The Austrians have concluded a new treaty with China also; but, like the British, not with Mr. Burlingame, but through their own legation at Berlin. It has a most-favored-nation clause, and consequently gets for Austria all that other nations have got, but is in some ways peculiar. The Chinese refuse to allow foreign consuls to trade, so that the Austrians will have to pay their regular salaries in the minor ports or dispense with them altogether. They also made an effort to secure special privileges for Chinese converts to the Catholic faith, exempting them from native jurisdiction, but the Chinese resolutely refused to concede it, and the Austrians did not insist on it, whereat there is much indignation at Rome; but the Chinese are unquestionably right.

The relations of Great Britain to her colonies have for some time past formed the subject of anxious deliberation on the part of a body of gentlemen calling themselves "Australian colonists in England," and holding conferences in London, from which they sent deputations to the Prime Minister, and were even issuing summonses to all the other colonies to send representatives to a grand pow-pow to be held in London, to urge the consolidation of the empire by bringing the colonies into closer dependence on the parent state. The news of these performances has reached Australia, and the result is a torrent of ridicule and abuse. The Australian press says that the "colonists" are a parcel of presumptuous nobodies, not one of whom could get elected to any legislature in the colony. At Melbourne their performances formed the subject of a debate in the Assembly, where they were severely denounced, and a resolution passed, asserting the desire of the colony of Victoria to maintain its connection with England for an indefinite period, but repudiating all attempts to make that dependence anything more than a personal union through the sovereign, and declaring the readiness of the colony to take care of itself in all matters whatsoever, in peace or war.

THE CURE FOR THE SOUTH.

The question of the admission of Virginia will probably have been settled before this reaches our readers, and, if there were no other States still to apply, we might let the subject drop. But the discussion the case of Virginia has called forth, as well as the policy which is in course of execution in Georgia, has revealed a state of mind on the part of some Republicans which is pretty sure to raise again the very points which Congress is now passing upon. Nay, the very demand which we already hear for the relegation of Tennessee to a territorial condition, by way of punishing her for the conduct of her Legislature, promises to carry us into a still stranger and more difficult region than any we have yet traversed in the work of reconstruction.

It is impossible to deny most of the assertions which the advocates of the continued infliction of pains and penalties on the South make as to the temper of the people and the administration of criminal justice. We suppose it would be easy to count on one's fingers the number of "repentant rebels" south of Mason and Dixon's line—that is, of men who are not simply sorry on grounds of expediency for having revolted against the Government of the United States, but who look on their conduct with horror as sinful and immoral, and therefore needing to be expiated by some process of atonement or purification; and yet it is this latter kind of repentance that some radical Republicans are clamoring for as a condition of reconstruction. In other words, they refuse to consider an ex-Confederate a good citizen, and entitled to his political rights, unless, besides acknowledging that he has been foolish, he also acknowledges that he has been wicked.

That ninety-nine hundredths of the Southern people, however, will make no such confession, and are satisfied that the rebellion was not wicked, but holy and glorious, is quite true. We cannot gainsay it; but for the purposes of our argument we do not need to gainsay it. All we have to say about it is, that this state of affairs presents to the people of the United States a new problem of which they have hitherto only read, but with which they have never had to deal, though it is one of the familiar problems of history, over which the statesmen of the Old World have been cudgelling their brains for a thousand years. That problem is, how to deal with a disaffected population, who, whether rightly or wrongly, look on us as oppressors and themselves as victims, and hate us accordingly. We may feel satisfied that they are mistaken, but this does not help us to a solution. Their delusion is simply one of the symptoms of their disease; and dwelling on it perpetually as a reason for not going any further strikingly resembles the conduct of a doctor who should keep constantly repeating his diagnosis, but stoutly refuse to prescribe any medicine until the patient's condition became more satisfactory to him. It so happens, however, that we have by us a recipe for just such cases in which we have the utmost confidence, which we have been recommending to foreign powers ever since the foundation of the United States Government. It consists simply in conciliation; in giving the disaffected the management of their own affairs as far as possible; and in constantly presenting the sovereign force of the country to them in the attitude of a protector, or help, or agent, and not that of a schoolmaster, or taskmaster, or inquisitor. And the theory of this remedy—the theory, indeed, which underlies the whole American system—is that men in the mass on the whole incline towards good rather than towards evil, and will, if let alone, improve in morals and manners; and in support of the soundness of this theory we constantly point to the whole history of civilization. The world has progressed, not by means of government checks and stimulants, but largely in spite of them. The South affords us just now a field for the trial of the theory such as we have never had. If it will not stand this test, if we dare not try it at the South, we ought in decency to give up urging it on the attention of the Spaniards and British, and ought to be ashamed of having once urged it on the Austrians.

Besides, the plan of bringing communities to the frame of mind in which other people think they ought to be, by coercion, has been frequently tested before our eyes, and has always failed, and failed lamentably. There is hardly a government in Europe which has not resorted to it, and the great triumph of liberalism which we are now witnessing there means simply that the plan is being everywhere abandoned, and people are being left to their own devices. Since they can't be made good, statesmen are saying, let them get good in their own way. If the people of the South will not of themselves reach the conclusion that honesty is the best policy, that crimes of violence and injustice towards individuals are injuries to the community, that every man is interested in the maintenance of order and justice, then free government on this continent is a failure.

But it may be said that Southern disloyalty is peculiar in this: that it is accompanied by or results in hostility towards the freedmen—or, in other words, that the Southern problem is complicated by the existence of intense caste feeling; that, if it consisted simply in hostility towards the Government, it would be simple enough, and what we say would probably apply; but that the "unrepentant rebel" shows the hardness of his heart in oppressing his colored neighbor. The answer to this argument lies in the question, Are we prepared to protect his colored neighbor?—in other words, to provide an efficient police for the South, and maintain it there until society has become peaceable and law-abiding. Everybody acknowledges that we are not. We offer the colored man not one shred of real defence against any of the outrages or exactions to which he is exposed. We have no force for the purpose, and no one—not even General Butler or Mr. Sumner—proposes to provide one. The operations of the Ku Klux Klan are all forbidden by law already. There is not a State in the South in which robbery and murder and arson, and the taking even of colored people into the woods and flogging them, is not an indictable offence, punishable with death or imprisonment. What is wanted, therefore, is not fresh legislation, but improved means of executing the law. Now, the instruments of justice are courts and police. We have seen that we do not propose to supply police. But is the supply of improved courts part of the reconstruction policy? Not at all. The courts remain just as they are. Offences are still to be tried by jury. Moreover, there is no machinery provided for the efficient supervision of judicial proceedings at the South. Power of removing officials is indeed lodged in the hands of the commanding general; but he can only exercise it in rare cases—or, in other words, just often enough to irritate, and not often enough to improve, the administrative machinery. Moreover, even the little good he can do by his supervision is neutralized by the knowledge which everybody has that his rule is temporary. People submit to his interference with the hope of being able to make up for it after he is gone.

In fact, the reconstruction process has no social power whatever. It is purely political in its nature and effects. It sees to the form of the constitution, and to the composition of one legislature; which is all very well in its way, and, as regards the relation of the State as a whole to the Union at large, was after the war indispensable. But it contains no ingredient which reaches the relations of man to man. The maintenance of the States under "military rule," as we see it in Georgia, simply puts one political faction, for the time being, above another, and amuses the public with the spectacle of a State made "loyal" by having the representatives of the people picked and sorted and ticketed by a military officer. It, in other words, introduces into American politics, in a more offensive form, the system of "official candidates," which poor Napoleon has for the last eighteen years been trying in France, with much the same delusive hopes by which some of our Radical brethren seem to be now buoyed up. It gives a minority a short and speedy method of keeping the State offices to themselves, without the trouble of making their lives or opinions acceptable to the people whom they profess to represent; but it does not make any poor man happier or more secure in his cabin; it does not make him surer of justice when he goes into court, or surer of his wages after he has earned them, or soften the hearts of his neighbors towards him, or train him in the art, of so much importance in politics, of acting with others, or of getting others to act with him. The evils of the present social and political condition of the South are indisputable, but they are not curable by legislation. They are things which will only disappear slowly, and will never disappear except under the influence of a general improvement in Southern society, which is another way of saying that, when individual Southerners are more intelligent, industrious, and humane than they now are, the weaker members of the community will be better off.

THE CRISIS IN FRANCE.

THERE is, perhaps, nothing in the crisis through which France is passing more striking than the evidence it affords of the immense progress which the country has made in political education within the last twenty years. The Revolution of 1848 nearly every Frenchman now feels to have been an immense disaster; but then it is clearer and clearer every day that it was not the fault of the people so much as of the King. The agitation which preceded it was conducted in a perfectly legitimate manner, and it was directed against a palpable abuse —the restriction of the suffrage to 200,000 persons, out of a population of nearly 40,000,000. The rising in February, 1848, was not a natural or proper consequence of it. There was no good reason for supposing the Government would not have eventually given way to the pressure of opinion, and it was to the pressure of opinion the agitators expected it to give way. The armed rising was literally the work of a small mob, and the nation was astounded to find that the King, to whose safe-keeping the existing order of things was committed, as soon as he heard the mob was coming, instead of calling for the troops, called a hack, and left for parts unknown. He evidently had not learned the very rudiments of his trade.

The effect of his course on the Parisian population was most calamitous. It is impossible to overrate the mischief which is done when the mob of a large city find that they can, with a trifling exertion of their own strength, overpower the constituted authorities; and this lesson which the Parisian mob learnt in 1830 was more deeply impressed on them by the events of 1848. The effect on the mob, however, was not the whole of the mischief worked by those events. The middle classes, and indeed all classes which cared either for property or order, were terror-stricken at finding constitutional government so feeble. The theatre, the Chambers, the freedom of the press, were all very well; but, if a few hundred men in blouses could sweep them away by a few shots, and lay the capital for days at the mercy of the dangerous classes, they were nothing better than pernicious luxuries. These dismal feelings were confirmed by the events of the following June. The terrible conflicts of that month were the natural results of the hopes roused by what had occurred in February. Indeed, before the year was out the foundations of the Empire were laid; the indiscretions of the Assembly in 1851 only revealed the progress the work had made.

The Revolutions of 1830 and 1848 thus created an immense difficulty in the way of all regular and peaceful political agitation, by inspiring one class with the idea that it was not necessary, and another with the idea that it was hopeless. The result was that many Frenchmen resigned themselves to the conclusion that France could only find refuge from anarchy in despotism, because a government which was strong enough to resist revolution would have to be despotic. A conclusion better calculated to inflict political paralysis on a community it would be hard to think of.

What is now occurring shows that whatever mischief the Empire may have worked in other ways, it is, by its present mode of dealing with political discontent, drawing the French public slowly but steadily out of this slough of despond. The results which have attended the persistent efforts of a few brave men during the last eighteen years have shown the French public that, as long as there exists any space, however small, in which even half-a-dozen can speak out their mind, no cause is hopeless and no tyranny crushing. The few Opposition deputies who in the second year of the Imperial régime took their stand against it with the tongue alone, have afforded their countrymen a lesson such as they never had in the efficacy of peaceful discussion. Incessant talking, in season and out of season; the continual protest, day by day and year by year, of a few lawyers has at last overthrown personal government and revived public life in France. Frenchmen have never before seen as much, or, indeed, anything worth mention, in the way of political reform accomplished without fighting.

But then it must be borne in mind that this lesson could hardly have been learnt had the Government been less strong and less unscrupulous. It is one of the striking illustrations of the way in which men's misfortunes sometimes help to train them, that the enormous concentration of military force in the hands of a remorseless usurper in the Tuileries should prove the means of forcing on the French people the knowledge of the strength which lies in patience and persistence. If, last fall, the Reds had had their own way, they would have reopened the revolutionary period; and there has been no régime in France since 1789 which such an incident as the murder of Noir would not have overturned. As matters stand, however, the capital is surrounded by an overwhelming force, which makes a resort to arms appear mad even to the most hot-headed malcontent, and the popular indignation is forced to find vent in constitutional channels, and, in finding vent, widens and deepens them, and strengthens the popular confidence in their strength and capacity. It is impossible to overestimate the gain to the nation of having such a crisis pass away without disorder or tumult, and without destroying any of its existing liberties. It is really the dawning of a new era. It means the substitution, in the French agitator's head, of the idea that somebody ought to be roused or stimulated or persuaded, for the idea that somebody ought to be killed; and this is a triumph not for France simply, but for civilization; and we owe it, strange to say, in part to one of the faults of the Empire.

It is impossible to say at this distance, and with the amount of news as yet in our possession, what is the exact nature of the impression produced on the public mind by the Noir murder. Even the facts are in doubt; but appearances are all against the Prince. A man who invites another to come or send to his house for the purpose of arranging the preliminaries of a duel, and receives the emissaries in his own room with a pistol in his pocket, will find difficulty in persuading people that he did not bring on the conflict for which he was so terribly prepared. Moreover, "the code" is in France too familiar to every man, and everybody in the fighting world is too conversant with its formalities, to make anything like chance medley very likely during the negotiations common in such cases. In the present case, the journalists were probably too much flattered at the prospect of an affair with a man of the Prince's position to make it very likely that they said or did anything calculated to spoil the fight, while his contempt for them, combined with the natural violence and eccentricity of his character, renders it very easy to believe that he was insolent from the first, and quite ready to use the weapon which he acknowledges he had ready in his pocket. In estimating the effect of the incident on the public mind, we must remember that he is a Bonaparte, and that Bonapartes now stand low in French estimation; that the popular belief in their unscrupulousness and treachery is deep and well-founded; and that the recent plea of Prince Murat, when judicially pursued for an assault, that as he belonged to the Imperial family he was not triable by ordinary tribunals, has made the public very sensitive about Imperial claims of exemption from the common law, and eager to have them tested in order that they may be disallowed. There is, indeed, no way of looking at the late murder in which it will not seem a misfortune of the first magnitude for the Empire. If Prince Pierre be tried and convicted, it will throw a good deal of moral opprobrium on the dynasty; if he is acquitted, nothing will convince people that he has not escaped through favor. Hardly anything could have occurred better calculated to show of what mettle the new ministry is made. If Ollivier be really a statesman—and he has given every evidence of it thus far—he will boldly apply the law at whatever cost. At the very worst, he will in so doing be simply sacrificing Prince Pierre to the Prince Imperial and his mother. It is their future which is really staked in the game which is now playing. The Emperor will, beyond doubt, hold his own as long as he lives; but it depends on how he holds it during the last years of his life whether his son will succeed him. A frank and hearty acceptance of the conditions of constitutionalism by the Government itself, accompanied by the imposition of them on all others by whatever force may be necessary, will transmit the crown to Napoleon IV. if anything can do it.

If the ministry are the men we take them to be, they will not suppress the Marseillaise or muzzle Rochefort. All the force his frantic vituperation possesses is drawn from the fact that such talk on the part of the press in France has always hitherto been followed by a rising. But by letting it go on, and taking care that it is not followed by a rising, it is simply made ridiculous, and Rochefort reduced to the position of a mere wind-bag. Wild threats and denunciations which produce no action, and end in nothing, always at last raise a laugh. A ministry which had the strength of nerve enough to perform this process on Rochefort, would work a veritable disenchantment. They would break a spell which, for forty years, has been the curse of France. In trying it, too, they would have the hearty support of that large and growing class in every country which is disgusted and outraged by that phenomenon of modern civilization known as "sensational journalism." The character of the men engaged in it, the use they make of the publicity which modern science has placed within their reach, their revolting contempt for decency, for individual rights, for private character and feelings, and, still worse, for truth, and the brutal parade they make of their determination to make money and get notoriety by every means in their power, is everywhere producing a feeling of detestation which is none the less hearty for not finding much expression. Indeed, the fear which the foul tyranny of these men inspires over the best natures lends a touch of ferocity to the hatred with which civilized communities begin to regard them, and if things go on as they are, it will take a good deal of civilization and Christianity, in every country, to make the public look with disapproval on the open slaughter of them by their victims. There is no place where their behavior has been more outrageous than in Paris, and Rochefort differs from the common run of them simply in flying at higher game, and giving himself out as the champion of "a liberty" which he neither appreciates nor understands.

NOTES ON THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS AGITATION.

BY A LOOKER-ON.

I.

THE late convention at Cleveland, styling itself the National Woman Suffrage Association, in that all-embracing adjective sounded fearful warning to some female souls of us who, in the great battle over the rights and wrongs of our sex, had proposed to occupy the serene height of the lookers-on. Sweet was irresponsibility, and, to confess the whole, unspeakable our shrinking from some of the pounding on that field. Of course, we knew that all reforms must proceed at first with much random thwacking and vain uproar; but there was that in the very subjects with which this reform dealt which made the crude statement, the half-apprehension of the remedy which necessarily travesties the want, all the drearily shallow estimate of very deep things, mortally unpleasing here; and any active part in the decision of the woman question we profoundly meant to shirk.

We borrow the editorial plural for these remarks, as the present writer is confident that she represents a class of her sex more or less numerous who have watched this movement from afar, indeed with a certain interest, but with a very decided preference that it should not come too personally near—and that not altogether from the "vis inertiæ of women," denounced by one of the leading lady reformers as the great hindrance to the cause.

Whatever pleasing dream of neutrality, however, we once indulged has been promptly broken up by these Cleveland conspirators. Apparently every man and woman of them went home to study up maps of the United States, to hunt out little hamlets too obscure for the atlas, and lo! to the remotest village their circulars come flying, confounding us with the sight of our very names as officers, hinting of local meetings speedily to be held, and petitions to be circulated for signers; and verily the question that we were so comfortably to escape promises shortly to demand our individual yea or nay. Now neutrality is one thing, but to meet with a flat negative a movement claiming to be in the especial interests of our own sex is quite another, as the National operators were evidently well aware. And their devices have so far succeeded that we begin to rummage among our confused prejudices with some assiduity—to endeavor to set them a little in order to ourselves—to ascertain how many of them are prejudices merely, and how far our non-enthusiasm for woman suffrage has its root in real uncertainty as to the spirit of the cause itself, at least as we gather it from its most vocal interpreters. And in our sincere attitude of enquirer we take it that it is allowable for us to ask a few questions upon both sides. Between the advocates and the opponents of a new cause, the outright and the downright few, stands ever the great body of the undetermined, who, as the first step towards a more definite position, must needs deliver themselves a little of their doubts, ask for fuller explanation here, suggest objections there; and, although the partisan style be much more effective, we trust there is also hearing for this other voice.

The most cursory reader of the reports of woman's rights meetings in the newspapers must be struck with the tendency to two lines of false reasoning very prominent in the debaters, viz., the arguing from altogether special and accidental cases to universal rules; and again, the sorting out into grievances redressible by civil law life's most intimate and awful woes, the catalogue of domestic sufferings, whose baffling problem is that the very conditions which make their terror make also for the purest and best joy given to mortals, so that how to deliver from the one without jeopardizing the other is the riddle yet unsolved.

Any examination of the first order of bad logic referred to would be too enormous a business to be undertaken here. From Mrs. Livermore downwards, the popular lady speakers of the cause overflow with stories whose moral is either quite out of joint or cannot at all be stretched to the application intended. Mrs. Livermore, we doubt not, is a most excellent and estimable woman; but when she tells us, for instance, of the German butcher's wife whom she knew in Chicago who, while her drunken spouse was serving out his term in jail, carried on the business herself (sticking the pigs, let us hope, by deputy)—carried on his business with such superior efficiency as to store several hundred dollars in the bank, which money the bad man, emerging from jail, exultantly laid hands on, thinking to buy unto himself much more liquor—when Mrs. Livermore relates that on the hearing of this tale she posted immediately to the Illinois State capital, and there laying the case before the legislature then in session, the said legislature did postpone the two or three hundred other bills then before it to put through first of all a bill making it impossible ever after for any Dutch butcheress to be so plundered—when we hear this anecdote, we say, we find it a very unlucky anecdote to be selected as illustration of the need of female legislators, because male legislators are so implacable to women. Logic of this sort, not quite so suicidal, perhaps, but largely made up of the telling of "true stories" of distressed poor women, which, be they never so true, are wholly inconclusive of the point in hand—logic of this sort does, as we have said, too exceedingly abound that we should stop to consider it here. But we propose to enquire for a moment into the other favorite line of doubtful reasoning, whose theme is the family relation.

We confess ourselves continually at a loss to understand upon what new basis the reformers, as men and women sensitive to moral obligations, and at all aware of the complications of human life, seriously propose to establish domestic ties. As to the weight of mortal misery resulting from unhappy homes, no profound experience underestimates that. The point is, are these ills of a nature to be reached by statute? According to many woman's rights speeches, they certainly are. There is one creature who is at the bottom of all of them. A male creature, stout in his fists, and strong with the law behind him, who beats his wife, who ties her up, who puts her sane into insane hospitals, who stints her for money, who deserts her for ill company, who always and for ever withers her with the breath of an inward contempt because she is weak in the fists, has no law behind her, earns no wages, and is, in short, so preposterously different from himself generally. This pleasing animal has now been for some time on exhibition; we are familiar, even to the point of being bored, with all his features; let us glance, by way of variety, at his female counterpart—for we humbly suggest that he has one. As to the former, we are ready to admit that laws might perhaps be devised to regulate him, since his offences incline to be of a tangible sort; but how is it with the female tormentor? Can she also be indicted, and thrust out of the home whose scourge she is?

It may strongly be questioned whether it is in the power of any man to make home so hideous as many evil-tempered women. To begin with, men are out of the house during the largest part of every day; women are its abiding presence. In the parental relation, for instance, a good woman can save her young children in a thousand ways from a bad father's tyranny; a good man, unless he be of the very affluent classes, can never so save his children from their mother. Necessarily, she is constantly with them; all the thousand little matters pertaining to their care and conduct, which furnish so many occasions for the igniting of a passionate or exacting temper, are under her direction. Pathetic stories are told, and truly told, of the drunken father who comes home late at night to frighten or maltreat his little children; but how with the scolding, tyrannical mother, whose reign of terror begins not late at night, but with the earliest waking moment, and embitters the live-long day, wounding body and soul alike?

Again, the vices and faults of a man are almost invariably such as are patent to outsiders, so that, if he becomes unbearable at home, his family are in a true position. If a man is a drunkard or a miser, all the world knows it; if he is profligate, sooner or later that is found out too; if he has an ugly temper, ten to one he growls at his neighbors as well as at his wife and children. But a woman may be the very destroying spirit of the house, and her character not even be guessed beyond its walls. For not only her dealings with the outside world are usually not such as to bring her into that collision of others' interests with her own which reveals the stuff one is made of, but women have far more approbativeness than men; at least, that sentiment is found in them much more universally. The morose man, shutting himself up in gruff defiance of all opinions but his own, does exist; we wonder if the worst woman who ever lived on earth did not strive to make somebody believe in her. We are not striking the moral balance between the two; the woman's yearning, indeed, may be that last grain of virtue which lifts her above the male pervert, but it certainly is that element which complicates the position of her victims. The question which bears upon our case is, not who are the wickedest of human beings, but who are really the most tormenting to live with?

The beings whom nothing suits; in whose unhappy natures reigns that gigantic form of selfishness which they call sensitiveness; who are more cruel and bitter under pretence of wounded love than any other creature can be through hate; whose truth is a delirium of lies; who cover all the mortal maladies of their diseased souls with such fine names that to the world outside they may pass as gentle, misunderstood spirits, while at home they drain the life-blood of all belonging to them—better, in intimate life, the coldest heart that ever beat, which has a sense of justice, than the mingled ice and fire of souls like these. And such natures are found in their intensity only among women; or, when there are men of this type, they are men in whom the distinctive feminine qualities predominate—which is not denying that these qualities happily combined make the sweetest, noblest natures; we mean that in their abnormal blending they may become the most terrific. Exaggerated sensibilities wanting the balance-wheel of reason—there is no more dreadful being.

The above remarks merely aim to recall the fact that in this world of ours there are many beings to whom to be linked at all is a misery; that these are not always husbands, or men in any relation; that when they are women and wives, aside from the point—very intricate in their case—of the duty that may yet be owed to those who have forsworn all duty to others, we think it would take the ingenuity of several Solons to frame any laws that would bring the worst offenders to justice. And then the dilemma remains, that divorce being once granted for incompatibility, even the wildest, how shall it be restricted from including the least, and what shall hinder any loose-minded man from making himself incompatible at the shortest notice?

No, it is part of the tragedy of our mortal existence that perverse beings are often linked by ties of the closest relationship to better natures, making innocent lives a long anguish. And if it is declared that the marriage tie under such circumstances is the most galling of any, it may be replied that of all the family ties the marriage tie is the only one which is not a birth-tie—which is strictly voluntary in the beginning—and there is a deep sentiment in the human mind that one's shoulders should be strong enough to bear the consequences of one's own acts. For it is not refused that the sufferer shall lighten these consequences in any permitted way. We firmly believe in the living apart of husband and wife when, for any cause, they cannot live together without deep mutual injury. Warring households that can never be at peace should be broken up. There are such, and it should be held perfectly honorable for them to be broken up. But the manifest inconvenience to the parties in mere separation, as the expense of divided maintenance, the disposal of children, and the like, are such as to make it usually certain that the evils are real and not pretended from which they fly. Whereas, in case of real divorce—that is, divorce with free power to marry again—there immediately comes in the possible immoral motive, the desire for another husband or wife; which desire, indeed, considering the rash unwisdom in which so many unions are formed, might be a very natural one, and profitable to be carried out, if only this world were altogether other than what it is.

One might suppose, to hear the invectives nowadays hurled at them, that the supporters of strict divorce laws were so stupidly enamored of the beauty of constancy as to insist, for the sake of the mere abstract idea, that its form should be preserved when the soul is wanting. Most certainly it is not that any rational being affirms that a mate chosen at an immature age, and often most rashly, is the best possible mate, and that it is all a piece of fickleness not to regard him or her as such to the end; it is that there are tremendous interests of order which on the whole overrule these interests of freedom.

That the advocates of the new reform incline to fix their eyes on these latter, to undue forgetfulness of the former, is our impression. Also, that they cherish some notion of legislating away all sins and sorrows—that the image of a State Constitution has got into their heads as the very scroll which shall set humanity's wandering feet straight for the Celestial City. This sound as of a red-tape gospel chills us a little in their preamblings and resolvings.

For ourselves, we have still some misgivings that there is but one way to journey out of these despairs—the long old way whose end we are ever striving to attain by short cuts—the slow spiritual uplifting of all lives, which shall no longer blight each other, whose better doings shall no more require to be undone. Haply the new reform tends to this; if so, its philosophers should be most careful to commend themselves as searching out the strong bases of life, to which, if we come not first as foundation, we shall surely come at last in wreck.

ITALIAN POLITICS.

FLORENCE, December 30, 1869.

MOST people take an interest in foreign politics, as they are called, but few only care for the politics of the foreigner. Naturally, the questions of war or peace, of free trade and commercial reciprocity, must interest many, the thinker as well as the speculator, the quidnunc as well as the shareholding spinster. But to follow the internal history of another nation with sufficient perseverance to feel a genuine and permanent interest in it, requires not only a certain mental culture, but a good deal of leisure. Most men have better things to do than to read, for instance, the debates of the Italian parliament. It were sad if they had not. But, since there must be exceptional cases and exceptional times, let us ask ourselves, What is it that justifies, and what is it that commands, our interest in any foreign nation's internal affairs? A nascent nation's struggle for existence, or the struggles of a reviving nation for independence and liberty, appeal alike to our hearts and heads, and we need not apologize for our sympathy and attention. Again, when a nation thus born or revived is fairly started in life, we feel a calmer, almost scientific interest in watching her through her first troubles. It is then only that her real worth can show itself, her virtues being put to a far severer test than during the excitement of revolution and war, when there are so many elevating influences at work that even thieves and pickpockets seem transfigured into citizens for a moment. But, after having thus formed a fair estimate of a nation's capacities and vitality, we naturally bid her God-speed, and commit no sin in losing sight of her for a time, unless she succeeds in recalling and fixing our attention by some flash of light, some spark of genius, or the evolution of some new idea that might be leaven to our Old World's heavy dough.

Now, Italy cannot complain of the transalpine world in this respect. She had her fair share of sympathy and active help in the days of her struggle, and throughout the first decennium of her national existence she has received ever-increasing marks of friendship and good-will. With the exception of the priests, she has gained over almost all her enemies. Even M. Thiers now believes in Italy, and the Prussian martinets, who in 1859 had preached some ridiculous sort of doctrine about the Mincio line, came gallantly down seven years later to assist fair Italy in stepping over the stream. All this was highly interesting, seasoned as it was by the oracular reticences of Napoleon and the legendary exploits of Garibaldi. And when the sober moment came for paying the bills and for putting the new house in order, Italy faced her looming difficulties bravely, assumed at once an air of perfect respectability, and, though adding deficit to deficit every year, has hitherto staunchly refused to disown or evade her liabilities, and the world applauds once more.

But beyond this financial attitude (one can call it nothing more) and the scrupulously constitutional behavior of the King, there is not much in the present state of Italy to gratify the patriotic pride of the Italian or to excite the admiration of the foreigner.

Italian politics are becoming uninteresting. What is going on here just now, and what has been going on for a whole year, may have the outward appearance of being interesting, but is not. We see certain effects, but the alleged causes utterly fail to account for them. We see a fierce and protracted party contest, but the combatants turn out to be no parties at all, but mere cliques, and their platforms hollow sounding-boards. And, when we look about for the real causes of all this noise and all this mischief, we find nothing but personal hatreds and incorrigible egotism, no idea, principle, or public interest having any causal connection with these contests. In fact (the Italians say it themselves), since the days of Gioberti and Cavour, Italy has had no political thinker or genius to direct her councils, and "a free church and a free state" was the last idea that grew on the rich soil of Italian politics. This soil, overstimulated with manure, has since then produced a crop of the rankest weeds that ever disgraced a garden or exhausted a field, and the Cavourian flower, half-choked and withered, has been plucked, and carefully laid ad acta. This was done in the spring of 1867, when Ricasoli's bill enacting a complete separation of church and state was voted down, as usual, on purely personal grounds.

Of all countries, Italy seemed most interested in the abolition of state churches. The whole Chamber agreed that disendowment was the promptest means of breaking the priest's power, and of paving the way to Rome. Rome had been proclaimed the capital of Italy, and, although this was little more than a coup de théatre, it seemed a pity to call the Roman grapes sour. But what of that? Ricasoli was to be ousted. "Rome will fall when it is ripe, and the Cavourian idea will keep." The bill was lost, and Italy went on with her clerical squabbles, ordering official masses, and enforcing Te Deums on royal birthdays, prosecuting priests, and imprisoning refractory bishops (with great loss of dignity on her part), until both parties seemed tired of the game, and sullenly agreed to disagree.

It is strange that the great question of church and state, the solution of which will mark for Europe the real end of the Middle Ages, should have been first practically broached in England. From England we have actually received the first instalment of that solution, while Cavour's country can boast of nothing better than of having "allowed" her bishops to go to Rome to join the ridiculous assembly that has met at St. Peter's. Considering that the Italians hold far more enlightened opinions on these matters than the English, we must conclude that their inactivity is not due to real conservatism. Far more plausibly, it may be accounted for by a certain historicism (if such a term may be used) of the Italian mind, which loves historic continuity and is loth to break with the past, and by another trait which we are bound to call practical indifference to principles and doctrines. These two traits the Italians have in common with the English (and with the Hungarians). But while England, sometimes with unbecoming cynicism, scorns ideas as something fit for German neologists only, her statesmen, on the sober plea of utility and expediency, manage, unconsciously, it seems, to realize ideas and abstract principles. The Italian politician, under the bombastic pretext of high principles and high morality, accomplishes little more than a series of petty intrigues prompted by rancor, spite, and egotism, hinging on personalities, and leading to nothing but personal changes.

Persons and personalities! That is the quintessence of Italian politics, and the terrible "Domando la parola per un fatto personale" is the burden, in more than one sense, of the Italian debates. Mazzini is an exception; but perhaps not even that, both his ideas and his singleness of purpose being eminently un-Italian. He has become a stranger among his countrymen, and neither understands them nor is understood by them. His newspaper, published in Genoa, is called Il Dovere, and its contents are chiefly socialistic concerning the working-classes, collective property, co-operation, and so on, and touching but slightly on the strictly political questions of the day. All this is excellent; but it betrays the effects of Mazzini's long exile. The contents, as well as the title of the paper, smell of the intellectual atmosphere of London, Brussels, and Bâle, and the party which Mazzini still calls his, and which once called him their leader, have never dreamt of recognizing "duty" as the basis of their politics, nor do they care much for the great social movement on the other side of the Alps, absorbed, as they are, in the paltry gossip that fills the dreary pages of their political papers. In a country like Italy, which, in some respects, is freer than England and Belgium, which has universal suffrage, a national guard, and municipal autonomy, and where there is no reactionary party (at least not in the political arena), the grievances and aspirations leading to the formation of parties could logically only refer to the methods of administration, to decentralization, to the modes of levying taxes, to the abolition of monopolies and state lotteries, to finance. Or they might refer to foreign affairs, to commercial policy, to national education, or to the church-and-state question. There is enough material in all this for the most restless and most pugnacious politician. Yet, on examining the names, watchwords, and platforms of the Italian parties, we can easily satisfy ourselves that these parties have not split on such grounds, even though finance and foreign affairs may furnish the technical pleas for their debates.

I do not speak here of the old Italian parties born in the throes of the revolution, of the rossi and neri, of the codini and liberali. These were real parties, and bona-fide names. But they have ceased to exist. The man in the black gown, who used to frighten young Italy when she was a child, has altogether ceased to be her bugbear; and the codini—those staunch adherents of the fallen dynasties—have retired from political life, and are all but forgotten. There was a "party of action" once—a strong and high-spirited party—headed and inspired by Garibaldi. But since the annexation of Venetia and the defeat at Mentana, he, too, has wrapt himself in silence, and his friends seem to feel that they cannot cry "Rome or death" when a third case has been proved to be possible.

At present we only hear of a destra and a sinistra, a right and a left, and of a centre, subdivided, in its turn, into a right centre and a left centre. The division is purely parliamentary; but, strange to say, the public at large do not seem to feel the want of other party names applicable to themselves. Even the terms moderati and the equivalent nickname malva (i.e., marsh-mallow) are no longer heard. The uninitiated is thus left without any clue to the real import and meaning of such cosmological terms as right and left, and can only try to guess it by a reference to France, from which these terms were borrowed. In France, we know, the parliamentary benches represent a real scale of political colors, beginning with the deepest red, and passing on (through the Imperial green and the Eugénie blue) to the clerical purple, and there is no reason why one should not even introduce a set of Fraunhofer's lines to denote, with still greater accuracy, the subtlest shades of political color.

But all this would have no practical meaning without the presence of a considerable variety of colors; and it is no exaggeration to say that the range of the political spectrum in Italy is extremely narrow, and comprises little more than the various shades of one color; which color, it is needless to add, is neither blue nor purple.

The gentlemen of the left sometimes call themselves republicans or democrats. But these names are misnomers, the right being neither royalistic nor anti-democratic. There are few political men, if any, in Italy who care enough for royalty to be ready to fight for it or to make it their party cry. The King himself is a bad royalist, and would not fight for his throne if the nation's suffrage were against it. But the Italians say: He is the king elect; he had the votes even of the republicans; and when the Italian boot was all in shreds, he did the cobbler's work sufficiently well to be allowed to finish it. This is all that Italian royalism pleads. The sentiment of loyalty does not exist among the Italians, who have, therefore, no difficulty in seeing that royalty is doomed, and that its very virtues must be suicidal. They may not think fit to admit this publicly at all hours of the day. But, surely, to discuss and urge the superfluity of kings in such a country is ridiculous—at all events, a waste of labor.

If the question were, as it was in France, between personal rule and the reign of law, professional republicanism would be a necessity. But Victor Emanuel is the most scrupulous and impartial of constitutional kings. Garibaldians have been his ministers, Bixio and Medici are among his generals, and does not even Lobbia—the great Lobbia—don his uniform? Everywhere we find men of advanced ideas round the throne as well as in the democratic camp. It may be said that, with exception of the priests and the peasantry, the Italians are a nation of born liberals, and that obstructive conservatism, in the Tory's or the Junker's sense, does not exist in the country, and certainly not in the political arena of Italy. What, then, it may be asked, are these men of the left? What is the raison d'être of such a party? Between advanced liberals and radicals there may be many differences; but why should there be such implacable rancor? Surely, the wounds of Aspromonte can no longer smart; for, if they did, if the men of the left were still the avengers of Garibaldi's wounds, they could never have accepted as party leader the very man who sent Pallavicini to inflict them.* I must describe the different shades of color more particularly, however, next week.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, December 31, 1869.

I WRITE to you on the last day of the year, when it is customary for our newspapers to publish historical retrospects. I have glanced over two or three such productions, and have not been made more cheerful by the process. To say the truth, there is much cause for melancholy, and we cannot as yet see a distinct promise of better things. The best circumstance is, perhaps, that we are learning to look our difficulties in the face with less than our former inclination to shirk unpleasant questions, and have shaken off the easy confidence of the Palmerstonian era. But great controversies, social, political, and religious, rise more and more distinctly in the immediate future, and at times we may half doubt whether our strength is equal to the burden. In peaceable or violent fashion we have to go through a revolution, of which no man can foretell the progress or the end. We did a great act of justice in the last session of Parliament by destroying the Irish Establishment. I do not pretend to decide how much gratitude we deserve, or in what proportions our motives were compounded of real love of justice, of party animosity, of hostility to all establishments, or of other feelings; but, if any one was weak enough to hope that our good deed would bring an immediate reward, he must have been already undeceived. The Irish trouble seems to increase and grow more complex. Discontent seems to have struck its roots even deeper than we had supposed, and grows and flourishes upon the concessions it receives. The debates upon the land question, far from converging to any definite results, seem to bring out even wider contrasts of opinion. How Mr. Gladstone is to steer through the troubled waters of next session is a singularly difficult question. It will be a severer trial of his statesmanship than anything to which he has been hitherto exposed. One important matter, as I read in the Daily News of this morning, was decided by the act of last session—namely, that the House of Lords is in future to occupy a subordinate position, and simply to delay legislation without being able to oppose a permanent veto. I do not think that this is quite an accurate statement. Undoubtedly the authority of the House of Lords received one more blow, though the principle had been practically decided by the Reform Bill controversy of 1832. The aristocratic class has not for a long time past really enjoyed the governing influence in the country, and the body which represents it must therefore go down, after a longer or shorter struggle, before that which represents the middle and lower classes. Yet the House of Lords may have a struggle left in it still; any sweeping measure of land reform would touch it far more nearly than a church disestablishment bill. The House of Commons is composed in great part of men who would sympathize with it in such a quarrel. There are many excellent country gentlemen on the Liberal benches who fancy themselves very genuine followers of Mr. Gladstone, but who would revolt against any measure tending, even by implication, to injure the landholding interest in this country. It is possible, perhaps probable, that the next session may thus witness a contest in both Houses of Parliament, in which the landholders and their conservative allies will be ranged against radicals, democrats, and reformers on an issue of the most vital importance. The probability of such a struggle has something serious about it, and it is all the more important as coming in a time of long-continued commercial depression. The increasing misery and pauperism of large classes forms an ugly background to so grave a political agitation.

* Ratazzi.

The last fortnight has seen the conclusion of a story intimately connected with some of our troubles. I need not remind you that the crash of the great house of Overend & Gurney was one of the most disastrous incidents in the commercial crisis of 1866. Last summer, as you will also remember, an indignant shareholder brought an action against the directors, who, as he alleged, had enticed him into the business on false pretences, and extraordinary revelations were made as to the method to which the ruin of the concern was owing. When the defendants were committed, a loud burst of applause shocked the propriety of the court, and expressed the general satisfaction that criminals in the high places of commerce were likely to be brought to justice. Since that time there have been many doubts as to the probability of the case ever coming up for judgment. The public did not subscribe freely; Government would not undertake the prosecution; and the aggrieved shareholder might naturally shrink from the expense involved. The trial, however, has actually taken place, but with an unsatisfactory result. The counsel for the prosecution were not men of any eminence; they only received instructions a day or two before the trial; and they do not appear to have conducted their case with much skill. The points established seem to have been these: The old firm was in a most perilous position a year before the crash; but there was still a possibility that it might be rescued from its difficulties and ultimately become solvent. Under these circumstances, the proprietors resolved to form a company to take up the business; the chief members of the firm became directors, and induced some other gentlemen of commercial eminence to join them as new directors; the public, induced by the great name of the business, subscribed abundantly, and the company started. The course of commercial affairs was much against it, and at the end of nine months it succumbed to the pressure, causing the cruellest distress amongst numbers of shareholders.

It was plain that the directors did not endeavor to get out of the trouble themselves. They were completely ruined, and sacrificed all their private property. The case was as if a captain of a ship, knowing it to be leaky, had induced other people to embark in it, and had himself gone on board with all his family, and perished in the first storm. Undoubtedly he would be less guilty than a man who, under similar circumstances, had managed to transfer his ship to others and stayed on shore himself. But he would be guilty, though not in the same degree, if he had induced other people by false representations to share his danger. Were the representations put out to the public knowingly false? or did they merely imply a sanguine view of the state of affairs? We must suppose that the public have generally taken the latter view, inasmuch as the acquittal of all the directors was hailed with an applause as hearty as that which greeted their committal. Part of this feeling was due to the fact that the new directors were foolishly prosecuted as well as the old members of the company. There could be no doubt that if any deception was used they were as much deceived as any of the shareholders. They gave every possible proof of sincerity; for it was absurd to suppose that men of established credit would voluntarily join such a business, knowing that its state was rotten, and thereby incur ruin for no cause whatever. But the applause, so far as it concerned the old directors, was certainly misdirected. It would have been wrong to convict them, for no degree of criminal deception was established; but it was plain that, to say the least of it, they had been grossly imprudent, and had induced other people, though, it might be, with innocent intentions, to join in an almost desperate undertaking, which they should have known to be almost desperate. In short, though they were not criminals in any technical sense, they were involved in a proceeding of very questionable morality. This being so, the trial was certainly unsatisfactory. There was a feeling of unreality about it throughout; and the violent invectives of the prosecuting counsel rather damaged the case by showing an absence of sober judgment. It was clear from the beginning that, as the case was managed, a conviction was impossible; but it was not clear that the whole merits of the transaction would be fairly brought out.

The unscrupulous use of joint-stock enterprises has been one great cause of the present depression, and no man can say how long it will last. The symptoms of revival are not unequivocal, though we may hope that we have passed the worst. Just now we are all grumbling the more, inasmuch as by Mr. Lowe's new system we have to pay the whole of the income tax and assessed taxes on the 1st of January. We try to console ourselves by the reflection that a great saving will be made to the revenue by the new plan, and that Government is still energetically pursuing its career of reduction. Every farthing that can possibly be pared off is being saved in all departments. It is reported, I know not with what degree of accuracy, that Mr. Lowe's next budget is to show an enormous reduction—some people talk of as much as six millions. Whether there is any truth in this I cannot say; but certainly it would be an excellent bid for popularity in our present frame of mind.

To turn to other matters for a moment: Dr. Temple has been consecrated in spite of all the windy opposition of bigots. I have heard it said that, when Dr. Temple has been a bishop for a few years, he will probably show himself to be as orthodox as his most eager antagonists could desire. This view has been not a little confirmed by his first sermon. He made in it a kind of avowal of his creed; and my powers of observation do not enable me to distinguish between its sentiments and those of the most respectable of orthodox lights. But at this I am not in the least surprised. Dr. Temple is a most excellent man; he has shown himself a good man of business, an energetic reformer, and has great powers of attracting the sympathies of those with whom he has to deal. But I don't think he will introduce any liberal theology into the high places of the church. Speaking of theology, I may venture to tell you of a phenomenon which, in some respects, is the most curious that I have lately observed. I do not violate private confidence in saying that a society was lately formed, and has now been for some time in operation, which is remarkable alike for its composition and its objects. It consists of some of the most distinguished men of all parties: bishops of the Established Church, Roman Catholic bishops, literary men of all shades of opinion, from ultramontanism to atheism, and men of science, who oppose to ecclesiastical authority a dogmatism of a very different kind. I do not mention names; but if your readers make a list of the most eminent English representatives of opposing schools of thought, they will probably hit upon some of the leading members. These gentlemen meet at intervals for a friendly dinner, after which they discuss metaphysical questions, such, for example, as the propriety of believing in a future state. As no reporters are admitted, and I have not the honor of being a member, I cannot give you any results of the discussions. You will be glad, however, to hear that a majority of the body is said to be in favor of the existence of a Deity. It is a queer contrast to the Œcumenical Council, and it is a sign of the times that men of such various opinions can meet together and discuss the most vital questions of theology with mutual toleration. I fear they will scarcely throw much light upon the subject; but they will have some highly amusing debates.

Notes.

LITERARY.

SUBSCRIBERS are solicited by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, for the first volume, now in press, of a proposed new variorum edition of Shakespeare, beginning with "Romeo and Juliet." The price will be not above ten dollars, and other volumes will follow according as the venture is sustained by the public. The editor will be Mr. Horace Howard Furness, Secretary of the Philadelphia Shakespeare Society, and the plan of the work is as follows: (1) The text to be that of the Cambridge editors, including their notes, to which will be added the various readings of Singer, Knight, Campbell, Cornwall, Collier, Hazlitt, Hudson, Ulrici, Delius, Staunton, Dyce, White, Chambers, Halliwell, Clarke, and Keightly; (2) the commentary to consist of all the notes of the Variorum of 1821 that have been adopted by editors since that date, and of the notes of the editors just enumerated; (3) illustrations and criticisms from a great number of sources, largely Continental, and therefore as yet but little known to the English reader. On the whole, we may say that the work promises valuable aid to the study and appreciation of Shakespeare, and is likely to be a credit to American scholarship. The critical faculty of the editor will of course be chiefly employed in winnowing the endless notes of the commentators, but this will be scarcely the least of the services he may render.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son, who are to remove from their present location in May, have chosen the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, corner of Twenty third Street and Fourth Avenue, for their new quarters, and will then have the farthest up-town bookstore with the exception of Carleton's. That they will be followed sooner or later by other houses, there can be but little doubt.

—When times are hard, they are apt to be hardest on the very best publications, and we observe with regret that the tardiness of the subscribers of the American Naturalist, published at Salem, Mass., in renewing their subscriptions, has seriously endangered the continuance of that admirable periodical. Admirable and single, at once: the only popular scientific journal in the country, and which, in diffusing a knowledge of nature and promoting a fondness for the study of natural history, sacrifices nothing but formality of style for the sake of its audience. It is conducted by a body of young and able naturalists, on whom also the burden of the Peabody Academy of Science rests, and whose work is as little prompted by mercenary considerations as most human work can be. The Naturalist has served to connect the labors of a large number of investigators in all parts of the country, and encourage habits of observation in all who read it. The larger part of each issue is always intelligible to boys of twelve and upwards, who could have few better gifts than the annual reading of the magazine. It is a model of clear and handsome printing, and its illustrations are often of a very expensive kind. It richly deserves to prosper, and we believe that it will.

—Mr. Beecher's return to the editorial ranks, after a long desertion, is one of the events of the new year which ought to give general satisfaction. On some accounts he has not needed an "organ" of his own, since his sermons have long been regularly published and given to thousands of readers other than his own large congregation; serving, we may remark by the way, to reconcile many to non-attendance at any church, but they have also doubtless comforted and elevated many who have been altogether debarred from hearing preaching. Most of what he is likely to say in an article in the Christian Union, Mr. Beecher would put without hesitation into his elastic sermons, and it is only in the domain of personalities that, as a public man, who believes that politics are a part of moral philosophy, and therefore may properly be talked about not only in the pulpit but out of it, he has heretofore been at any considerable disadvantage. Here, however, the owners of "organs" have had the whip-hand of him, and they may now take warning. For the rest, his salutatory shows a justness and liberality of view in regard to the relations of religion to modern discussion, the aims that should animate Christian sects and communities, and the principle of religious independence, that will make the Union, so far as he controls it, a positive and significant accession to religious journalism.

—Mr. Spofford, the librarian of Congress, said, in his recent address before the Social Science Association, of the private libraries of this country, that, taken as a whole, they "very far outrun the public ones in their aggregate of volumes, while, in respect of rare and costly books, there are multitudes of works in private hands of which no public library possesses a copy." And he added that "in no country are there found more numerous and more liberal collections of private libraries than in the United States." This peculiarly honorable and gratifying fact is rendered still more so by this other: that the "manifest destiny" of such libraries is to be bequeathed at length to the public. The Bowditch, Parker, and Ticknor collections of the Boston Public Library are instances in point which have hitherto been wanting in New York, but, we are glad to announce, will be so no longer. Last week it was made known that Mr. James Lenox, whose private library is probably the finest in America, is about to bestow it upon the city as a free gift, together with a building fit to contain it, which will be erected opposite the Central Park (would it were truly central for this purpose). We believe that less is known of Mr. Lenox's collection than of any other large private library in the country, but it has the reputation of being especially strong in Bibles, Shakespeareana, and Americana. We trust that his example secures for us a similar endowment from Mr. Lenox's rivals in book-collecting—some nearly his equals—and that the practices of the Astor Library will be carefully avoided in the new institution.

—The Boston Public Library finds itself each year more and more a place of general resort for the citizens, and now, much as it is to be desired that Mr. Winsor's and Mr. Ticknor's notion shall be the law of the library, and that it shall be its rule that the books are to be used and not saved, there is a rather undesirable pressure upon the institution in Boylston Street. It is, therefore, designed to relieve the central library, and at the same time accommodate a greater number of the citizens, by establishing branch libraries in various quarters. Manifestly, the former of these two objects will be attained, and there can hardly be a doubt that so will the latter also. Even when books are freely offered—so freely that the authorities will buy for their beneficiaries any book which is wanted which is not already in store—it is found that small inconveniences prevent many from laying hold of the good put within their easy reach, and the oil and wine, though without money or price, the giver must take to the people's doors. Thus, of the inhabitants of the city proper, 17,200 have taken out books, and that number is about one in eight and a half of all the residents. But in East Boston only one inhabitant out of twenty-six has used the books. Of the South Bostonians, who get to the city proper without being obliged to cross a ferry, and of the citizens of Roxbury, who also have close communication by land with Boston, the patrons of the library are, respectively, one in fourteen and one in sixteen of the total population. These figures show, by the way, how great a work this collection is doing, for we must suppose more than one reader to each volume taken out. It is, perhaps, read by a man to his wife, or by children to their parents and the family circle; and so the influence of good literature proceeding from this free fountain saturates the community and postpones indefinitely the day when the modern Athenian shall cease to jeer us of New York about our municipal government. The central establishment can spare many duplicates to the new branch libraries, and doubtless the city government will not be niggardly with necessary appropriations. Even if Boston should have to wait for the new park which by sea and shore is to outvie the Central or Prospect, and for the new Museum of Art which is to emulate South Kensington, it can meantime congratulate itself that it is daily multiplying within its borders people of the kind that intelligently enjoys the beauties of art and of nature.

—However else we are going to get the American literature which some of us are waiting for, we are not, we should say, going to get it by taking any of the precautions that Mr. Charles Reade so forcibly advises in his book entitled "The Eighth Commandment"—and so entitled because, he remarks, "free trade in literature is not free stealing," as has been supposed, it appears, by many persons of the kind whom Mr. Reade calls muddleheads and other partly deserved names. Shakespeare, says Mr. Reade roundly, would not have written his plays if there had not been, as we Americans say, "money in them;" and whether we are ever to have another Shakespeare or not, we certainly are not going to have him till we make it worth his while to write plays by paying him good wages for his work. The muddleheaded people aforementioned think differently; but, they to the contrary notwithstanding, it is money that makes the literary mare go, as well as other mares. If, then, the American Congress will allow American booksellers to steal the works of English, French, and German authors, and sell them in this country, just as the man sold his brooms which he stole ready-made, the American author will be driven out of business, and American literature will not exist. Always, of course, he would add, excepting the literature of the American newspaper press. Our papers we have to make for ourselves, for news is got at home, and we have our own views and opinions in regard to our own current life. "Read the American papers," he says in the same book to which we have just referred. "You revel in a world of new truths, new fancies, and glorious romance. The production is worthy of the United States. It utters thirty-nine convictions for every one the English press delivers." This is somewhat exaggerated, no doubt; but on the whole the difference between our journalism and our performance in most other branches of literature is not unlike what Mr. Reade hints at—in fact, states. The evil of which he complains is a growing one. Every year there are more foreign authors who have to see their wares stolen and sold in this market, and have to content themselves with the fact that the stealing makes their names known to a somewhat wider circle of readers than they would have had if they had not been robbed. Then there is the further satisfaction of knowing that, by-and-by, when they have been a good deal robbed, some one among those who have been preying upon them will offer them something for the privilege of publishing forthcoming works before they become general prey. We should judge, however, from the condition into which "the courtesy of the trade" has now got, that soon Mr. Dickens, and Mr. Tennyson, and Mr. Reade, and George Eliot, and Auerbach, and the rest of them, will be compelled to consider their additional fame the sole result of the sale of their books in America. These remarks—which have always been in order—suggest themselves as we read the prospectus of a new eclectic periodical called the Transatlantic, a weekly journal of popular reading, which is to be published, in Philadelphia, by Messrs. L. R. Hamersly & Co. It is to contain thirty-two octavo pages of "bright, entertaining, and instructive literature;" "the best of the stories, sketches, and essays of current foreign literature, avoiding all ponderous dissertations."

—Not many men, we suppose, are thinking that, when once the reading of the Bible in the public schools is prohibited, the Roman Catholics will be content with our American system of instruction by the State. If any one entertains that opinion, he has only to take a look at the Roman Catholic papers to learn that he is much mistaken. Says the Freeman's Journal, under date of December 11: "Let the public school system go to where it came from—the devil." "We do not and will not," says the Tablet, "accept the state as educator." "There is no possible programme of common-school instruction," says the Freeman's Journal of Nov. 20, "that the Catholic Church can permit her children to accept. . . . It is not that we declare so. It is the Catholic Church." And then the writer goes on to quote from the Syllabus to the effect that no Roman Catholic is at liberty to believe otherwise than that it is a most dangerous error to think that any school is a fit school for Roman Catholic children which is not entirely under the control of the Church. That the teaching in State schools regards only or chiefly the mere knowledge of natural things and the purposes of our social life here on earth, is wholly beside the question, says the Journal; the children are immortal, and the whole object of teaching them anything is to prepare them for an eternal life. The same paper says: "If the Catholic translation of the books of Holy Writ which is to be found in the homes of all our better-educated Catholics were to be dissected by the ablest Catholic theologian in the land, and merely lessons to be taken from it, such as Catholic mothers read to their children, and with all the notes and comments in the popular edition, and others added with the highest Catholic endorsement, and if these admirable Bible lessons, and these alone, were to be ruled as to be read in all the public schools, this would not diminish in any substantial degree the objection we Catholics have to letting our children attend the public schools." In short, if the Roman Catholic press does not misrepresent the Roman-Catholic feeling and opinion about our common-school system, the school must be the priest preaching, or else our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens will be advised by their clergy to refuse it support.

—As to what it is advisable to say and do by way of answer to our Romanist fellow-citizens, the friends of the common-school system as it stands appear to have come to no determination. Clearly, there is at present a decided unwillingness, more or less unthinking, to allow any of their claims whatsoever. But as yet there is some doubt if the anti-Catholic forces will soon take up the one inexpugnable line of defence against their antagonists. Just now the un-Catholic man who discusses the question of the Bible in schools is apt to be either an uneasy unbeliever, who is willing to use anybody's help in order to prevent anything like a public recognition of the existence of anything immortal, or else he is an uneasy Protestant who cannot quite bring himself to say, in so many words, that there may perhaps be times and seasons when it would be as well not to read the Scriptures in public. But the question which the Roman Catholics are now presenting for trial before the people is not going to get its settlement from the infidel, so-called, nor from the Protestant, so-called. Should a republic spend money for the educating of its citizens? Does it not need intelligent citizens if it would live? Is it not, then, justified in taxing this generation of its citizens to the end that the coming generation may be fit to carry on the Government? Roman Catholics—so far forth as they hold fast the Syllabus—so far forth as they are good Roman Catholics—are they not bad citizens of a Republic, of a State, which depends for existence on the intellectual freedom of each man in it? May not the State, then, give, at the very least, a colorless, unreligious education—an education of the citizen as citizen? The answers generally given to these questions will determine the immediate result of the discussion of the question whether or not we shall insist on keeping our Bible in the schools; and there are growing indications that the battle is not going to be risked in an untenable position.

—Perhaps some of our readers have read in the Sunday World a series of dramatic criticisms of remarkable pungency, of what seemed to us much soundness, and of an independence which may be called refreshing; for what is more vapid than most dramatic criticism; and how often is the intelligent theatre-goer pleased with what the dramatic critic says to him when he takes up the morning paper to see what is said of the performance which he witnessed over-night? Indeed, if the intelligent theatre-goer ceases to be a theatre-goer any longer, is it not partly because of his disgust with the whole tribe of critics? To read most of the newspaper comments on almost any actor or representation at a play leads one to suspect that he must have been among people who had not one opinion or feeling in regard to the drama in common with him. And this of itself operates discouragingly upon him. It was very agreeable, then, to happen upon a man who seemed to be owned by no manager, to have unjust partiality for no actor or actress, to have a body of sound views about the dramatic art, to have a forcible way of expressing them, and to express them without any fear. We have before us as we write a small book, called "The Romance of a Piano," which is very obviously by the writer of whom we speak—though we should not ask others to think so well of him as a writer as we do if they made acquaintance with him only as the writer of this pamphlet. Here he gives himself the rein, and Walt Whitmanizes and Shepardizes after the strictly sensational manner of the authoress of "Charles Auchester," and makes epigrams, and indulges in smartness and impertinence after Charles Reade's fashion; and passes criticisms that remind one that Dr. Johnson called music the most decent of the sensual pleasures—or something like that; and philosophizes and Gallicizes, and, in general, allows himself a deal more elbow-room than seems good for him. Still, some of what he says is suggestive certainly, and possibly worth attention, though our musical readers will do better than we in pronouncing on his judgments of Thalberg, Mr. H. Sanderson, Mrs. Minnie Hauck, and Hersee, and Parepa-Rosa, and Miss Kellogg, and Miss Alida Topp, and Grisi, and Malibran, and La Grange, and a hundred more of the singers and players of old days and of to-day. And we may as well, too, leave it for them to say whether or not "a piano is magic, minus empiricism," and whether or not "the piano is the newspaper of music." We confess to a barbaric inclination to hold with the Mr. Grapple on whom our author heaps shame that "what the piano lacks is supernaturality; percussion must always be fatal to that shadowy lyricism which is the breath of an emotion;" and that the universal instrument is about as well calculated to express opinions as sentiment. And now, at the risk of spoiling the effect of all we have said about our author's dramatic criticism, shall we say that the pamphlet is no less than a piece of advertising? That is precisely what it is. Long, it seems, there have been in the field "two rival manufacturers of wheelbarrows with patent brakes;" now, at last, there has arisen a maker of true pianos. What his name is we do not say. But it is rather barefaced in him to speak loftily of his rivals being great advertisers.

—The Harvard Advocate for December 24 contains a good article, expressing the feelings of some one who wants to love art, and thinks he might if only it were shown him. It seems that he can't get to see the Gray collection of engravings, which, as we showed last week, are almost wholly inaccessible. The engravings should be considered as stored, temporarily, and we hope not for too long a time, but stored for safe-keeping until the day comes when they can be shown. It is impossible to exhibit them in the alcove where they are now; it is, perhaps, impossible to find room to hang on walls or display in cases any considerable number of the prints; it is evidently impossible to show them as they are, without a staff of competent custodians. While they remain in their portfolios the only way in which any one can visit them is by taking the time of the curator for just as many hours as the student himself remains. A system of appointments, as with a dentist, is the only plan that occurs to us as a possible improvement in the present state of things. But that Mr. Thies and Mr. Abbot will be ready to prepare wall-cases or frames, and to make a selection of the prints for exhibition, and thus to glorify the collection and the art of engraving, as soon as space and a little money are to be had for the purpose, there is no doubt whatever. Nobody is any better off for the seclusion of this important collection.

PARIS GARDENS.*

Mr. Robinson has given us in this book a large amount of interesting reading upon a very entertaining subject, and, although it has been partly published twice before, it is still fresh, and to most American readers it will be entirely new. Mr. Robinson does not tell us how he became so well acquainted with all the details of his subject, but his writing shows that he is possessed of a great deal of horticultural knowledge and enthusiasm, combined with a refined taste, and that he is able to express his praise and condemnation in a suitable manner. He went to Paris as horticultural correspondent of the London Times for the great European exhibition, and also contributed articles to the Field and the Gardener's Chronicle. Last year he printed some of his letters, with additions, in a book called "Gleanings from French Gardens;" and now he has republished the letters and gleanings with considerable new matter and a great number of plates and illustrations. Each time he has touched the subject he has improved it, and we owe him thanks for his perseverance. In this book he leads the reader through the gardens and parks of Paris and Versailles, and then takes him to the mushroom caves under the city, in the deserted stone quarries, and to the market gardens and orchards of the most successful horticulturists who supply Paris with fruits and vegetables. Whilst he points out and commends the improvements and novelties in the French methods of culture, he sees and condemns bad taste, pettiness of detail, and clumsy and old-fashioned habits and customs.

He gives many plans and sketches of the parks and gardens of the city and the royal palaces, and describes in illustrated text the popular and most desirable ferns, palms, and other sub-tropicals which are used for decoration. Whilst describing these plants, he takes us to the great green and hot-houses which supply the municipality with the materials for summer display, and shows how well and economically they are managed. These green-houses and gardens, which are sustained by the municipality for the supply of decorative plants, give a good idea of the interest which Parisians feel in horticultural beauty and effect, and the extent to which they are willing to spend money to decorate their city and give enjoyment to their citizens. As they must use an immense number of plants, which would cost a fabulous sum if purchased of nurserymen and gardeners, they have established nurseries for trees and shrubs, and the Jardin Fleuriste for tender plants used for decorating the parks, gardens, and squares of the city. The plants are raised here at very cheap rates; for, though many palms, ferns, and rare sub-tropicals, which are beautiful somewhat in proportion to their age and size, are costly even here, the great mass of bedding-plants cost but about one and a half cents each. But even at this price the bill is large. They send out annually 400,000 pelargoniums. Any plant worthy of notice is propagated by the thousands, "thirty thousand being the opening quantity for a new thing of promise." "During the past autumn fifty thousand cuttings of one kind of fuchsia were put in in one week. There is one winter garden, one hundred and twenty feet long by forty feet wide, stored with conservatory plants, and it is not unusual to use ten thousand plants at the Hotel de Ville in decoration for a single entertainment."

Leaving the glass-houses, Mr. Robinson describes the best kind of trees for city planting, and shows why many kinds, which in the country are most desirable, will not thrive in crowded streets and cities. When he leaves the ornamental grounds and takes up the practical culture of fruit and vegetables, he seems equally at home, and surprises the reader with the fulness and minuteness of his practical details. He seems to have seen everything worth notice, to have forgotten nothing, and freely compares the best Paris can do with the best London and its vicinity have produced. The fidelity with which he has observed, and the care with which he has collected his facts, make this the most important horticultural book which has been published, and render it valuable to every lover of rural development.

In all the arts progress depends somewhat on the accumulation of experiences; and, although men of genius are born who attain to excellence without much regard for the traditions and practices of their predecessors or contemporaries, the mass of the community progress slowly and arrive at last only to a moderate degree of superiority. In growing fruits and vegetables, America is quite as forward as France or England, and will probably surpass them, because such large numbers of our people have gardens of their own, and rival each other in producing the best fruits and vegetables in the cheapest manner. The results which follow from the combined skill and capital of European cultivators will stimulate a thousand competitors in America as soon as they get an idea of the direction in which improvement might be made; and before Mr. Robinson's book is known to a thousand American readers, his best teaching will have gone to a hundred thousand firesides through the horticultural magazines, whose editors will find in it a mine of valuable editorials, until they exhaust all that they can take without detection. But, however near we may approach Europe in kitchen gardening, we are neophytes in matters of landscape and ornamental gardening, and for that reason we ought especially to welcome Mr. Robinson's book at this time, when every respectable-sized city in the country, prompted by what New York has done, is talking about parks. There are half-a-dozen in embryo now which may possibly be some day developed into beautiful works of nature and art. If Congress could pass and enforce a law that every city thinking of a park should be obliged to buy one hundred copies of Robinson, and compel as many of its principal citizens to read and comprehend what public grounds and gardens are, and how difficult it is to make them beautiful, we should in another generation rival Europe in this respect as much as in fruit culture. But when we compare the best things we have with the common works of Paris, we see how far we have to go before we can show anything really worth asking a foreigner of taste to look at. Nor is it necessary for us to make great parks to find out our ignorance and recognize how little we know of the resources of landscape art. We have the Central Park—a very highly adorned and architectural piece of work—where nature has been compelled to submit too much to the dictates of man and the requirements of architecture. Prospect Park, in Brooklyn, is growing into beauty and finish, and seems to promise a simplicity and gracefulness of treatment that will set it far in advance of the Central. Philadelphia proposes, in her Fairmount Park, to show how twenty-seven hundred acres of land can be treated grandly and simply, and at the same time have sufficient richness of finish and variety of detail to place it amongst the greatest works of the kind. But if we name all the proposed great parks of the country, and concede to them an ultimate perfection of design and execution, we shall still be far behind Paris, for we have no small parks or squares that are anything but a disgrace to the landscape gardening of the age.

It seems to be conceded that, if anything less than twenty-five to fifty acres of land be left in a city for a square or for ventilation, it can have no other treatment than to be cut up by transverse alleys into a series of plots of poor grass, the sides of the walks to be shaded by elms, maples, or lindens, with a fountain or statue or flagstaff in the centre. This laying out, with some slight change in the arrangement of the paths and the kinds of trees used, may be seen in every large town and city of this country. No wonder that, with such objects to look at, our people develop no taste for the beauties of landscape gardening, and believe that anybody can lay out a park. Anybody would deserve pity who could not produce such a thing as the average small park of our cities; and if such places are examples of the landscape gardening of America, and of what our people are satisfied with, we may despair of ever creating any works which can deserve a name or place beside Parisian improvements. In Paris, besides the great parks, such as the Bois de Boulogne, the Bois de Vincennes, the Champs Élysées, the Luxembourg Gardens, and the Tuileries, etc., there are numerous small parks, such as the Parc de Monceaux, of twenty-two acres, which cost $220,000 for improvements; the Parc des Buttes Chaumont, on the site of old and abandoned plaster quarries, and containing about forty-five acres. This park was begun in 1864 and finished in 1868, costing about $700,000. Besides these, there are at least eleven squares, varying in size from three-fourths to three acres, costing for embellishments from $30 to $300,000. Many of these squares have been made in thickly populated parts of the city for ventilation, and to give the poor equal opportunities with the rich to enjoy beauty. In the Parc de Monceaux, the visitor is led by well-arrayed paths through woods, between flower-beds rich with gayly colored plants and picturesque with palms and ferns and other fine foliage plants, over lawns ever fresh with emerald greenness, beside artificial waters, sometimes seeing a really distant and varied landscape, at others arrested by some local object of interest. The place seems by wise management ten times as large as it is. Compare it with the Public Garden in Boston, an area of about the same size, where paths twisted into meaningless curves lead the visitor into cul-de-sacs, or confront him with common shrubs destitute of marked beauty of flower or foliage; where there are flower-beds planted without effect or meaning, and good plants ruined by bad combinations—a really fine opportunity thrown away; or compare the Square des Batignolles, three acres diversified with masses of flowers and sub-tropicals, abundantly shaded with fine trees, ornamented with vases and statues, with any of the Philadelphia squares of about the same size, for instance, the one between Eighteenth, Nineteenth, and Vine Streets, or Union or Madison Square of New York, or Franklin and Blackstone Squares of Boston, or any of the squares in any of the American cities—all of them dreary wastes of poor grass, cut up by gravel walks and bestridden by ill-selected trees, whose chief merit is uniformity of badness. Lindens, elms, poplars, and soft maples give whatever variety or beauty there is of plantation; and maid-servants, trundling babies, candy pedlars, photograph vendors, lung-testers, and hand-organ grinders furnish the objects of interest.

* "Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris. By W. Robinson, F.L.S." New York: Scribner, Welford & Co. London: John Murray. 1869. Pp. 640.

It seems hardly to have entered into the American mind that it is worth while to study out what can be made or done with a piece of land to give it beauty and variety; nor can we hope for anything better until we can raise by some means the standard of rural and municipal improvements in the country, and stimulate some such rivalry and emulation in æsthetics as already exists in practical horticulture. It is but a short time since city officials believed that any money spent in getting advice and plans of an architect was wasted. Any builder could, after he was told what were the economical wants of a new building, build it as well as if some theoretical man should plan for it; but at last the beauty and possibilities of architecture have become sufficiently apparent to ensure that great works shall be put into the hands of competent architects to design and superintend them, and consequently our cities are beginning to exhibit a great improvement in the style and beauty of buildings.

In time, the art of landscape gardening will be understood, and men will be encouraged to give patience and thought to learning its details and theories, but hitherto the navvy and job gardener have had the work all their own way, and have compelled the landscape gardener to languish for want of work, and to see the public money and opportunities wasted in producing commonplace ugliness. A general knowledge of what Paris has done, which can be read and seen—thanks to the abundant illustrations in Mr. Robinson's book—will do more to educate the public to a conception of what it might and ought to have for its money than any amount of talking, writing, or general theorizing, and we would advise every municipality, which pretends to have even a few law-books for general references on its shelves, to add the "Park Promenades and Gardens of Paris" to the number.

FREEMAN'S NORMAN CONQUEST.*

THE third volume of Mr. Freeman's Norman Conquest—the chief and central one—will assuredly be welcomed by all who have read the earlier volumes. It possesses the merits and the defects with which Mr. Freeman's readers are already familiar. The graphic narrative; the vigorous imagination, through which the author attains a quick personal sympathy with the characters and the spirit of the age of which he writes; the careful analysis and calm judgment of authorities; the broad view which makes the history of England tell the contemporary history of Europe as well; these are qualities which warrant us in giving our author a high rank among historians. At the same time, there is a mannerism which gains upon him, far from unpleasing even now, but which might easily develop a nervously affected style; an overfondness for historical parallels; a habit of repeating again and again a favorite idea, or such a phrase as "this year of wonders;" prolixity now and then; proneness to dwell upon the thought and feelings that would be natural under such and such circumstances (see p. 416); and an occasional careless tautology, such as (p. 431) "it was perfectly in character that an invader who assumed the character," etc. These are slight criticisms, and the faults they note hardly impair one's enjoyment in the book; still, these are just the habits that will grow unpleasantly upon a writer unless he keeps upon his guard.

Apart from these trivial defects of style, we find in the present volume a sort of consciousness, which detracts a little from the freshness and earnestness of the style. It is as if the writer felt that this volume was to be his crowning work, and could never rid himself of a nervous anxiety to be worthy of himself and of his theme.

It has been Mr. Freeman's fault all along that he has loaded his pages with too many names and trivial events. Perhaps this fault is even less apparent in this volume than in the earlier ones; but we cannot help thinking that he strains a point in the account of the battle of Senlac, and tries a little too hard to make out a detailed analysis of tactical movements such as would be practicable for Blenheim or Gettysburg. Undoubtedly we should be glad of such an account, but it is impossible not to feel a little suspicious of some of Mr. Freeman's circumstantiality. For instance, p. 476: "Three generations of that great line (of Godwine) were gathered beneath the standard of its chief. There stood the aged Ælfwig (Godwine's brother), with his monk's cowl beneath his helmet. There stood young Hakon, the son of Swegen, atoning for his father's crimes. And closer still than all, the innermost centre of that glorious ring, stood the kingly three (Harold, Gyrth, and Leofwine), brothers in life and death." In a foot-note we find a quotation taken from Wace's "Roman de Rou:" "Envirun els lor parenz furent;" and then follows: "On the strength of this I have ventured to introduce Hakon as well as Ælfwig. The abbot undoubtedly was there, and, if Harold had brought Hakon back from Normandy, he would hardly be away." Now, much as we enjoy the picturesque details of the text, it must be confessed that Hakon's presence rests on very weak evidence.

Such an error as this is more of a pity, because the account of the battle is in general very fine, and appears to be grounded upon a better understanding of the authorities than former writers have had. It has been usual to follow Wace in placing the wounding of Harold early in the fight, and the death of Gyrth late—even after that of Harold. Mr. Freeman makes a more probable account by accepting the evidence of Guy of Amiens and the Bayeux Tapestry, so that he places the death of Gyrth and Leofwine before the feigned flight, and Harold's wound only a few moments before his death. This and other matters of detail are fully discussed in the Appendix; and we share Mr. Freeman's regret at being obliged to reject much of the romantic incidents of the battle of Stamfordbridge, which rests only on the late saga of Harold Hardrada. A decisive consideration here, and one very characteristic of Mr. Freeman, is his pointing out that the saga represents the English army "as furnished with a strong force of cavalry and archers,"—that is, as equipped in Snorro's own age, when the English had adopted Norman tactics. In the eleventh century they fought on foot and with battle-axes. We must confess that our author fails to justify his hero for delivering battle at Senlac in the manner he did. Granting—as seems to be made out—that he had all the troops he needed on the spot, it cannot but be admitted that the grave mistake was made of risking the fate of England upon the chances of one pitched battle. Seeing that William had already landed, there was no need of haste in fighting; if William would shortly receive reinforcements, Harold would receive more. By pushing directly against the invader, he did just what that invader wished him to do; and the event justified William's foresight. At any rate, it would seem that common prudence would have provided a reserve, and would have given it in charge to his best officer. We have a discussion of Gyrth's advice that the king should tarry at London, and suffer him to go to meet the invader. No doubt Harold was right in declining this advice; but why not reverse it, and leave Gyrth himself to lead the reserves? It is clear that the reason England fell so easy a prey after the battle was because she had no head. Now Gyrth seems to have been the born leader she lacked—next to Harold himself, the one man in England best fitted to head her cause. Even Edgar the Atheling might have triumphed with Gyrth for his minister and general. If, then, it is true that we see at Senlac "the old Teutonic tactics carried on that day to perfection by the master skill of Harold," it must appear that the Teutonic tactics were too rude and headstrong to match the Norman—consisted too much in hard knocks. Harold was out-generalled, not out-fought, by William.

* "The History of the Norman Conquest of England: Its Causes and its Results. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College." Volume III. The Reign of Harold and the Interregnum. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. 1869. 8vo, pp. 768.

Nothing in this volume is finer or more instructive than the relation shown between the Norman conquest of England and the great schemes of the See of Rome. This event was the first grand step in the career of the papacy; once made an arbiter of thrones, it was easy for the pontiff to take new and more arrogant steps. Hildebrand's success against Harold emboldened him to assert his claims against Henry IV., and prepared the way for the astounding presumption of Innocent III. and Innocent IV. The real crime of England, Mr. Freeman says, p. 284, "her crime in the eyes of Rome, the crime to punish which the crusade of William was approved and blessed, was the independence still retained by the island church and nation. . . . It was a policy worthy of William to send to the threshold of the apostles to crave their blessing on his intended work of reducing the rebellious land. And it was a policy worthy of one greater than William himself to make even William, for once in his life, the instrument of purposes yet more daring, yet more far-sighted, than his own. . . . William was sent on an errand which none but William could perform, but of which William himself knew not the full bearing. Under his rule no man could doubt that England would be subject to none but him. With William for her king, she was as little likely to be the unresisting slave of Rome as if Harold himself should continue to guard her. But a seed was sown which was to bear fruit in other times and under weaker rulers. When Rome once took upon her to adjudge the crown of England, the path was opened for that day of shame and sorrow when a descendant of William stooped to receive tl e crown of England as a fief of Rome."

Again, we are struck with the passage (p. 549) in which William's position is compared with that of Cnut, in such a way as to explain the readiness of the English to accept his rule after the great battle: "We must bear in mind that men were living who could remember how an earlier foreign invader had been changed into an English king, into a king who had won his place among the noblest of England's native worthies. . . . William, in truth, promised better than Cnut in every way. Instead of a half-heathen sea-king, he was the model prince of Europe, the valiant soldier, the wise ruler, the pious son of the church, the prince who, among unparalleled difficulties, had raised his paternal duchy to a state of prosperity and good government which made it the wonder and the envy of Continental lands." But it was precisely because of these qualities—because William was the first prince in Europe, and felt that he had a right to despise the civilization and the institutions of the rude islanders, that he became a cruel and haughty tyrant; while Cnut possessed the teachable humility which made him recognize and gladly accept the higher culture of his new kingdom. After all, Mr. Freeman gracefully recognizes William's work in history, p. 403: "He came, a chief of Danes and Saxons who had fallen from their first love, who had cast away the laws and the speech of their forefathers, but who now came to the Teutonic island to be won into the Teutonic fold, to be washed clean from the traces of their sojourn in Roman lands, and to win for themselves, among the brethren whom they were to meet as momentary enemies, a right to an equal share in the name, the laws, and the glories of Teutonic England."

Poems by George Alfred Townsend. (Washington: Rhodes & Ralph. 1870.)—This volume is, perhaps, better than one might have expected from Mr. Townsend; yet we may see in the poems the same man displaying the same qualities that are shown in the prose which "G. A. T." or "Gath" has written for the newspapers. Impatience of thought, and what seems like fervor of feeling, expressed with a strenuousness and violence of rhetoric, generally bad, that is really fatiguing to the reader, cannot conceal the fact that this writer is a man of mental ability, of some insight and poetic capacity. Perhaps, one thinks, it might be justifiable to prophesy of him that he would one day do some good work, if one could feel sure that he would ever become so chastened in spirit, and so trained in thinking and so well informed, as that he could employ good literary methods in the working-up of a sufficient store of materials. There is, however, still the doubt, when one is disposed to think best of him, whether he is not of that class of promising beginners who, should they lose the extravagancies that seem to mar certain excellences of nature, would not, with these, lose also what power they have to do anything at all out of the common. And still, if he apparently has next to no taste, and no great knowledge of life, and less knowledge of good literature, so that his volume is full of all sorts of crudities in matter and all sorts of weakness and cheapness of manner, he nevertheless does often seem to show among his rubbish some genuine imaginative capacity, some force of honest feeling, and, what is rarer among our smaller poets, a faith apparently not consciously held, or we should call it a courageous belief, in the poetry that lies about him in the rough common things of the American life with which he is familiar. He is never puling, neither; and if anybody wishes to see "confidence in our America"—confidence reaching forward to the future, and also a confidence which makes the present glow with the light of the greatness that is to be, we advise him to stay his soul with "America the Hunter" and "Wild-cat Junction" respectively.

Wild-cat Junction is a railway station in Illinois, and it is not a nice place:

> "A woman in a calico dress, who smokes her pipe as she sits;
> A hairy man, in a slouched hat, who whittles and yawns and spits;
> A travelling Jew, asleep by the stove, with his head on a carpet-bag;
> And the wind a-cursing out of doors like a child-forsaken hag.
>
> "Two railroads chased across a moor by a ghastly lantern's gleam,
> The 'bob-tail train' gone howling away like half of a nightmare dream,
> The naked station caught between, in the Junction's iron vice,
> And one stark gin-mill over the way, with Hoosiers throwing dice."

The poet goes on thus for a few more lines, "wreaking himself on expression" at the expense of the railroads, and then he paints a dismal picture of this region and the people round about:

> "God help the brave and sallow folk who farm this Western waste!
> The young men withered with the chills; the young girls weary-faced;
> The savage children chasing down the lean, lank geese and pigs;
> The gaunt wife scolding her old man, who mopes and swears and swigs.
>
> "How lone the cracked and parched world, save when the trains go by!
> How lone the river-beds so broad, scorched up and scooped and dry!
> How lone the flat, shorn fields of stalks bestrewn with stump and chunk!
> How lone the scrubby woods that knew no satyr but the skunk!"
>
> "All year the hutted homes look down the rutted roads of slough;
> All life, the stunted, shaggy nags, dejected, munch and plough;"
>
> "Hard lines of cunning avarice the strong men's faces rift,
> And garbs and tables primitive and desperate with thrift
> Show life, like all the landscapes, stark and starveling as the scope
> Of souls immortal, by their greed, but ignorant of hope."

Yet still among these people grow up some wondrous men, who look out and see leading past their plank-built towns "the pilgrimage of Christendom from bondage to the light," and who become filled with a great-hearted spirit of freedom and a faith in humanity. Such was Lincoln—"husks filled his belly, but he saw his father's house afar"—such were Boone and Crockett; and them the poet adjures the West to follow after—

> "O West! take heed that in your wealth your leaner dreams come true.
> The hopefulness of all the poor is delegate to you"— not far from a fine couplet, if one knew precisely what it means. But thinking things out is not Mr. Townsend's forte.

Here is one scream from the eagle, which is given in the other piece we have mentioned, and with which we must close our extracts:

> "Over the deep comes the crack of the rifle:
> The hunter, America, leans on the sun;
> Warm on his shoulder the dawn breaks in glory
> When o'er the world besides daylight is done;
> Straight as the pine-shaft, strong as the rivers,
> Trampling a forest, a peak at a stride,
> Green leap the farm-lands under his shadow,—
> A sea for his mother—a sea for his bride!"

As we have said, we do not feel like prophesying whether our author is ever going to do anything worth doing in literature. He has, perhaps, too long been taking this unthinking, gaudy sort of stuff for tolerable, and more than that, and perhaps it is too late for him to learn restraint and to cultivate his mind and taste. It is not, however, too late for some of his imitators, who have his extravagancies in their finger-ends rather than in their blood, to learn that it is intolerably bad, and to resolve to cease from being "correspondents of eccentricity and genius," and to learn to do well—at least till some impeachment trial, or capture of some new Wilkes Booth, shall release them all again from the yoke of reason.

A better piece than we have mentioned is "The Circuit Preacher," which deals dramatically with the somewhat grotesque but touching figure of an almost broken-down Methodist preacher, whom the Conference meeting once more condemns to take his sickly family and the discourses on which he prides himself back to the aguish, sandy Eastern Shore of Maryland. This is, indeed, good—weakened, more or less, by its rhetoric, especially by the sonority of that kind of geographical eloquence which so many of our poets have practised—

"'Midst foresters of Nanticoke or heathen of Tangiers"— but on the whole more simple, natural, and effective than anything else in the book; and absolutely as well as relatively good. "The Miracle of the Gargoyles," too, is worth looking at; and worth looking at more than once, perhaps, are the lines entitled "Mother."

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.*

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Brinton (Dr. D. G.) and Napheys (Dr. G. H.), Personal Beauty	(W. J. Holland)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 18, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Cusack (M. F.), Life of St. Patrick, Parts 1–4, swd	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)	1 20
Galton (F.), Hereditary Genius	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Green (H.), Shakespeare and the Emblem Writers	(J. W. Bouton)	10 00
Metcalf (R.), Letter and Spirit	(Am. Unit. Assn.)	0 60
The Law Almanac for 1870	(Hurd & Houghton)	2 00

Fine Arts.

OUR AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

AMERICAN.

In a former article we spoke of our German musical clubs, their system of organization, the work they accomplished, and the pleasures they enjoyed. In the present one we will refer to the best known of those musical societies of the city composed of Americans.

And first let us say that the great want that we have in this direction is a chorus worthy of the greatness of the metropolis. So many jealousies are and always have been at work that it has seemed impossible to gather together in one body a really strong choral force. We have a sufficiency of good singers, but they have subdivided themselves into little bands, and dissipated their strength without any compensating gain.

We look forward to the time when some man with energy and brains and money for the work will collect together a society capable of performing the great works of the oratorio writers in a fitting manner, and will provide it with a suitable singing-hall. Perhaps the forthcoming Beethoven festival may stimulate the right spirit and help on this desirable end. Meantime Boston, with its noble Handel and Haydn Society, looks almost with derision on our feeble attempts at chorus singing. And we can find our only consolation in referring with pride to the glorious orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, to which no other city in the Union has one at all to compare in numbers or in excellence, and which indeed may even challenge comparison with the Gewandhaus, the Paris Conservatoire, and the other famous orchestras of Europe.

The oldest of our choral societies and the most numerous is the Harmonic. The old Mendelssohn Union was an offshoot from the Harmonic, and the Berge Choral Union is an offshoot from the present Mendelssohn Union—a very fair example of the way in which our clubs dilute their strength. The Harmonic Society was organized in 1852, and has been, during most of its existence, under the leadership of Bristow, Morgan, and Ritter—the last-named being at present the conductor and main-stay of the society. The best gift that this organization brings to the public is the annual performance on Christmas night of the Messiah, a noble task persisted in steadfastly for eighteen years. This is about the only public appearance that the society at present makes. They work diligently at the great compositions of the masters at their practice hall, which is the lecture-room of Dr. Crosby's church on Fourth Avenue. Much discouragement exists in the society: firstly, because they cannot get their members to attend rehearsals; and secondly, because the public won't interest itself in oratorio music. This discouragement has extended itself to the conductor, Mr. Ritter, who appeared the other day in the World in a very gloomy letter, in which he refers to the many obstacles that he and the society have to contend with. Out of some three hundred members, not more than seventy or eighty can be gathered at the rehearsals, and this is a chill upon the enthusiasm of those who do come. Heavy fines fail to meet the difficulty, for then the delinquents resign. The Mendelssohn Union languishes under much the same trouble. Last year it received a stimulus from the leadership of Theodore Thomas and the co-operation of his orchestra, and brought out under these auspices some compositions of the highest excellence; but Mr. Thomas and his orchestra having "gone a-roaming," the Union has disappeared from public notice.

The Berge Choral Union is, as we have said, composed of secessionists from the Mendelssohn Union. It is under the direction of Mr. William Berge, the well-known organist of St. Stephen's church, and though not very efficient in point of numbers is full of zeal and of faith in its leader. This society has given but one concert this season, and that took place on the 28th of December, at the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. An oratorio by Gounod, entitled Tobias, was then brought out for the first time, so far as we are aware, in this country. The president of the association is Mr. John A. Godfrey; its affairs are administered with discretion; and the compositions that are performed are of a high standard, and mostly of a religious character.

The youngest organization devoted to the practice of ecclesiastical music is the Church Music Association. It came into existence the present winter, and gave its first concert on the 12th of January. The other societies of which we have spoken, and indeed the most of those to which we shall refer in this article, are made up of members of the different church choirs of the city; but the Church Music Association has recruited from another class—those of our amateurs of the highest social position. The enterprise was set on foot by some of our most distinguished citizens, and upon the executive committee are the names of ladies equally well known. The chorus is composed of nearly all the most famous of the amateurs of the city, such as Miss Parker, Miss Reed, the Rev. Wm. H. Cooke, Mr. Horace Barry, Mrs. Woolsey Johnson, Mrs. Geo. T. Strong, Mrs. Arthur, Mrs. David Watts, and others of like character. This organization has a wide field entirely to itself, for there are hundreds of amateurs of musical cultivation in this city who have never felt willing to join any chorus that sang for money, or, in other words, to become public singers, but who are only too glad to identify themselves with a society like this, supported by the voluntary subscriptions of the members, giving private concerts, and having only invited audiences. The concerts take place at Steinway Hall. The first one, given on the 12th instant, was undoubtedly, in point at least of the character of the audience, the most brilliant ever known in this city. As the invitations intimated to the guests that they were expected to come in evening dress, the large hall was filled with an audience of unusually brilliant not to say gorgeous appearance. The chorus was even more elaborately dressed than the audience, and the honest German orchestra looked thoroughly astonished to find itself hemmed in between such unaccustomed splendors. The Duke of Wellington used to say that the dandies made, in a fight, his bravest officers; and certainly this chorus in its powdered hair and diamonds sang as valiantly as though it were dressed in homespun, and had come to the concert in an omnibus.

The expenses are defrayed by subscription. Fifty persons formed the nucleus, subscribing one hundred dollars each, and having some twenty-five tickets for each concert and rehearsal, wherewith to invite their friends. The music was Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and the first part of Oberon. The conductor is Dr. James Pech, who received his musical doctorate from Oxford. There are various opinions as to his competency as a conductor, though there is but one as to his energy and good-will. At the rehearsals his frantic shouts at his chorus can be heard over the din of chorus and instruments, and his natural energy even at the concert found expression in beating time with his feet, greatly to the annoyance of his audience and the discomfiture of his orchestra. Mr. Pech has been accustomed to drill refractory choir-boys, and treats the "silken wonders" who compose his chorus much after the fashion that he has applied to the unruly urchins. A German orchestra is always restless under any but a German leader, and so there is some trouble already, and quite probably more brewing, in the would-be harmonious Church Association. Two more concerts are to be given by the society this winter, one on the 1st of March and the other on the 18th of May. At the first, Haydn's Sixteenth Mass and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise are to be performed; at the latter, Beethoven's difficult Mass in C, which will sift the pretensions and capacities of this chorus of the elect to the uttermost, and the second part of Oberon.

Several of our leading teachers of music have clubs under their direction. The most conspicuous of these are those under the charge severally of Mr. Rivarde, Mr. Abella, and Mr. Mosenthal. This last gentleman, who is the accomplished organist of Calvary church, has the direction of two clubs, one for mixed voices, the moving spirits in which are ladies, and which is to make its first public appearance at a concert to be given at the Christian Association Rooms on the 29th of this month, for some charity, and will then sing some of Mendelssohn's four-part songs and a cantata by Spohr.

The other association is composed of male voices alone, and is known as the Mendelssohn Glee Club. This society consists of about thirty singing members and seventy-five subscribers. They give four concerts during the winter to invited guests. Mr. Mosenthal has brought the club to a high point of finish, and has made them formidable rivals of the Liederkranz and the Arion, which societies they equal in the delicacy of their singing, though the superior numbers of the Germans give them otherwise a great advantage. The music performed by the Mendelssohn Glee Club consists entirely of German four-part songs, though English versions of the words are used instead of the original. The next concert of this society takes place on the 26th of this month at Lyric Hall. The club is usually assisted by some distinguished amateur vocalist and a pianist.

The Eight o'Clock Club—so called from its hour of assembling—is under the direction of Signor Abella. Its rehearsals are held at the private houses of the members. Miss Chapman is the President of the Club, Mr. Pierrepont Edwards (English Vice-Consul) is the Vice-President, Dr. Mason the Secretary, and Signor Martinez (an artist of some distinction) the Treasurer. This society confines itself mostly to the Italian school of music. They give three concerts this winter, the first of which is to take place on the 26th of this month, the other two later in the season. Some admirable soloists belong to the Eight o'Clock Club, and their concerts, to which only invited guests are admitted, are of a very select and social character, and, like those of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, have all the characteristics of private drawing-room concerts on a large scale.

The Rivarde Club is under the leadership of the well-known teacher of vocal music whose name it bears. It consists mostly of those who are, or who at one time have been, his pupils. The club has shown great enterprise, and last year organized an orchestra, partly amateur and partly professional, which accompanied the soloists and play overtures by Mozart, Auber, and other composers. The concerts are on a very extensive scale, and are given at Apollo Hall. About two thousand invitations are issued to each concert. As in the case of the Church Music Association, the Mendelssohn Glee Club, and the Eight o'Clock Club, cards of admission are obtainable only for love, not money. Many of Mr. Rivarde's pupils have shown great proficiency and talent, and have made the concerts of the club of a greater excellence than most of the public concerts given in the city. It is always a pleasure for a vocalist to sing with an orchestra: it sustains the voice so admirably and supports the singer in every way, and this advantage the members of this club have over all the others.

It remains only to say a word about our madrigal clubs. Of these, unfortunately, there are two where there should be but one. The same lack of unity and the same feelings of jealousy that have disintegrated our oratorio societies have broken the madrigal society into two parts. One half is singing under the direction of Dr. Brown, an eminent homœopathic physician, and besides the madrigals is rehearsing the fine "Antigone" music written by Mendelssohn to the Sophocles tragedy; while the other half, under the leadership of Mr. James A. Johnson, gave on Tuesday evening a concert at Steinway Hall, consisting of an admirably selected programme of these enjoyable fresh vigorous old works.

It will readily be seen from the brief account we have given of our amateur clubs that there is a great deal of musical talent in this city, and that it is crystallizing into forms that will lead to great pleasure for those who participate as well as for those who listen. It is worthy of remark that none of these clubs are led by Americans, which is another evidence of what we said in a former article that people here were simply in a state of pupilage as to music. Most of the clubs we have named have sprung up within a few years, and it is reasonable to suppose that as musical taste is fostered, encouraged, and developed more will follow. The tendency of them all is excellent. They cultivate a taste for a high class of music, they substitute a refined and rational mode of enjoyment for endless dancing parties, they bring people of similar tastes into closer social contact, strengthen the bonds of friendship, and in every way are a help to culture of every kind.

THE CHILD'S BIBLE.
LARGE PRINT; LARGE PICTURES.

Being a Selection from the Holy Bible in the Words of the Authorized Version, with large, full-page Illustrations, especially designed for children by the best Artists of the day.

Handsomely bound in gilt cloth $12 00
Full bound in best Levant morocco antique . . 18 00

The following are a few brief extracts out of many testimonies to the plan and execution of THE CHILD'S BIBLE which have reached the editor and publishers:

(From the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.)
"As far as I have been able to look into 'The Child's Bible' the result has pleased me much, and I trust that the publication will be extremely useful. It is infinitely better to adhere to the words of Scripture in the narration of Scripture stories."

(From the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.)
"It is a thoroughly satisfactory book, and just the volume for presents, etc. A very good book for Christian reading."

(From the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH.)
"The idea of substituting the words of Sacred Scripture itself for any paraphrases of them, is certainly an excellent one."

(From the Rev. CANON PAYNE SMITH, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford.)
"This beautiful volume seems to me a very decided improvement upon the Bibles rewritten for children, which generally are in very mawkish English, and have lost all the noble rhythm and simple grandeur of our authorized version. I heartily trust that it will supersede all these works, and become the Child's Bible."

(From the Rev. W. B. MACKENZIE, M.A., Vicar of St. James's, Holloway.)
"Of the typography and grandly attractive illustrations there can be but one opinion. You have certainly rendered good service by this volume."

(From the Rev. J. C. RYLE, M.A., Vicar of Stradbroke.)
"It is a very handsome volume, and likely to be very acceptable to those for whom it is intended. If I had had it ten years ago, I should have been very thankful. I should have found it very useful with my five children."

(From the Rev. JOHN CUMMING, D.D.)
"The idea is happy, and the execution not less so."

(From the Rev. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.)
"You have admirably provided for a great necessity."

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
596 Broadway, New York

NOW READY,
Putnam's Magazine
FOR FEBRUARY.

CONTENTS.

I. A Woman's Right: A Novel.—II. Mary Clemmer Ames.
II. Virginia—Old and New. H. T. Tuckerman.
III. The Magic Palace. S. Fenimore Cooper.
IV. Ben. Rebecca Harding Davis.
V. Trial by Jury. W. T. Davis.
VI. Father Hyacinthe's Predecessor. W. C. Wilkinson.
VII. Concerning Charlotte.—II. Author of "Still-Life in Paris."
VIII. The African Exodus. J. M. Cazneau.
IX. American Railway Travelling. A Cosmopolitan.
X. Sketches in Color.—III. Eliz. Kilham.
XI. Wind of the Southland. A. W. Bellaw.
XII. The Great Gale at Passamaquoddy. Sidney Hyde.
XIII. The Death-Bell. Alfred Ford.
XIV. The Story of Crazy Martha. Henry Coppee, LL.D.
XV. Weapons for Combat with Fire. C. W. Wyckoff.
XVI. My Notion about the Human Ear. Geo. W. Bagby.
XVII. Brevities: Letter-Writing. Lucy Fountain.
XVIII. " Dreaming. F. W. Holland.
XIX. " Greenough's Chanting Cherubs. S. F. Cooper.
XX. Hialmar Jarl. Wm. Wallace Young.
XXI. Table-Talk—The Age of Discovery—The Byron Scandal—Railway Inflation—Travelling in America—Railway Reading—Lowell—Tennyson—Museum of Art—The Council—Romanism in the United States—Liberalism in Europe—The Work of Congress—Revenue Questions—The Tariff—Logic of Free Trade—The Growth of Crime—Moral Effects of Bad Laws—The Iron Monopoly—Evils of High Tariffs. Charlton T. Lewis.
XXII. Literature at Home. R. H. Stoddard.
XXIII. Literature, Science, and Art Abroad. Bayard Taylor.
XXIV. Current Events. F. B. Perkins.

Thirty-five cents per number; $4 per annum.
LIBERAL TERMS TO CLUBS.

C. P. PUTNAM & SON,
661 Broadway, and 54 East 23d Street, NEW YORK.

A BOOK FOR EVERY LOVER OF SHAKESPEARE, AND EVERY LIBRARY IN THE LAND.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE EMBLEM WRITERS:

An Exposition of their Similarities of Thought and Expression. Preceded by a View of the Emblem-book Literature down to A.D. 1616.

By HENRY GREEN, M.A.

In one volume, large medium 4to, of about 600 pages, illustrated by nearly 250 Woodcuts and Photo-lithographic Plates, elegantly bound in cloth with appropriate gilt devices, London, 1869, $10.

A few copies on large paper have been struck off for subscribers only, $18.

This work, which has been printed with great care, abounds in ornamental, illustrative, fac-simile woodcuts and photo-lithographs, taken from the works of Authors with several of whom Shakespeare was personally acquainted. The STUDENTS and SCHOLARS of the great dramatist will here find illustrations, until now unquarried, from his marvellous writings. And in the first three chapters of the work BIBLIOPHILISTS will discover information, once lying widely scattered, now brought into compass and order. Also to every one of the TEUTONIC RACE, by whom Shakespeare is reverenced, there is offered further insight into the course which his genius pursued in elevating and refining its own powers.

 By a special arrangement with the English publishers, J. W. B. is enabled to furnish the work at the above greatly reduced price.

J. W. BOUTON,
Importer of Standard and Illustrated Works,
416 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1870.

The Week.

It was Friday before the Senate reached a vote on the bill admitting Virginia, and that only over the prostrate bodies of the Hon. Mr. Porter and Gov. Walker, whom Senators Trumbull and Sumner had in turn "laid out." The bill went to the House with two amendments by Mr. Drake, and one each by Messrs. Wilson and Morton. The House took it up on Monday, and passed it without alteration after a debate, if it can be so called, in which Mr. Butler attempted to air his Republicanism at the expense of Mr. Bingham, but was put to shame by Mr. Farnsworth, speaking for the veterans of the party, and Mr. Logan, on behalf of the neophytes. Miscellaneous business before the Senate has been the census, Mr. Conkling having reported adversely to the scheme on which Mr. Garfield has expended so much labor, and in favor of the old mode of enumeration, with such variations as emancipation and other constitutional changes have made necessary. If the matter were left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, we should regard the adoption of Mr. Garfield's recommendations as morally certain. As it is, we regret the opposition of the Senate Committee, and trust it will not be sustained. On Monday, Mr. Sherman explained his financial measure, but every other speaker had a better to propose. In the House, Mr. Dawes was the subject of general assault on the part of the Pennsylvanians for his homely truths in regard to League Island; but on Monday he brought in undismayed the appropriation bills shorn of nearly three millions. The same parties, with allies from other States, were defeated by more than two to one on the vote to print Commissioner Wells's report; which looks very much as if Mr. Carey's chances of succeeding Mr. Wells were not so good as might be. Mr. Washburn obtained a victory over the Post-Office Committee by getting a special committee appointed to consider his postal-telegraph bill; and as Senator Ramsey has introduced a bill incorporating the company of which Mr. Gardiner Hubbard has been the advocate, there is a prospect of some action in favor of reduced rates and against private monopoly.

The Virginia bill was amended in the Senate by the insertion of conditions, binding members of the Legislature to swear that they had never taken an oath of allegiance to the United States, and afterwards taken part in the rebellion or given aid or comfort to rebels, and prohibiting the State from ever so amending its constitution as to deprive anybody of the right to vote who now possesses it, except as a punishment for crimes under laws equally applicable to all, or so as to deprive anybody of the right to hold office on account of the absence of qualifications not exacted of all, or of school privileges now secured under the constitution. In this shape it went back to the House, and was there passed. The new conditions are of little value, except as expressions of the will of the majority in the Senate. Of course, should the State violate them by changing its constitution, the only remedy would be the exclusion of its members from the Legislature; and whether this remedy would be applied or not would depend on the temper of the majority for the time being in Congress. If it were a Democratic majority, nothing would be done. The only real protection for civil rights is one which any man who feels aggrieved can invoke in a court of law; in other words, a provision of the Federal Constitution, "enforced by appropriate legislation." The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments will, therefore, be the negro charter.

The debate in the Senate on Friday was exceedingly acrimonious, Messrs. Sumner and Trumbull having a regular passage of arms before a crowded house. Mr. Trumbull made a set onslaught on the Massachusetts Senator for his whole course about the bill, denouncing him for having asserted that the House and Senate bill were different, when they were essentially, and, indeed, almost literally, the same; for having accused the Judiciary Committee of having refused to receive or hear a deputation of loyal Virginians when considering the bill, when he had the positive assurance of each member of the committee that they had never heard of any such deputation; for having assailed Governor Walker as a "traitor" in the teeth of the strongest testimony as to his loyalty during his past career, and his own disavowal of a report of a speech made in Virginia, in which Mr. Sumner detected evidence of hostility to common schools; for having misrepresented the provisions of the Virginia Constitution with regard to the school system; for having endorsed and cited as an authority a certain not very reputable character, named Porter, as a loyal man; for having absented himself from the vote on the first Reconstruction Act, conferring the suffrage on the blacks; and for having also refrained from voting on the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment. The attack was very severe, and has clearly revealed the existence of fires long pent up. "Impudence," "assurance," "effrontery," and pretence of "infallibility," were amongst the less serious of its charges.

Mr. Sumner replied by expressing regret for the condition of Mr. Trumbull's "heart;" charging him with having been, from first to last, the persistent enemy of the proposition to confer the suffrage on the colored people (Mr. Trumbull has voted for it from the very first bill conferring it); with having written an article defending the doctrine that color might be, under the Constitution of the United States, the qualification of a voter, which, he said, "hereafter every jurist will read with regret and pity" (at present, Mr. Sumner composes the entire school of jurists who doubt it—the faculty of seeing in a written instrument whatever one thinks ought to be in it being one, happily for mankind, which few jurists possess). Mr. Trumbull's course in the Georgia bill, he suggested, was due to a desire on the part of that gentleman "to see the State handed over to the Ku Klux Klan;" and he charged him with "having made himself on that floor the representative of that fiendish organization," and declared that "through him the Ku Klux Klan, with its bloody orgies, seemed about to prevail." To this calm and accurate account of Mr. Trumbull's position in that matter Mr. Sumner added an accusation, to the effect that when Andrew Johnson was "dragged to the bar" by "a just and generous House of Representatives," Mr. Trumbull "found an argument of technicality in favor of the criminal," and his vote "continued the criminal in power."

He then said, in reply to the charge of having failed to vote on the original Reconstruction Act, that it was he who had, in the committee to whom the Reconstruction question was referred, introduced the provision in the bill which conferred the suffrage on all persons, without distinction of color; that he had not claimed credit for it heretofore, but now felt driven to it by the assaults made upon him; that he was absent from the vote on the bill simply through fatigue, but well knowing that his vote was not necessary to its triumph. In support of his statement with regard to the difference between the House and Senate bills, he then quoted Mr. Conkling's language on the previous day, but, we regret to say, after examining the report in the Globe, misquoted it, or rather misrepresented it somewhat grossly. He rested his assertion about the treatment of the loyal Virginian deputation by the Judiciary Committee on a citation of a statement made to Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, by one of the deputation; but, while admitting that this testimony was overruled by that of the members of the Judiciary Committee, insinuated that he knew what kind of answer they would have got from Mr. Trumbull if they had applied. In support of his assertions about the condition of Virginia, he then read several anonymous letters—one from Hampton, another from Richmond, one from "an old farmer between sixty and seventy years of age." He also read extracts from a report of a violent speech of Governor Walker in the Shenandoah Valley, which, he said, had been supplied to him while he sat at his desk that day, and followed it by a resolution of the Virginian Republican Committee, testifying to "the spotless honor, unwavering loyalty, and unparalleled disinterestedness of Mr. C. H. Porter." As to the trial of this gentleman before the Military Commission in 1864, "the history of it is well known to the people of Virginia," said the resolution; "but it has not caused them to withdraw their confidence from Mr. Porter."

Mr. Trumbull's argument against the insertion of conditions in the State constitutions is, in substance, that they must be in the nature of things futile, no certain remedy being provided in case of their violation; that, if not futile, they destroy the equal union of the States, by creating two classes of States, the conditioned and the unconditioned—the former inferior to the latter in power and dignity; and that, therefore, in putting an end to the equality of States before the law, a deadly blow is aimed at the national unity, and the door opened to endless attempts on the part of powerful majorities to impose their will on the minority—every word of which must commend itself to every thinking man, and to every man who sees beyond his own nose, which, in the case of an inflamed politician, means beyond the next State election. There is no safety for the nation but in the subjection of all to a common yoke, the same in Virginia as in New York. The best thing that can be said for the Virginia conditions is, that they are only to take effect on the occurrence of improbable contingencies; and that the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment will soon render them useless, even in the eyes of those who composed them. Mr. Wells, the late Governor of Virginia, and the defeated Radical candidate in the late election, who may fairly be supposed to know something about the condition of the State, has written an admirable letter on the subject, which was read by Mr. Trumbull in the debate, in one paragraph of which he says:

"We have arrived, it seems to me, at a stage in the work of Reconstruction when it is utterly idle to attempt the correction of any evil which may exist here by a longer denial of Federal representation to the State. No Conservative or Democrat will be made a Republican; no bitterness will be assuaged, no ostracism be abated, nor any spirit of amnesty be encouraged, or oblivion for the past be secured by either an exclusion of the State or individuals from any of the rights which belong to the most favored of States or citizens. Whether such desirable results were ever likely to be secured by test-oaths and disfranchisements or not, it is certain they can have no such operation from this time forward."

Mississippi, a State where hitherto, from the days when its bottom lands were first settled, down to the days of General Gillem, the negro has been of as little importance as anywhere else in the world outside of a slaver, has just sent to Washington the first colored United States Senator. He is a Mr. Revels, a mulatto, who is said to be a man of good character and fair ability. He goes to complete a term, and will stay about a year. For the term ending in 1875, General Ames is elected, and for that ending in 1877, General Alcorn. General Ames's election is the fulfilment of a Democratic prediction, which we had not been believing would come true; but it has, and we know, certainly, of no reason, so far as concerns General Ames's character, why we should not acquiesce willingly. But we confess to a sort of unwillingness that any man who has so much arbitrary power in a State as the General, who commands it as a military district, should obtain the highest prize which the State, as a civil organization, has within its gift. What is the effect of such elections on the mind of the average Southerner?

Elsewhere, the South offers no news of political interest. It is, perhaps, not necessary for us to advise our readers not to give themselves too much uneasiness about the fortunes of the Mr. Bryant of whom the Georgia telegrams have had so much to tell us recently. He belongs to a class of devoted friends of Reconstruction who are abundantly able to take excellent care of their own interests. His friends praise him as a man of probity and courage, an enlightened statesman, a disinterested friend of the negro, and as being otherwise worthy of the confidence and admiration of good Republicans. To which his enemies reply, that all this was in some previous state of existence, and that, so far as our age knows him, he is a man of very slender abilities, and not of lion-like courage, who, no doubt, will pursue politics in Georgia as long as politics in Georgia afford him a not too laborious means of subsistence. He was once, some six years ago, an officer in a Maine regiment, which he left, before it had seen much service, to recruit for a colored regiment, of which, however, he did not obtain command, and since then he has lived in Augusta, and latterly has had politics for a profession. Nothing of importance is to be expected of him—nothing, we think, at once very bad and important, and nothing important and good. His prominence speaks ill for the intellectual capacity of the Republican portion of the Georgia Legislature; but we suppose him to be morally the equal, if not the superior, of Governor Bullock, whom he is now fighting. He seems to have the aid of the moderate Democrats in this warfare, but how the negroes will finally declare themselves is not known. As interesting as any of the non-political news from the South, is the statement that, during the eight weeks ending on December 31, the number of persons passing through Memphis, from Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, and East Tennessee, on their way, most of them, to Arkansas, was no less than 3,175. Most of them have some means, and are leaving poor farms for richer land. About 400 of them go to Texas, and all speak of many more who will follow them.

The mode in which the Georgia Legislature is being organized has come up for discussion in the House, on an enquiry as to the authority under which a board of military officers appointed by General Terry were acting in determining the qualifications of the members. General Butler said that they were following the precedent set by General Meade when the first Legislature was summoned; but in this General Butler is mistaken. What General Meade did was to apply to the Judiciary and Reconstruction Committees of the House, both of which contained some of the most advanced Radicals of the present age—Mr. Boutwell, for one—for instructions on this point, and they both telegraphed to him that the Legislature was the proper judge of the qualifications of its own members; and they were right. A legislature the members of which are selected or sifted by a military board is a mockery and a delusion. The very spectacle of such an organization is more demoralizing to the people who witness it, we venture to say, than ten years of simple military government would be. However, it may safely be said that the worst is now over. The debate and vote on the Virginia bill, and Mr. Wells's letter, show clearly that the sentiment of the country has set too strongly against continued coercion as a means of restoring the Union to make longer persistence in it possible, and we shall probably, as soon as we get rid of the Georgia scrape, see no more of it.

In South Carolina, however, the white officials are reported to be throwing aside all show of respect for their negro constituents, and are ceasing to invite colored persons to their parties and receptions. An indictment has also been found against the manager of the Opera at Charleston for refusing to admit whites and blacks promiscuously to the boxes; but the trial has been postponed till May, when the opera season will be over. It is conceded that his obeying the law would ruin him, as the whites would all withdraw, and negro patronage is not sufficient to keep an opera going in Charleston. At the same time, the State Superintendent of Education has recommended the assignment of separate schools to the children of the two races—another sign, not of the revival of white prejudice, for that has never declined, but of the rising political importance of the white element in the population. We have felt all along that this was sure to come, that the political arrangements made by the Reconstruction process were too artificial to last, and that, the pressure of Federal power once removed, society and politics at the South would rearrange themselves according to the training and character of the people, and that the negroes would have in the long run to win social consideration and political weight by their own energy, and ability, and skill. This, of course, makes the reorganization of Southern society on the basis of natural right and justice a long process; but Southern society labors under no peculiar disability in this respect. All societies and all races have had or will have the same sorrowful story to tell. Caste feeling cannot be wholly destroyed by the growing enlightenment of the upper class; most of the work has to be done by the lower class; and the part of Government in the transformation is the provision of a fair field for all.

In the meantime, we trust charitable Northern people will not suppose that all necessity for caring for the blacks is now over. There is not a State in the South in which there will be for years any frank or hearty disposition on the part of the whites to assist in educating the colored population, or assisting in any way in their mental and moral development. No colleges will be provided for them, and it will be fortunate if they even get the benefit of a good common-school system. It will, therefore, be no easy matter for them to achieve social equality and that real political power which is made up of wealth and intelligence. Northern people who want to help them, therefore, would do well to give to the schools which some admirable Northern men and women are conducting for their benefit, not only the sums which go to pay for lectures on "the sin of caste," but whatever else they can afford. To one of these—an industrial school, with a farm attached, under the superintendence of General Armstrong, at Hampton, Va.—we have already called attention. It is doing excellent work, but under great difficulties, and without getting, or being likely to get, a particle of help from the State. Every intelligent colored farmer, mechanic, or teacher it turns out, we may rely on it, is worth more to the negro race than ten courses of lyceum lectures on the Rights of Man or the Jurisprudence of Utopia.

The New York Democrats, in recalling the State's ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment, would seem to have given one more proof that the Democracy of the Empire State may be very sharp managers in local politics, but that they are as fit to shape the party's national policy as the Democracy of the State of Delaware. In fact, their complete ascendancy in this city and Brooklyn makes them either blind or indifferent to the interests of the party at large; or else they are getting too entirely under the control of the ignorant and vicious horde of voters whom they have used all these years, and who now choose to use them. The Amendment is on the point of adoption—and this whether or not we are to count the ratification of New York or that of Indiana. In the latter State, as our readers recollect, the Democratic members of the Legislature defeated, or tried to defeat, the Amendment through a trick. But now both those States may be dispensed with. The Democrats of Ohio, too, overreached themselves in their action in this matter, and did so twice. First, they rescinded the ratifying vote, and thus cumbered themselves with a "record" that will do them harm, and make right action in the future more difficult and success more doubtful; and, secondly, in the last election, indulging a hope of drawing off Republican votes in Cincinnati, they shared nominations with a certain small clique of disaffected Republicans. But they carried the city and county by their own proper votes, their Republican allies casting but a beggarly number; and to the three or four Cincinnati Republicans elected by Democratic ballots we owe the renewed ratification by Ohio. It is from the South, apparently, that the Democracy is to get its leaders. When secession came, the brains seem to have gone out of it—either into the Republican party or into rebellion.

The detailed account of the Noir murder and the proceedings consequent on it in the Corps Législatif, show the ministry in even a more favorable light than we last week ventured to look for. The funeral was an immense demonstration, but care was taken not to interfere with it in any way, or to make any show of force with regard to it. It was only when it was all over, and the mischievous element in the crowd formed itself into an immense and noisy procession and marched down the Champs Élysées with threatening cries, that it was confronted and dispersed by a small body of cavalry with the aid of a sharp shower of rain—Rochefort, who was at its head, being allowed to pass on quietly. The language of Rochefort in the Chamber, in his interpellation of the Minister, was that of a rather silly rowdy. He wanted to have Pierre Bonaparte "judged by the population themselves," because Noir, the murdered man, "was a child of the people;" enquired "whether they were living under Bonapartes or Borgias;" and finally "called upon all citizens to arm and administer justice themselves." M. Ollivier's reply was perfectly firm, straightforward, and sensible. He said the Prince should be tried according to the law of the land as it stood, and not according to anybody's view of what the law ought to be; that the propriety of having an exceptional tribunal for members of the Imperial family was a question for ulterior consideration; that in the meantime he, "faithful to democratic principles, would subject both great and small to the justice of the country." The "High Court," before which the Prince is to be tried, is composed of three or four of the ordinary judges, and a jury made of members of the councils-general of the different departments. The councils-general are composed of local magnates, landed proprietors, manufacturers, and other persons of means or position. The constitution of the court, indeed, is such as to render a fair trial far more likely than if the prisoner were arraigned before a Paris jury, where the excitement is at fever heat, and the whole population divided into two hostile camps.

It seems that after all Cardinal Schwartzenberg has summoned up courage to sign the protest, which it was believed at first he would decline to sign, against the Pope's method of dealing with the bishops, and that a considerable number of the German and French members of the Council are really roused so far as to be ready to go home if certain concessions are not made to them in the matter of freedom of speech and of reading. We say "it seems," because it is really impossible to trust implicitly to any account of the Council's doings. Cardinal Mathieu has gone back to Paris, it is said, in disgust, and the difficulties which are springing up around the prelates of the more advanced communities, owing to the Pope's designs against literature, science, and modern ideas, are believed to be daily increasing. The Pope appears to be quite unconscious of the appearance some of the positions announced in his Syllabus wear in the darker parts of the earth, and his pretensions as to his own position in the Church are raising the question, What is the use of the bishops, and why ever call a Council?

The latest news of the Russian plans with regard to Central Asia is both curious and interesting. The Russians are slowly, but carefully and surely, pushing forward their outposts in that direction, and unquestionably to the great advantage of civilization; but their great object now, it is announced, is to develop in that region the cultivation of cotton, so as to make Russian manufacturers independent of America. The advantage of that market would be not only that it would be cheap, but that Russia would have an absolute monopoly of it, it being over her soil only that Central Asian products would have any outlet. The first thing to be done, however, is to open easy means of communication. It is now a two months' journey from Moscow to Turkestan; longer still for caravans. It is therefore proposed, and Russian engineers are actually making surveys for the purpose, to turn the Amu Daria, which now flows into the Sea of Aral, back into the old bed, through which, in ancient times, it ran into the Caspian. This would give water communication from Moscow almost to the foot of the Himalayas. The other difficulties in the way of commerce which the Russian Government have under consideration are monetary or social. The coins used in Turkestan are unknown in Russia and inconvertible at home; and there are, of course, no banks. Then a firm at Moscow, sending out a venture, cannot expect to turn their money over in less than a year, or get news of it in less than four months, and the incessant political disturbances in those regions cause sudden and enormous fluctuations in the value of goods from week to week. The exports to Russia are almost entirely cotton, but this trade is kept down also by the trader's uncertainty, after buying at Tashkend, as to what he may find the price when he gets to Moscow. Moreover, the petty chiefs have preserved the mediæval custom of levying tolls on merchants, and the St. Petersburg Golos tells of one trader who, on his way home from India, through Afghanistan, was made to pay toll eighteen times between Peshawur and Karshi. The worst of it is that these potentates have no more notion that there is anything illegitimate in this than Mr. Boutwell has that there is anything discreditable in his customs receipts. The work before Russia is, it will thus be easily seen, an immense one, but a more beneficent one no nation has ever undertaken.

A POLITICAL NUISANCE.

If it is true that there comes a moment in battle when the best general, after putting his last man into the fight, can do nothing more, but must stand still and wait the event, it seems as though General Grant might, in the present condition of things, at least feel a melancholy satisfaction in tracing the analogy between the art of government and the art of war. It happened, too, more than once during the rebellion, that his most elaborate plans were upset by friends or enemies, and he was left to struggle along as he best could to the end, with only his faculty of silent endurance to rely upon. Politically, he is already in a very similar situation. He met Congress with a plan of joint action—a plan neither so bold nor so liberal as it might have been, but still his own, such as it was. The struggle of conflicting interests in Congress has already caused a scene of confusion, in the midst of which it is impossible to decide who is losing or who is gaining ground; but it is tolerably evident that the new President, whatever may be his good-will or anxiety, must sit, with his Cabinet, and look on, but is neither likely to be obeyed nor listened to should he undertake to do more.

This is the part of the Virginia transaction which is best worth comment. Every one knows the situation of Virginia. Whether as a constitutional, or social, or partisan question, the argument is, to say the least, somewhat threadbare. Most persons are probably a good deal surprised to find it again filling the press and stirring up another storm in the Senate, and it is safe to say that few persons expected such a result less than the President himself when he penned the business-like paragraph in his Message relating to the subject. He had, as he supposed, avoided his predecessor's mistake of having a policy in opposition to Congress, and he had escaped the danger of a disagreement by adopting the Congressional plan of Reconstruction, executing without favor a scheme in which every one appeared to acquiesce. The House of Representatives sustained him and agreed to follow his lead. It is true there was a struggle; but the Administration was in the end fairly and frankly sustained. No sooner, however, does the Senate take up the subject than it becomes perfectly clear that General Grant is but little better off in 1870 than Andrew Johnson in 1865. The same difficulties arise, and the old wounds bleed afresh. Any one who has labored through or over the late debates in the Senate, as published in the Globe, can scarcely be in a condition to form any sensible conclusion in regard to them. His mind will lose its elasticity under such a weight of bad law, bad logic, and bad temper, and such intolerable iteration of commonplace ideas. Yet, even in its most stupefied state, the reader's brain must be conscious of a glimmering spark of curiosity to know what is the secret of all the words thus wasted. One searches painfully for a clue. What was the Senate driving at? It certainly did not want to keep Virginia out of the Union. This is not urged. It is equally certain that no conditions or "understandings" will give the Government any more control over the State than it now has and always must have by virtue of the precedent it has already established in the case of Georgia. There seems in common sense to be only one alternative to letting Virginia in; which is, to keep her out. As Hallam somewhere says about the controversy of the Real Presence, in the nature of things there could be but two opinions on the subject; for what can be predicated concerning a body in its relation to a given space, but presence and absence? The Senate has discovered a third predicate, and the most important of all—its own predominant power, and its determination to make that power felt.

It is, no doubt, slightly immoral to make fun of individuals who believe themselves to be inspired by a great principle; but to a person who believes with equal energy that the only great principle involved in the present instance is the very mischievous principle that the Senate means to reassert and maintain at any cost its hold upon power, its initiative in every branch of administration—that it intends to gratify on every possible occasion its mania for humiliating the President, and guiding the lower House, or deluding it with the notion that it is itself the driver—there is apt to appear something very ridiculous in the reasons given by senators for showing their self-importance and their individual power. There is in some of them a degree of naïveté—a simple unconsciousness of their own ruling passion—an untutored awkwardness in concealing their weakness—which is an irresistible attraction, and a never-ending amusement to the spectator. The debate on Virginia has proved rich in this sort of harvest. Senators were driven to their wits' end for reasons to justify their course. They swept the gutters for arguments, and each man's reasoning seems to be an unconscious imitation and almost a burlesque of himself. In some cases this is certainly not so obvious as in others, and the reason is evident. There are characters in the world which are themselves by nature very near a burlesque, and usually ridiculous. But there are others which are not so near the ground. Mr. Sumner, for example, has a magnificent history. He has dealt with great ideas, which, so long as he sticks to them, will always hold him up, but which are dangerous and slippery when abused. Perhaps the most dramatically effective scene Mr. Sumner could have arranged would have been his rising before an astonished Senate, a month ago, and announcing that the time of violence had passed, and that he, with his grand confidence in human nature and democratic progress, was also determined to throw military government to the dogs, and trust to the slow but healthy processes of natural development in the reconstructed States. Had he then, with his usual classical research, closed with, Hic victor cestus artemque repono, or Lenit albescens animos capillus, or Exegi monumentum ære perennius, or some other appropriate text, taken like these from the less familiar Latin authors, he would have sat down the most popular and perhaps the most powerful man in the United States. But such a happy delivery is not in the style of great senators. With a degree of gravity worthy of old days, when he was almost alone in the assertion of great principles in the Senate, he announced to mankind that the Governor lately elected by the people of Virginia was a "pivot;" that the pivot had spoken disrespectfully of something which Mr. Sumner declared to be the New England common-school system; that the New England common-school system was the pride and glory of his constituents; and that, until the people of Virginia were taught by the Senate that their Governor must admire everything that was admired by Mr. Sumner's constituents, they must be kept under police supervision. This is no exaggeration of the character of Mr. Sumner's remarks. If they seem ridiculous, the ridicule is his own. All we can be charged with is an attempt to supply a little logic, a matter in regard to which Mr. Sumner is apt to be a trifle negligent. The whole strain of Mr. Sumner's remarks is pitched in the same falsetto—a burlesque of himself. In the effort to show a respectable reason or excuse for wielding the whole power of the Senate—for snubbing the President, the Cabinet, and the House of Representatives—for assuming the charge of administration and legislation at once—Mr. Sumner travesties himself, and turns the noble common-school system of New England into a caricature of his old appeals to the moral force of liberty.

It would be interesting to know what the President thinks of the progress of his campaign. It is best to believe that he feels flattered by the treatment he received in the person of his Attorney-General, and that he entirely coincides with the Senate in breaking down what no one in these days has yet dared to call "his policy" of Reconstruction. He is probably gratified, too, when so sober and sensible a person as Mr. Dawes is led away by the same spirit to make an attack on the Administration, which is absolutely unjustifiable unless Mr. Dawes had taken every means to verify it, and given the amplest private notice to the officials he attacked. The old spirit of nagging the Executive is still so powerful as to mislead even a man like Mr. Dawes into gratuitous attacks in a place where he knows that the Administration can only defend itself at a serious disadvantage. This spirit grows out of vanity and ostentation, just as much in the legislature as a body as in individual legislators, and is just as much of a nuisance.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The reason why American securities stand lower in the money markets of the world than those of any other power, except Turkey and Egypt—two semi-barbarous Mussulman states—lower than even those of the Argentine Republic, is a very interesting topic of discussion, particularly just now, when we want to convert our debt, at a reduced rate of interest. It is confidently believed by many persons, Mr. Sumner and the Secretary of the Treasury amongst the number, that, if we can only manage to withdraw from the market our present nominal six per cent. bonds, on which, at present prices, holders actually receive seven per cent., we can induce Englishmen and Dutchmen, who refuse to hold our present bonds at less than seven per cent., to buy from $1,200,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 of the new ones, paying from four to five per cent. On what this expectation is based, neither these gentlemen, however, nor anybody else, has ever ventured to say. Our issuing a bond and agreeing to pay four per cent. interest on it will not make it a four per cent. bond. No matter what figures it may bear on its face, buyers will estimate its value in their own way, and will only take it at a price which will make the interest sufficiently high to cover what they consider the risk of holding it. In other words, there is not the slightest reason for believing that, if we issued a four per cent. bond to-morrow, we could sell it in London or Amsterdam at any figure which would give the buyer less than seven per cent. on the investment—that is to say, we should have to submit to a discount of about forty per cent. on it. This is not pleasant, but it has to be looked in the face. It must be admitted, too, that it is puzzling, in the teeth of the fact that every Northern State is rapidly reducing its indebtedness; that the country is growing at an unparalleled rate in wealth and resources; that our national obligations have thus far been promptly met, and that there is every year a large surplus in the Treasury, and that Congress has confirmed in the most solemn manner the national obligation to pay the national debt in coin, and still more recently has emphatically rebuked all talk of repudiation. On the surface there is, indeed, no such investment in the world as United States bonds. But Europeans distrust them evidently. Why do they do so?

Sir Curtis Lampson ascribes it, in a recent letter to the London Times, to the history of the Erie Railroad, in which the monstrous revelation has been made that a gang of scoundrels can take possession of one of the greatest lines of communication in the country, and secure the connivance and support of the Legislature, the Governor, and the courts in cheating the creditors and stockholders of the company, and can even secure the aid of the United States Assistant Treasurer in bulling the gold market and plunging the commercial community into confusion. Unquestionably this has produced a profound impression abroad. Nothing scares money-lenders so much as the belief that the courts of justice of a country are not to be depended on; and, what is nearly as bad, that the bar is not to be depended on; and that this impression has got abroad about the bar of New York is a very disagreeable truth, and for its spread the bar itself is to blame. The total silence and apparent acquiescence and participation of New York lawyers in the recent judicial scandals, have furnished matter for astonishment and worse to their legal brethren and the general public of other countries.

But then the Erie frauds are only one of the causes which are injuring American credit abroad. Like most other phenomena of the same class, it has several. Of these others, one of the most powerful is the condition of the Alabama question. There is in the facts of the case nothing very alarming to a capitalist. Great Britain has, to all intents and purposes, acknowledged her liability for the damage done to American commerce by cruisers fitted out in her ports; and this damage is computable, and does not amount in the aggregate to a very large sum. But the persistent way in which the moral side of the quarrel is dwelt on by the United States opens up a field of controversy which is in its very nature immeasurable—the limits or outlets of which nobody can see. If a man claims damages for the burning of his house, it is easy to calculate what will satisfy his claim; but if he says he wants satisfaction for wounds to his honor or feelings, no looker-on has any means of judging how the quarrel will end. Moreover, there is to the European mind something alarming in the pertinacity with which the discussion about the date of the belligerency proclamation is kept up, even by Mr. Fish, who acknowledges that the issue of the proclamation was a discretionary act; and with which even he avoids saying what it is he seeks in settlement of the dispute.

This avoidance by the new Administration of a definition of the nature of the satisfaction expected, coupled with the newspaper rumors which come from Washington that the hope of a cession of the British possessions on this continent is privately cherished in political circles, naturally gives the political horizon a cloudy look, and makes European capitalists turn to other fields of investment than the United States. We have no doubt that a frank statement by Mr. Fish of the kind and degree of atonement which the United States expects for the injuries received from England during the war would have a very favorable effect on the public credit, even if it was not considered reasonable. There is nothing which creates more distrust than what appears to be a desire to keep a quarrel open; and to this imputation an offended party always exposes himself when he refuses to say what he wants. A definite claim once made, the ground is at least laid for a compromise.

Another circumstance which affects our credit unfavorably in Europe is the impression of instability of policy created by the dealings of the House with the public credit, and of the Senate with the St. Thomas treaty. The late votes of the House in support of the public credit do not produce as much effect abroad as they ought, because they are not looked on as the expressions of a fixed determination or settled conviction. It is not forgotten that the same men who voted that the public debt should be paid in coin, and repudiated Mr. Mungen's advocacy of bad faith, a few short months previously voted with General Butler to reduce the interest on the public debt, and that a very large portion of the Republican party in the House have passed almost absolutely under the leadership of that remarkable statesman, and are ready for anything he may propose, and he has taken every pains to give the world to know that he does not consider the public creditor a person deserving of much consideration.

The conduct of the Senate in the St. Thomas matter, too, is taken to indicate a decline on the part of that body of the sense of corporate obligation—and even of the sense of national continuity—and has infused into the minds of many foreigners a doubt as to where the seat of political responsibility in this community lies. There are three branches of the organized government, and behind these there is the people, and if each of the four feels itself at full liberty to stand on its rights, and repudiate regular engagements made with foreigners, simply because made by unpopular agents, foreigners ask, With whom is it safe to treat? A foolish question, perhaps, but still a fact. And then, besides all these, there is the growing suspicion throughout Europe of the state of things which Mr. C. F. Adams, jr., has described in the last number of the North American Review, and which may be briefly described by saying that there is a conflict going on between the great moneyed corporations and our political system, in which the political system is getting the worst of it, and that what the result will be nobody yet knows. The corporations are well organized, composed of the ablest men in the nation, have "perfect machinery of combination and perpetuity," and employ the best agents they can get, pay them highly, and stimulate their zeal in every mode that experience of human nature can suggest. Their antagonist is an unwieldy body, the personnel of which not only changes from year to year, but consists, under the caucus system and "rotation," of very ordinary men, very poorly paid, and in constant anxiety about their future, under no sort of discipline, and slenderly influenced by either habits or tradition. That they are an easy prey to their powerful foe is no wonder.

These are, of course, not pleasant things to say; but then the facts we are trying to describe are not pleasant, and they have nevertheless to be weighed by thoughtful men. For our own part, we doubt if the public mind has ever since the foundation of the Government been in healthier condition in all that concerns the public credit than it is at this moment. The people have not shown, under the most tremendous pressure, the slightest sign of flinching from their responsibilities. There is no debt in the world, we venture to say, which rests on so sound and sure a basis as the debt of this country; and we doubt if a more hopeful phenomenon has ever been witnessed in political history than the rapidity with which a true appreciation of the condition of credit, and of the value of it, has been diffused through the community by mere discussion during the last three or four years. The difficulty now is that the organized mode of expressing the popular will on the great questions of the day is singularly imperfect, owing, as we have often said already, to the rise into power and influence, through the events of the war, of a class of statesmen whose whole political experience and ability lie in the stimulation of emotion, and who are wanting in the habits of mind, as well as the kind of knowledge, which the business of a great nation absolutely requires. There will have to be an overhauling of our legislative and administrative machinery, we may depend upon it, before we go much further; and many worthy as well as unworthy men, who have done good service in their day, will have to yield the field to others perhaps in some ways less respectable, but in most ways more useful.

EDITORIAL PERSPECTIVE.

It has sometimes been thought by persons of a reforming turn of mind that a great improvement might be made in journalism by the omission from the columns of newspapers of all editorial discussion. If newspapers, it has been said, were confined strictly to their proper function of collecting and distributing the news of the day, it is highly probable that, as newspapers, they would be greatly improved; while the loss to the public of the lucubrations of the publicists and philosophers who discuss the topics of the day, in large type, on page 4, would not be very great. The two functions, it has been urged—the editor's and the reporter's—are really incompatible, from the fact that the interest of the latter in the journal with which he is connected is strictly scientific, while that of the former is purely practical. The business of the reporter, of the correspondent, of the "commissioner," is simply the business of minute and at the same time comprehensive enquiry; while that of the editor is generally the furtherance of some practical scheme—such as the extinction of slavery, the extension of the suffrage, the acquisition of territory, the depression or the advance of shares in the capital stock of "some great national enterprise," located in the neighborhood of the editor's native town. It must be evident to the meanest intellect that the practical turn which invariably characterizes the editor is likely to work sad havoc among the facts scientifically collated and presented for his consideration by the reporter. For example, the latter, after diligent enquiry on the market-place, comes to the conclusion that Mariposa or Pacific Mail is not so likely to rise as to fall; that its liabilities far exceed its assets; that it does not declare dividends; and that the financiers who control its operations are received with the eye of suspicion by the business community. But the editor, to whom these facts are communicated, "believes in" Mariposa or Pacific Mail, as the case may be, and, accordingly, in large type, on page 4, we find the well-known article beginning, "There are always some persons in every community who are ready, on the slightest occasion, to backbite and slander; and, therefore, we have not been surprised at seeing, in late issues of some of our contemporaries, malignant allusions and misstatements, evidently designed to injure the financial reputation of a great enterprise," etc., etc., and ending, "In conclusion, we can only say that we have always believed, and shall always continue to believe, in the final success of this great undertaking, the desperate sneers of those who have taken stock in rival projects to the contrary notwithstanding." Of course, the tendency of the reporter, after the appearance of this editorial, is to take his cue from it, and to paint in much more glowing colors the condition and prospects of Mariposa or Pacific Mail. And so it is perpetually. The moment the facts of a case become disagreeable to an editor, from that moment the facts as they appear in his non-editorial columns undergo a metamorphosis. By some means or other, the facts and the journal's preconceptions of them must accord with each other, and in the process it is generally the facts which suffer. The reporter's nature is an exceedingly sensitive one, and the expression of editorial opinion acts upon it with a sudden and irresistible power. As the warmth of the sun in spring opens the teeming earth, so does an editorial of the right sort bring to the surface of his mind a thousand happy fancies, which sprout and bud into approved facts; while not the bitter cold of winter itself is more potent to congeal the fruitful soil than is a leading article of another kind to freeze into icy silence the sources of his information. Soon he learns instinctively what to disclose, what to hide away, when to report broadly, when to hint a doubt, where openly to deny. In short, he is no longer a reporter, but a retained attorney for the prosecution of the editor's pet schemes. Hence the complaint that newspapers are not trustworthy, and the proposed reform. Separate the editorial function from the other, and there will be no conflict. If we could only have newspapers which simply professed to give the news, we might begin to get some glimmering of truth from them.

Perhaps, some day or other, this may take place, though we very much doubt it, for man's love of power is a natural and a strong one, and the journalist is very unlikely to care to surrender his double authority of distribution of news and public exhorter so long as he can help it. All the news comes to him in the ordinary course of events, and shall he not say his say about it? Shall he yield that most delightful of all human opportunities to another? Not if he knows it, probably. But suppose he does abdicate. Does any one fondly imagine that, by the extrusion from newspapers of the editorial part, the desired result of a perfect "newspaper" would be the result? Far from it; the selection of news is as difficult as any part of the work, and for such work we not only seem to have among us few competent minds, but, worse than this, the tendency of all newspaper training seems to be to take away whatever natural fitness nature may have originally provided. What is wanted is, in one word, a sense of perspective. In order to select and arrange news, the first thing for a journalist is to be able to distinguish between what is important and what is unimportant, what is true and what is false, what ought to be given to the world and what to the fire. The popular impression is that news comes to newspapers as rain and sunshine do to the earth, without any unpleasant human exertion whatever, and all the journalist has to do when he goes down to his office is to print whatever the bountiful hand of Providence has sent to the shop. But the fact, as the professional reader will readily agree, is quite otherwise. What he really does is to survey an immense field of fact, rumor, and fancy, and to make a "composition" of it, throwing into relief what touches, or ought to touch, the public most nearly, and keeping in the shade what is doubtful, irrelevant, or in its nature private. The effect is completely in his power. The difference between brevier and bourgeois is the difference between an audience of fifty and an audience of fifty thousand. The sensational lines at the head of a column make what is printed below them the town-talk; the omission of them remits the whole matter to obscurity. Better still, the total omission of all mention of a particular topic ensures entire oblivion. The journalist's right to his title, then, depends altogether upon his sense of perspective. If he puts the unimportant news in the foreground and the important news out of sight, he has no right to exist.

And yet this distortion of perspective is what some of the gentlemen who conduct the daily press seem to consider their charter of success. To prove what we say, let us point out two or three most signal instances. There is, as most of our readers must be painfully aware, a column of telegrams from Europe in every issue of the daily papers, which editors are accustomed to refer to as furnishing the latest "foreign intelligence." One of the chief occupations of the Associated Press agent who sends these despatches, a short time since, was sending over the Cable every morning a long extract from the London Times leader on French affairs. The extracts were generally to the point, that, unless somebody did something pretty soon, somebody else was more than likely to do something he had not yet done. There seemed no reason for sending them; they were neither wise nor witty nor especially well written. They were ordinary Times editorials on foreign affairs, such as come out every morning in London, and attract no one's attention. They were not half as entertaining to us as extracts from the Tribune's foreign editorials would be to those on the other side; the latter would be suggestive, at all events, and in more ways than one. Yet these extracts were solemnly printed, day after day, in our leading journals, as containing news of the first importance. But, strange as all this was, how much stranger when the whole thing was one fine morning stopped! If they had ever been important, they had not ceased to be so. If they had never been important, why had the confiding public been imposed upon?

A more remarkable case was the celebrated Curtis-Churchill nose-pulling affray in Boston, last fall. Two gentlemen riding in the cars have an altercation, and one pulls the other's nose. Surely this is a strictly private affair, with which the public has no concern. Yet mark the result. The nose-puller is tried for assault and battery, and the Boston newspapers at once elevate the trial to the rank of a cause célèbre. A trivial encounter in a railroad-car is painted by the journalistic instructors of mankind as another episode in the long battle between tyranny and liberty, the prosecution of Curtis becomes "a manly blow struck for the right," and Churchill finds himself a martyr. The walls are rent, the graves open, and the lights burn blue. It turns out that Curtis is a "Beacon Street aristocrat," and his assault an attempt to "establish caste." One would have said, to read the Boston papers, that New England was on the eve of a social uprising.

The other day, when Mrs. McFarland-Richardson was plunged in the deepest affliction by events of which everybody had been informed through the enterprise of the daily press, a reporter was sent to Boston to see her, and report for the journal with which he was connected her condition and feelings. In this he failed; but not to be baffled, he set about discovering whom he might interview, and his memory recalled to him the name of Fisk, Jr. Fisk, it is true, lives in New York, but Mrs. Fisk lives in Boston, and there had been stories of matrimonial difficulties between the two. The reporter straightway rings Mrs. Fisk's bell, and proceeds to take down what she may have to say on her relations with her husband. Next day, as usual, the public is regaled with full particulars of the conversation. But the most astounding illustration of the want of a sense of moral and intellectual perspective in the very class whose business it is to put the events of the day before the public in their true relations to other events, has been furnished within the past few weeks by the Cooke case. The Rev. Horace Cooke, an obscure Methodist minister, elopes with an utterly unknown school-girl, leaving behind him a wife and family. A case can hardly be imagined in which the public have as little interest as this, to say nothing of the exquisite cruelty to the families involved in publicity. Quite otherwise did it seem to the editorial eye. The story is raked out in all its disgusting details; column after column is devoted to a discussion of the crime; Cooke's history is given; the causes which led to his sin are analyzed; and the whole country is scoured for mêmoires pour servir. A petty scandal swells to the dimensions of a public calamity. Cooke favors the public with a card, and assaults an editor, and the reporter of the Tribune interviews Mrs. Cooke—no other being admitted—(private and exclusive information about her feelings only to be found in the columns of that great daily). What an odd condition the editorial eye must be in when metropolitan papers have come to this!

FRANCE.—THE NEW REVOLUTION.

PARIS, January 7, 1870.

THE importance of what has passed and is passing is simply incalculable. It is a revolution, and the greatest one that has been witnessed since that of July, 1830.

A few words will prove this: After the exhaustion of France by the sanguinary and tyrannical rule of the first Napoleon, she fell into a mixed state, half of anxiety for freedom, half of lethargy. Louis XVIII., had he lived, would have led France into a really liberal and safe constitutionalism of the British type. A narrow-minded, foolish, bigoted prince ascended the throne, and the real work of compression began. From 1826 to 1830 it was the same form of compression that we have suffered from for eighteen years under Louis Napoleon. It was not the active, aggressive tyranny that Italy and Hungary, for instance, writhed under while Austria reigned supreme in both Milan and Pesth—it was not cruel, it was stupefying. There was just the sort of difference which the law makes between poisoning and any more violent shape of murder. Extinction of life was the result in both cases, but it was less horrible and ghastly in one case than in the other.

Well, I repeat it, from 1826 to 1830, the attempt to extinguish the nation was actively pursued: it was pursued by religious bigotry and by civil persecution. The intelligence and the aspirations of the younger and more generous and nobler of the community were sought to be stifled: that was the object of Government. Those who governed were afraid of those whom they governed. They said daily and hourly to themselves: "If these are thoroughly free to think, speak, write, and act as they choose, we are lost."

Against this it was that the youth of France rose up in rebellion during the three days of 1830. It was in the name of its right to be and to assert itself that the nation put forth its strength, and with one effort swept all before it. On the day after the 29th of July, 1830, in France everything was changed, radically so. Then, for eighteen years, Louis Philippe went on, showing in his mode of reigning that he had but half understood the movement that had brought him to the throne. Still, as it was against no positive fact, against no despotic aggression, that the faubourgs rose in 1848, but only against the spirit in which the institutions of the country were applied, the insurrection of February produced no radical change. A reigning family was expelled, and there was for some days a good deal of popular agitation everywhere, but no radical change was ever produced by the Revolution of 1848. During the Republic, France went on as she had done for the last twenty years, and would have continued "going on" in that fashion, neither better nor worse; but when Louis Napoleon had been president for three years he could not subsist without a total alteration of circumstances. His positive necessity was corruption, therefore tyranny. He must have money. There was the true solution of the enigma. The choice lay between his own existence and a very monstrous political crime: he chose the latter. By the coup d'état of 1851 Louis Napoleon simply replaced France in the period between 1826 and 1830. After the first excesses of repression, which were brutal enough, the Emperor Napoleon III. sought to repress the country as gently as possible. "C'est un bon tyran," used to say Victor Cousin, who personally liked him. "C'est la douceur même!" said all those who approached him; and the thing is true. He is a man of peace and dreamy meditation, and all violence annoys and upsets him; but as his necessities were bound up with a system of corruption to which no free country could possibly consent, why, he was obliged to sit upon France; and so he did, deliberately and as benignly as he could. Everything the Empire gave France was falsified. It gave her universal suffrage, and adulterated it; liberty of conscience, and adulterated it—all manner of apparent gifts, but all were poisoned. The net result was, a complete return to the stupefying, brutifying state of the last years of Charles X.

Against this, little by little, sullenly (if you will, peacefully), but doggedly and unremittingly, the nation has for the last three years protested; not actually rebelled or risen, but protested in all the ways that were allowed to it. The Emperor, who had for eighteen years compressed France under the fac-simile of the latest Bourbon rule, has now re-enacted the July Revolution; and as France found herself on the 30th July, 1830, after the reign of Charles X., so she finds herself now in the first days of 1870, after the despotism of Napoleon III.

That this is really the case is amply proved to every one who lives in French society and is of it. Unless you go among men of the utterly unpractical, brawling, socialistic stamp, you will hear no dissentient voice. You may here and there, in an ultra-Legitimist centre, or in the intimacy of a Court functionary, meet with signs of uneasiness for the future; but in every genuinely liberal, and practical, and reasonable group, of no matter what shade—Right or Left Centre, Orleanist, Parliamentarian, or Left—you will hear but the one same word spoken with enthusiasm—"On respire." The real alarm which should be felt by those who have any political experience here is to be formulated in the old, trite expression of "It's all too good to last." There is the danger. Can it last? Can it work? Is it intended that it should endure?

These questions occupy me less, I must avow, than they seem to do those around me, because their answer is to be sought in a different quarter from that to which they are addressed. Their answer depends on the men who are now at the head of affairs; their answer depends no longer on the Emperor. If the new Ministers will determinedly act together, and allow no petty personal causes, no cleverly directed hostile efforts, to disunite them, they may afford to despise utterly any reactionary attempts on the part of the extreme dynastic party, as it is termed. They have now in their hands every instrument by which they can govern France constitutionally; whatever is not yet actually conceded it is in their power easily to obtain. If they do not obtain it, it will be wholly and solely their fault, and they may rely upon it that the blame will fall, as it ought to do, upon them.

Let us grant that the measure of Louis Napoleon's Machiavelism is full, and that he has only permitted the advent to power of the present Ministry the more surely to ruin and discredit the men who become his Ministers; let us grant that his intention is (as his wish very probably may be) to intrigue so cunningly against the new Cabinet that its next successors must be taken from his own entourage, and that before a year is out we shall see M. de Forcade Prime Minister, backed by Rouher and Jérome David, and all the ultras and all the military flunkeys. Granted this, what are the possible means to the end? How is Napoleon III. to set about regaining what he has lost? Even if it be supposed that Émile Ollivier can be duped and led by the nose, and made to go precisely the reverse way to that where lie his duty and his fame, why should the others do it?

Neither M. Daru, nor M. de Talhouët, nor M. Chevandier de Valdrôme are men at all likely to be duped or led astray. The two former are hard-headed, business-like, rather narrow, perhaps, but perfectly unsentimental and unidealistic; thoroughly independent and resolute; thoroughly honest, too, and accessible to no temptation. If, in a short time, the dissolution of the Chamber appears indispensable to these men, you may rest assured that the dissolution will take place. But there are two sides to this question, and here they are: The Chamber is, in its majority, or, rather, by the support of its majority, a great working medium for the new Ministers, and there can be no doubt of the confusion and, perhaps, delay in the adoption of useful steps that would be occasioned by a general election. If, then, a working majority for liberal measures can be secured in the present Chamber by the new Ministers, it might not be unwise to try and govern a year with the present Chamber, however impure may be its origin. You may say: But an assembly of an impure origin cannot be made to furnish a working majority for liberal measures. There is the point for discussion. This identical Chamber, which validated the elections of Messrs. Duvernois, Dréolle, and many others equally corrupt (and invalidated—Heaven knows why—Isaac Péreire's election) —this same Chamber voted into the Presidency the outspoken M. Schneider, and the three Liberal members into the Vice-Presidency which has been their stepping-stone to power.

Many independent and able men think that the present Chamber will furnish any working majority the new Cabinet demands of it. Of the corrupt unavailability of the present Chamber there are doubts; of its wisdom there are none. It is a foolish Chamber, and I believe that to be its true name. But if, with this foolish assembly, a majority can be got for the reform of the laws of May, 1855 (touching the election of mayors and municipal and general councillors), and for the control over the civil list, and for the electoral law, destroying the official candidates—if this can be obtained (and many believe it can be), it would be worth while considering whether the dissolution, being superfluous, would not be detrimental.

One thing is certain: should the Chamber show signs of being an instrument of reaction, true to its vitiated source, the new Ministers would have no choice. They must dissolve ruthlessly, or lose in an hour their hold on public opinion.

ITALIAN POLITICS.

II.

FLORENCE, Jan. 6, 1870.

ONE really finds himself driven to the seemingly fanciful but unavoidable conclusion that the extraordinary warmth of Italian party feeling must be due to mere differences of temper and temperament. And, in fact, on looking attentively towards the three cardinal points of this political compass, we find on the right side of the House all those whom we would call the men of common sense; who can distinguish between essentials and non-essentials; who are moderate in their hopes and fears, ever ready for compromises, and therefore fitted for practical statesmanship; a few of them have something of Cavour's serenity, and also of his craftiness, but without his bold initiative. In the centre, we find a small band of unbending, touchy, cantankerous, elderly pessimists, who enjoy nothing and spoil everybody else's pleasure; who can neither forgive nor forget, nor learn, nor change. Like Æsculapius's daughter, they sit in polar repose, letting the world revolve around them, and praying the gods that the physicians of the body politic may mend their ways and give up killing. They are "all honorable men," but hypochondriacs by nature. We have only to add that all that is excitable, restless, ambitious, and nervous is crowded together at the left extremity of the Italian parliament. If these men are always at loggerheads without any tangible cause, we may well call it a case of incompatibility of temper. This absence of clear and well-defined programmes renders Italian politics difficult to understand. Each party accuses the other of ruining the country; but one never gets beyond these generalities. To judge by their outward demeanor and their ill-suppressed excitement, their grievances and mutual imputations must be terrible indeed; but the forms of politeness being still de rigueur in Italy, all personal abuse is done anonymously, so that speeches and newspapers teem with mysterious hints and allusions and insinuations. Slang, too, and nicknames abound; and in this, Italy does not stand alone. America had her Know-Nothings and her Copperheads; England had her Cave and her Adullamites. But behind these terms there were distinct and important meanings. The uninitiated foreigner had to make enquiries, but he learnt something worth knowing. But what does he gain by learning the exact meaning of terms like Consorteria, Permanente, Coïnteressati? Let us see.

Consorteria is a part-for-the-whole term, and referred originally to a camarilla or clique of statesmen and generals of the old Piedmontese school, which was suspected of surrounding and influencing the king. The party of action, justly jealous of French influences, held these men responsible for Italy's inactivity with regard to Rome, and especially for the treaty of September, 1864, sanctioning this inactivity by the transfer of the capital to Florence. The annexed provinces, in their turn, reproached them with having piedmontized all Italy, and having swept away much that was valuable in the Tuscan and Neapolitan administrations. Nor were these reproaches altogether unfounded. But the old clique no longer exists as a clique. Neither French influence nor the Piedmontese red-tape has occupied the attention of the public for some time past, but the term Consorteria is used as freely as ever, not only for ministries whose Tuscan and Neapolitan elements outweigh the Piedmontese, but for the whole political party which has furnished these elements; that is to say, for the Right.

La Permanente may be freely rendered the sulkers. The name was given up in 1868, but nothing else. They, too, were men of the old guard of the Piedmontese parliament, a set of upright but somewhat old-fashioned politicians, who would have given up their beloved Turin for Rome, but not for Florence; and having been thwarted, they went away to their tents, in Achillean wrath, vowing to oppose everything and everybody until they could leave Florence for Rome. It is clear that these men, being the victims of the September treaty, had one grievance at least in common with the Left, which had been the party of action, while in all other respects, and especially by their political antecedents, they belonged to the right side of the house, where they occupy the right centre. They are few in number, and highly respected by both sides, but seem to have some difficulty in reciprocating this feeling. They certainly dislike the men of the Left, and have behaved most shabbily toward them during the late crisis. But what on earth are the Coïnteressati? Shall we invoke the muses? They would tell a long and ugly tale. It is a pity that the heroes of this epic, which forms the Italian history of this year, cannot be drowned at once in oblivion. Yet a short epitome is necessary to show how fierce and unscrupulous Italian partisans can be.

In its financial distress, the Italian Government, which had always farmed out the tobacco monopoly on terms justifying the expression amministrazione coïnteressata, contracted a large loan with a joint-stock company, to which the whole business was to be transferred, and which was authorized to issue a certain number of shares. Four or five deputies, but especially the editor of the principal daily paper of Florence, Signor Brenna, and his brother-in-law, Signor Fambri, both belonging to the Right, were suspected of having taken advantage of their position and of having bespoken a few shares at a time when they could feel sure of the passing of the bill, but when the subscription was not yet officially opened to the public. The supposed investments were very small, and it seems strange that the peace of a nation should have been disturbed for a whole year on account of such trifles. Still, morality knows of no trifles, and if there was foul play, the gentlemen of the Left were right in urging the point either privately or publicly, in either case, straightforwardly. But they preferred raising the venticello della calunnia, like Don Basilio, feeling sure that the whirlwind and the hurricane would follow without their bidding. In a very short time the whole atmosphere seemed haunted with suspicions, and the papers were filled with such mysterious allusions as to become well-nigh unintelligible. The Gazzettino Rosa, of Milan, a little paper whose appearance and smell belie its name most emphatically, outdid all others in slanderous and abusive language, until at last an action for libel was brought against it, which ended in a verdict of guilty. It was a real cause célèbre for Italy, the chief witnesses for the defence being Signor Crispi and Major Lobbia, both republicans of the Left.

But while this action was pending, a theft was committed in Florence. A parcel of letters disappeared from Sig. Fambri's desk. After a cautious delay, these letters were allowed to circulate clandestinely among the élite of the Left. One after the other of these gentlemen had a peep at them; they all knew these papers had been stolen, but not one of these Puritans cried "shame," or expressed in the faintest manner his disapprobation. They read and whispered, and then went on, louder than ever, to launch their accusations against "certain people." No names were mentioned, and this masquerade gave them still greater freedom in the choice and use of their cowardly weapons. At last this state of things was found to be intolerable, and the insulted Chamber, having vainly invited Sig. Crispi to specify his complaints, ordered a parliamentary enquiry. All Italy was on tip-toe. The excitement was intense. Shoals of witnesses were called, and Sig. Crispi had "mounted his engine" (to quote his own ill-chosen metaphor), quite ready for the charge. Major Lobbia, too, had handed over to the president a mysterious parcel thrice sealed, which everybody knew to contain poor Fambri's stolen letters, and which on the day of its solemn opening was to reveal to the world a monstrous tissue of iniquities committed by the leading men of the Consorteria. The end is known.

The mouse was born at last. The awful parcel was found to contain nothing even remotely compromising for Fambri and his friends, who were proved to have committed nothing either illegal or dishonorable. Lobbia naturally became the laughing-stock of Florence, even before the end of the enquiry. He seems to have felt most keenly what a sorry figure he had cut, and, in his impotent despair, resorted to a stratagem. He was found, one evening, wounded and bleeding, in a lonely street. The wound was a mere scratch, and nobody had witnessed its infliction. The scenic effect was, however, a success. Lobbia riots took place all over Italy, and the republican papers, which had been desponding on account of the enquiry, cried out once more, triumphantly, that this cowardly attack showed not only the guilt of the accused deputies, but the corruption and depravity of the whole Consorteria. Other people, however, failed to see this, and a subsequent action brought against Major Lobbia proved, beyond all doubt, that his wound had been inflicted by himself. A third law-suit, just brought to a conclusion, was instituted against the stealers of Fambri's correspondence, who were found guilty and condemned to sixteen months' imprisonment. And here endeth the Lobbiad.

The Italian legislators had become utterly unfit for anything except gossip, and were wisely sent home for the dog-days. When they met again in October, it was hoped that they had recovered, and their heads were cool enough for the voting of the estimates. But the men of the Left were still smarting and writhing. Their many defeats and exposures had been too humiliating to be forgotten so soon, and, seeing that they alone could do nothing against the majority, they had, during the recess, conspired with the old gentlemen of the Centre, who, too, were tired perhaps of shivering so long in the cold, and who on account of their paucity and their mental rigidity, were worse off than the Left. The result was the election of Sig. Lanza, of the Right Centre, for the speaker's chair. Lanza, in return, made a croaking speech on finance, and the Menabrea cabinet, with truly Italian touchiness, resigned on the 19th November. For twenty-six days no new cabinet could be formed. And who can wonder? Sig. Lanza, who undertook the task, instead of applying to the Left, with whose aid he had obtained the unexpected majority of votes, applied to his own clique, which, however, was too small to contain the necessary elements, and, rather than coalesce with his new friends, he withdrew. After many vain attempts, Sig. Sella, of the same central party, succeeded on the 15th of December in putting together a cabinet, in which the Left is even less represented than it had been in the Menabrea cabinet, and which is, with the exception of Sella and Lanza, who are central men, entirely composed of the political friends of the ousted Ministers. Nor did the country want any change either of names or principles, being justly satisfied with the Menabrea-Digny administration. But the country is ill represented by its parliament, and should dismiss its servants with scorn who waste their time in idle gossip and petty iniquities while honest and urgent work is to be done.

Correspondence.

MASSACHUSETTS CREDIT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: So many rumors have been privately circulated of late with regard to the credit of Massachusetts, and so little was said by the Governor of the State on the subject in his late message, that your readers may be glad to know what the facts really are, so far as it is possible to arrive at them. The subject is an important one not alone to Massachusetts, but to the whole country, and it is greatly to be regretted that the Boston papers have deemed it advisable to scout all discussion of it.

The market upon which Massachusetts has hitherto relied when in need of money has been a small one. All her loans have been raised through a few bankers who have had confidence in the management of her finances; to the general market she has not been in the habit of applying. Last year, however, Mr. Walker, of Springfield, was sent abroad to negotiate a loan, and he found that the usual market was not open to him; not, it is said, on account of any want of faith in the credit of the State, but from other causes of a special and temporary character. As the usual lenders would not make advantageous proposals, the only resource was the general market. And here it was that the fact first came out that the credit of the State had been impaired by the mismanagement of the last year or two. Here it was that Mr. Walker was reminded that the State had loaned $7,000,000 ($5,000,000 in gold) to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad, and advanced many more to aid in the completion of the Hoosac Tunnel. But this was not all. Bankers said to Mr. Walker, "The difficulty with your State is that we never know where she is going to be six months hence. If she would raise a round sum, and then not pass any more loan acts, we should be easily able to arrange the matter; but the trouble is that her loans come along, a few millions now, a few more next year, a few more the year after, and the result is that no man in 1869 can say what may be the indebtedness of the State in 1870."

If these facts are correct, there is every reason to say that Massachusetts' credit is impaired, and that two of the most powerful agencies at work in impairing it have been the Hoosac Tunnel and the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad. The facts become still more significant when it is recollected that the latter is again before the Legislature asking for more aid; it is six months since two millions was voted them. Very few people seem to be aware either of the application or of the intimate connection between it and the difficulty Mr. Walker found in negotiating a foreign loan. The bonds of the corporation have been distributed in every direction; the most "conservative" people in Boston are interested in the success of the road; they have never received any interest yet, and they fear that if any public disturbance is made they never will. Capital is proverbially timid. Nevertheless, it would be well for these bondholders to consider whether additional loans from the State will help matters, or whether it would be better for them to have the road managed as other roads are managed—honestly. A most amusing attempt has been made within the last few weeks to give the road a better look than it has under the presidency of Eldridge, by inviting some well-known gentlemen to take places in the direction. The story is that Judge Wm. A. Richardson, late Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Dawes, of the House of Representatives, were both asked in turn to take the presidency. A third gentleman, whose name is well known on State Street, was asked to become a director. Judge Richardson and Mr. Dawes were too wise; the third gentleman looked over the books of the company—and fled. The great reform movement having thus ignominiously failed, re-enter Eldridge, smiling, from his temporary retreat, who reassumes the curule chair, and marshals his forces for a new invasion of the treasury. Meanwhile, there are some few people who, in the Legislature and out of it, are determined to make a vigorous stand this winter against the ring. Orders have been introduced and passed in at least one branch, requiring the Attorney-General to appear in all applications for money and represent the interests of the State; another order has been passed requiring the old commissioners who were ejected last year at Eldridge's instance to appear and state what they know about the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad. They will have strange stories to tell. Something they will, perhaps, have to say of a certain bond on file in the treasury, in which some of the principal men in the road bind themselves to produce the sum of $2,000,000 whenever it may be necessary for the completion of the road. The public would gladly know why, instead of fulfilling the condition of this bond, they come begging the State for more money.

If a vigorous resistance is made, it seems almost impossible that the road should come off victorious. Yet they have the prestige of two victories on their side, and no one knows how the Governor stands, while in the distance rises an awful shape, ominous of, no one knows how much, horror, terrible with memories of the past, big with portents of the future—the spectre of the State House—the skeleton in the closet of the Governor—the South Boston Flats. A. P. M.

Boston, January 24.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce that they will republish here Freeman's "Old English History for Children;" and we will add for them that a better choice for reprint they have never made.——Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Bros. continue, with unfailing productiveness, their novel-mill, and have in press "The Maiden Widow," by Mrs. Southworth; "Why did he Marry her?" by Miss Eliza A. Dupuy; "A Marriage in High Life," by Mrs. Grey; and "The Countess of Monte Cristo."

—Among the books soon to be issued by Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co., we mention these: "Society and Solitude" is the title of Mr. Emerson's forthcoming volume of essays, which will be about a dozen in number, and of which about half will be new. One, reprinted from the Dial, will be, we believe, the essay on art which made such a stir once on a time. But even the old essays will be not altogether old, for Mr. Emerson has a way of adding and changing when he rewrites. Mr. William Mountford, whose name is better known to the reading public than the two or three volumes that he has written, is to publish a volume entitled "Miracles, Past and Present," the contents of which have already seen the light in a religious periodical. Next month we are to get the first, and next May the second, volume of Mr. Bryant's rendering of the Iliad. The Mr. Murray whose book on the Adirondack region last summer made so much noise among people who are fond of the mountains, and so much noise of a less subdued kind among people who listened to the author's advice and went up into the woods for a vacation, is about to put forth a volume of his sermons—"Music Hall Sermons," they are called. Miss E. S. Phelps, who has some luck in titles, calls her new book "Hedged In." It is a novel, we believe. Very good news for admirers of the Overland Monthly and Mr. Bret Harte, is the announcement that "The Luck of Roaring Camp," with other such sketches, is to be made up into a volume which will shortly appear. This will be its author's most important venture; for, though there is very good reading of its kind in his "Condensed Novels," and his other comic pieces in verse and prose, the pathos and humor and raciness of his later Californian sketches give him a sure foothold in the walks of the better literature. "Men and Mysteries of Wall Street" is by Mr. J. K. Medbery, whom some of our readers may perhaps recollect as the author of a North American Review article on the Jersey railroad monopolies, which was instructive and entertaining. If he has only made his new book sufficiently libellous, not only the greater will be its truth, but the more the public will be interested in a subject now perhaps growing a little stale. Mr. Lowell's volume, all prose, has, by way of dedication, this verse:

> "Love comes and goes with music in his feet,
> And tunes young pulses to his roundelays:
> Love brings thee this: Will it persuade thee, Sweet,
> That he turns proser when he comes and stays?"

There are six essays in the volume, of which all have already appeared in the North American—most of them written a couple of years or so. "Dryden" is the opening essay, and then follow "Witchcraft," "Shakespeare Once More," "New England Two Centuries Ago," "Lessing," and "Rousseau and the Sentimentalists"—a body of instructive and most satisfying criticism and talk.

—A friend of Mrs. Stowe writes, complaining that we have done her injustice in not having made any mention, in our recent article on her "Vindication of Lady Byron," of the reasons she herself gives for making her revelation, viz., that she loved and admired Lady Byron, and was provoked by a ferocious and slanderous attack on her in Blackwood's Magazine in 1869, to which attack Lady Byron's friends in England made no reply. We did not notice this, because we considered it covered completely by what we said as to the confidential nature of the communication made by Lady Byron. Clearly, nothing could be communicated confidentially to anybody, if it was exposed to extraction from the recipient of the confidence by a ruffianly attack on the person making it in a magazine or newspaper. Moreover, the silence of Lady Byron's blood relations and trustees ought, it seems to us, to have made Mrs. Stowe hesitate, or, at all events, have prevented her acting, without first ascertaining the reason of their silence or the state of their feelings. They are the natural guardians of her memory; and it appears they are also, by Lady Byron's will, its legal guardians. She does not appear, however warmly she may have felt towards Mrs. Stowe, to have looked at mutual relations in the light in which Mrs. Stowe seems to look at them. And then, we confess, we felt that we could not say what was in our mind about the Blackwood article without seeming to treat Mrs. Stowe's feelings about it with levity. Blackwood, though it has long enjoyed a high literary reputation, has been also, and is now, famous for its billingsgate. It has preserved in its treatment of opponents a considerable portion of the ruffianism for which the Quarterly Review was noted in Croker's day, and in these soberer and more decent times its abuse carries with it its own refutation. The very extravagance of its comparison of a woman so well known and so much respected as Lady Byron to a convicted French poisoner, made it harmless, ridiculous, and unworthy of notice. The world would be in a dreadful state if a slang-whanging magazine or newspaper writer had only to call persons whom we all honor and admire Borgias, or Faustinas, or Judas Iscariots, or Traupmanns, to make it necessary to meet and overwhelm him by the revelation of the most awful secrets of family life, even if in doing so we covered with opprobrium the memory of innocent third parties. We doubt if any human being thought the worse of Lady Byron for anything Blackwood said. We have never meant, of course, to throw any doubt whatever on the purity of Mrs. Stowe's motives. In one thing we cordially agree with our correspondent, and that is, that Lady Byron, whatever her faults or mistakes, had to do with a very disgusting set of people, whose performances were enough to have addled even stronger brains than hers.

—We think Mr. Samuel Austen, secretary and general agent of the Rhode Island Educational Union, would have made his recent first annual report more profitable if he had named and catalogued the towns which have opened free libraries and evening schools for adult classes, instead of referring to each anonymously and with small regard to precision. He appears to excuse himself on the ground of inability to compute the good which so much as one school or library may have accomplished; but then, nobody expects figures to tell the whole truth, but only as far as they go; and as for the good achieved by example, the more concrete the statement of what has been done, assuredly the better. As it is, we can merely repeat in a general way that a year's work on the part of the Union has resulted in establishing some twenty educational centres in different parts of the State, with a view to instructing and improving the foreign element which enters so largely into the Rhode Island population. The manufacturers, who have attracted this ignorant class from without, have of course been appealed to for sympathy and aid, and have not stood aloof; but again, we could wish to see lists of their contributions printed in full. And as there are not so many mills, why should we not have statistics of the number of hands employed —of analfabeti—of those won over to the schools, etc., etc.? One good result has been the adoption of evening schools by the municipal authorities of Providence—a practice which has for some time prevailed in this city, but which we have not hitherto observed in New England. As auxiliary to State education, and reaching those who are too old for the day-school, for its bearing on social and industrial problems, the Rhode Island movement deserves attention and success.

—An old Rugbeian has been writing to the London Times about the dreadfully bad handwriting of most of the liberally educated men in England; and apparently his letter affords a specimen of the sort of chirography of which he complains; for even the long-inured proof-reader seems to have let "clients" pass for "clerks." Indeed, the writer confesses that his hand is abominable, and he surely gives a sufficient reason. In Rugby, in his day, which was the time of the mastership of Dr. Tait, it was the fashion, as it was, and, we believe, is, in most other English schools, to punish the boys for bad behavior by requiring them to write out so many lines of Latin or Greek poetry. The correspondent says that when this requisition was made in his case, he used to tie together in a bundle some four or five pens, and write with them all at once. Why this was done, unless out of "Pure Cussedness," which builds her nest and makes her natural seat in the bosom of The Boy, we do not know. Perhaps at that period of his life this particular treasure did write the excellent and beautiful hand which he says he did, and tied his pens together so as to produce the illegibility which should serve as a cloak of his ignorance and carelessness. When he had produced on the paper a sufficient number of black lines, he used to go over the page, he says, and make "tops and tails," and carefully put in at the beginning of each line a capital letter well enough formed; say, the letters of the first ten lines of Virgil, which he knew by heart. Then, when the master asked him to read off any given line, he, knowing it by the first letter, glibly read the line which happened so to begin in the poet. As we may readily believe, this Crichton did not leave school until after he had written out, or pretended to write out, a good many thousand lines of Latin; and it is to the infliction of that particular penalty for his crimes that he attributes the destruction of his handwriting. He might safely add that some part of his ruin he owes to the carelessness with which his natural enemies examined his work.

—But the fact is that most handwriting is bad both in this country and in England, and we suspect that the prospect of its growing better is not flattering. Perhaps caligraphy is going the road that correspondence has gone. Now that one can always write to one's friends by the next mail, one does not write at all except on matters of business, and the art of correspondence is almost a lost art. What may be done at any time is never done. The telegraph, and the frequency of communication by post, and the fact that the printer is getting to be everybody's amanuensis—in short, the decreasing importance of manuscripts as things to go from hand to hand, and the tendency to brevity in such as do pass from hand to hand, must, one would imagine, do the writing-master much harm. Then, too, this latter personage is not without blame. Usually he is a person who cannot be praised as a man of philosophic mind and of sagacious method. Most of the people who teach children to write succeed in disgusting the learner at the outset. The position he is told to take is an unnatural one, or seems such to the child, who has never studied the uses of postures; and the way in which the pen is to be held is a way that no little boy or girl would ever have devised. But these obstacles to success, great as they may be, are not those which make learning to write the occupation which of all others causes most wear and tear of the childish brain, and most anguish and disgust to the childish spirit. The teacher, says an ingenious thinker upon this subject, will come to that clear understanding of the difficulty of his task which is essential to a proper performance of it, if he will just sit down and himself try to write with his left hand. He will then have put himself in his young friend's place, and if, as a result of this, he does not go on with his teaching in a mood of more patience and gentleness, and with a truer conception of the misery of his pupil, and so with a greater likelihood of making things easier for the small unfortunate, his heart and his head alike must be worse than a writing-master's need to be. This same philosopher, we may add—whose educational works are not published—strongly recommends teachers who are instructing children learning to read to get themselves into a state of due appreciation of the trials and difficulties of the learner, and of proper abasement of their own pride of intellect, by trying to read any ordinary primer with the page turned upside down. Thenceforth they will find themselves not so willing to pull the ears and knuckle the heads and rap the hands of poor young gentlemen who know their letters, indeed, but who boggle over whole words. On the upside-down page the teacher himself will be able to distinguish and name each letter perfectly well; but not if he were Solomon himself could he read off a paragraph without exposing himself to the danger of corporal punishment at the hands of a hasty judge.

—"The current derivation and meaning of the words Holy Grail are contradicted by Sir George Bowyer in a London paper. He says that 'the true interpretation of the word Sangreal in the original legend is not Holy Grail, but sang réal, that is to say, real blood, meaning the Real Blood in the Sacrament of the Altar.'" We find the foregoing paragraph in the Boston Daily Advertiser of January 17. Sir George would seem to belong to that school of popular etymologists who derive Bacchanals from Bag o' nails and Bellerophon from Bully Ruffin. Nothing is better settled than the derivation of Grail, Gréal, and Graal, from the Low Latin gradalis (or gradale), meaning a cup or dish. Other forms are graletus and grasala. The Provençal forms of the word, grazal and grasal, point back to gradalis. The origin of gradalis is uncertain. Diez adopts Roquefort's suggestion of crater, though without giving him credit for it. Moreover, sang réal means royal blood, as Sir George Bowyer might have learned from Borel, who propagated, if he did not originate, the hysteron-proteron derivation, whose ghost, it seems, still walks.

—In Maine, at the end of 1868 there were forty Universalist clergymen; at the end of 1869 there were thirty-two. In Massachusetts, at the former time there were 112 ministers of this denomination; at the latter time there were 106. In all the New England States except New Hampshire there has been, during the year just passed, a decrease in the number of Universalist clergymen, and the same thing is true of New York and New Jersey. There is now, as before, one such clergyman in Delaware; in Virginia there is one; so there is in West Virginia, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, and in Maryland, while South Carolina and Alabama have now, as in 1868, two apiece. Some man more witty than reverent, and perhaps as wise as witty, who lived in a fever-and-ague district in Virginia, is reported to have told a Unitarian preacher that it was of no use for him to preach his mild doctrines in any county where the people were compelled to use quantities of blue pills. They wanted doctrines as drastic as their medicines, he said. The measure of success which the Unitarians have had in the South would seem to give confirmation to this evidence, and the same thing may be said of Universalist progress in the same part of the country. It may, however, be said to hold its own there; and, speaking generally, we may say that while Universalism falls off a little in New England and the North-east, and holds its own in the South, it makes in the West some slight gains. These, however, barely balance its losses, if we may judge by the figures given in the Universalist, for the net gain in the total number of members is but sixteen. As the Christian Union remarks, so slight an increase as this is to be called a decline if compared with the growth of other denominations. Some months ago we thought we had reason enough for saying that Universalism was of far less importance than it was thirty years ago; and that we believed it could be shown that there were perhaps at the moment absolutely fewer Universalist societies in the North and East than there had ever been before, and certainly were fewer relatively to the societies of other bodies of Christians. Here, now, we have the figures which it was thought by some of our contemporaries we should do wisely not to invoke. It is, however, to be freely admitted that, if Universalism as criticism of the harsher Calvinistic dogmas has lost much of its old weight, that is in good part because it has been of efficient service in ameliorating Calvinism—Universalizing it. A consideration is suggested that Universalist New England loses her young men to the West. But, then, Congregationalist, and Baptist, and Methodist New England do that too; and the West is not giving disproportionate gains to the Universalists, nor even proportionate.

—Perhaps for one reason or another the readers of Tennyson's new volume may wish to go back to Sir Thomas Malory, whose book of "The Historie of King Arthur" will be found easy and pleasant reading by many who do and a great many who do not care for the "Idyls of the King." It is a book which deserves, very much more than the books for which he made it, Charles Lamb's ingenious defence of the comic stage of the Restoration; for it introduces the reader to a world far enough removed from the worky-day world of the present times, and yet not a world in which there is a perilous lack of all morality. It has a morality of its own, not the less useful perhaps for being peculiar, and the very worst that can be said of it is that it charms the mind to indolence and withdraws it from the realities of life; and this worst is not so very bad; a bold man might say that it is even a good thing that can be said about it that it takes the imagination millions of miles away from the life immediately surrounding us and gives the mind a play-day. This it does so well that, if any heretic who knows it should be pleased to resent Mr. Tennyson's preaching from Sir Thomas's heroes and texts, we, for our part, should not feel bound to quarrel with him. Not all the romances used by Sir Thomas in making his delightful compilation have been saved from destruction, and one "Sir Balin le Savage" has been hunted for high and low by the students of Arthurian legendary lore. We learn that it has just been found in Paris, and has been secured for England by a wealthy collector.

—We have spoken before of the great results obtained by the English commission which has it in charge to collect from all quarters manuscripts relating to English history. The story goes now that the archives of the city of London are rich in documents which, if they can be brought to the sun, will be of great help to the future historian of the Wars of the Roses—a bloody and troublous period of English history more interesting than well known. It is hardly to be hoped that the authorities of the city will yield to the commission their power in the premises, and we may therefore wish all the more heartily that the ancient corporation may remember the days when it used to indulge itself in keeping a poet, and may be as liberal and public-spirited in the search for the supposed treasures as its tradition shows that it often has been in other good causes.

—Ellendt's "Lexicon Sophocleum" has passed a second edition in Germany at one-half (six thalers and two-thirds) the former price, though the present editor, Dr. Genthe (son of the novelist), has almost doubled its size by availing himself of the scholia discovered since the former publication in 1834, as also of the important grammatical labors of Dr. Curtius; thus making the work so complete that the new dictionary announced by Dindorf may scarcely be expected to advance much the study of the author. In the department of Greek metre are to be mentioned a revised edition of the lyrical part of Bernhardy's "Geschichte der griechischen Literatur" (History of Grecian Literature), and a novel, if not new, attempt made by Moritz Schmidt, in explaining the chorals of Sophocles, to harmonize the poet's rhythm with the modern system of notes. "Eine philosophisch-historische Grammatik der deutschen Sprache" (A Philosophical and Historical Grammar of the German Language), by Westphal, contains the investigations of the Grimms, so well reduced in a brief compass as to be a sort of supplement to, and even substitute for, the bulky original. The new edition of Grimm's Grammar is thus far a reprint of that known as the second edition, with slight alterations. Grimm himself collected all the matter relating to particles together, and thus probably intended to abandon the historical method pursued in the former editions. Dr. W. Scherer, under whose care the reissue is conducted, seems unable to work in the new materials. Weigand, who, with Hildebrand, undertook the continuation of Grimm's Dictionary, has furnished the first part of his share, of which it is as necessary to admit the value as that Hildebrand works quite as well and much more rapidly. In the department of comparative philology a new (third) edition of Bopp's "Vergleichende Grammatik" (Comparative Grammar), with unimportant additions, is to be noticed. Dietz's "Grammatik der romanischen Sprachen" (Grammar of the Romanic Languages) has been considerably increased, particularly the part relating to old Italian. Professor Weber, of Berlin, has dedicated to Ernest Renan a collection of review articles written during the last twenty years, and now published as "Streifen auf dem Gebiete der indischen Philologie" (Excursions in the Domain of Indian Philology). Very worthy of mention is S. Nagel's "Französisch-englisches etymologisches Wörterbuch innerhalb des Lateinischen"—perhaps the first attempt to gather together the French and English words derived from the Latin, to contrast them with the primitive words, and thus render perspicuous the laws governing the transition from the Latin to French or English, as also from French to English. Dr. Ebel, the director of a gymnasium in a small city in Posen, has elaborated Zeus's "Grammatica Celtica" in a manner and with a fulness of detail that astonish the French critics. The publisher received the prize of the Paris Academy, and Ebel has been elected an honorary member of the Dublin Academy. "Das Buch der Familie Froschauer" (Book of the Froschauer Family), containing a register of all the books printed by the house of Froschauer, in Zürich, is of interest to English readers, as it is now beyond a doubt that Coverdale's Bible was printed by Froschauer in 1529. It is no small fault of the editor, E. Camillo Rudolphi, that the titles are given abbreviated, so that one is frequently in doubt concerning the identity of a book in question. Brockhaus is to undertake for Dr. Carl Bruhns, director of the Leipzig Observatory, a two-volume Life of Humboldt on a novel plan. "A scientific biography" is to be the title of it, and it will consist of two parts—one general, describing Humboldt's outward life and the course of his development, by many writers, including Dr. Avé-Lallemant, of Lübeck, Prof. Foerster, director of the Berlin Observatory, and the editor himself; the second showing Humboldt's activity in various sciences in detail—viz., meteorology and hydrography, by Dr. Dove, of Berlin; physiology, by Dr. E. du Bois-Reymond, of Berlin; zoölogy, by Dr. Carus, of Leipzig; distribution of plants and botany, by Dr. Grisebach, of Göttingen; geology and mineralogy, by Dr. Ewald, of Berlin; geography, by Dr. O. Peschel, of Augsburg; astronomy and mathematical geography, by Dr. Bruhns; physics and magnetism, by Dr. Wiedemann, of Carlsruhe. Several original portraits of Humboldt, as yet never reproduced, will adorn this unique publication. Anything that relates to the subject and not likely to be accessible to his biographers will be gladly received by the editor.

—If we could suppose some one to have collected and published lately the private correspondence of Governor Andrew, containing opinions of General Butler's rule at New Orleans of such a nature as to lead the latter to prosecute the editor for defamation, we should have a pretty close analogy to a case just decided in the Milan courts—or, rather, decided in the first instance, for an appeal is to be taken. The particulars of this suit were given, when it was first threatened, in the Nation of February 18, 1869 (p. 132). Prof. Franchi had edited the Epistolario of the late Giuseppe La Farina, and the public conduct of Deputy Crispi, while a member of the Sicilian government after the revolution in 1860, having been severely censured in some of the letters, Crispi demanded of Franchi an early apology, which failing, he would, he declared, resort to legal proceedings. The editor, however, declined to adopt and excuse, as if his own, the sentiments of La Farina, and asserted for himself the simple performance of a duty he owed to history. The result is that he has been condemned to five days' imprisonment and a fine of thirty dollars, and to insert his sentence in every unsold copy of the Correspondence, under pain of confiscation. The case was judged solely with reference to the Italian press laws, which are very liberal, and whose application in this instance the counsel of Franchi deny to have been warranted. The more interesting and universal question, as to the limits of historical fidelity when the character of the living is involved, was excluded by the court. It therefore practically decided that the adequate study or presentation of the men, parties, ideas, and events of any given period of contemporaneous history is subordinate to the reputation of survivors who may have fallen under censure—a ruling which bears particularly hard on Italy, where politics are so intensely personal, but which would be found embarrassing elsewhere; and it possibly overrates the injury which, in a country where the press is free, can be inflicted by posthumous publications.

LOWELL'S "CATHEDRAL."*

THE opinions expressed by the critics who, so far, have spoken of Mr. Lowell's new poem seem to be, substantially, three in number. One is held by a solitary gentleman, of "the metropolitan press," "compact of thankless earth," who thinks that "The Cathedral" is a fair specimen of the sort of thing that the New England writers have now for a long time been successfully palming off on the rest of mankind as poetry, whereas, in reality, it is so and so. Another opinion is that this latest of his poems is by far Mr. Lowell's best, and that it is sure of a long immortality; and a third is that "The Cathedral" is a fine poem, but that the poet does hardly so well in it as in the old anti-slavery poetry. Perhaps if we assent to that part of the second of these three judgments which predicts for "The Cathedral" a long immortality, we shall have done all that is necessary—so far as concerns picking and choosing between them.

"Far through the memory shines a happy day," says the poet, beginning far off, like his own "musing organist." He can remember, he says—

. . . . . "Nay, they are present still, Parts of myself, the perfume of my mind"— some few such happy days, when, recluse from playmates, he was compelled to seek "Companionship in things that not denied

Nor granted wholly; as is Nature's wont,
Who, safe in uncontaminate reserve,
Lets us mistake our longing for her love."

And some such he proceeds to recall. He speaks of them not in a certain mood with which his poetry has made readers of it familiar, though it may be doubted if it is so much his favorite one as he seems to say—that mood in which all the shows of nature affect the beholder who remembers old times with a joy, or else with

"A pathos, from the years and graves between."

Nor yet does he speak of them in the mood, of frequent recurrence with him, in which he looks, baffled, on the imperturbable face of enduring, constant Nature, self-sufficing, unintelligible, immovable, the open secret. Both of these moods are discoverable in the poem. But of late the latter seems to be tempered by a religious trust which forbids overmuch questioning; or even dismisses the problem. And the former was always held in check by the poet's mere delight in the sights and sounds of nature, and by the high enjoyment, almost animal in its character, which these stirred in him. Then, again, this sentimental way of making nature tributary and subservient to our own joys and woes of spirit has almost always been well held in check by still another power in Mr. Lowell—by his gift of objective perception and presentation of what passes around him. It is, for instance, winter pure and simple—that is, winter plus no more of the poet's self than there is of realistic artist in the poet—that we see in the admirable scene in Quompegan Street.

And it is interesting to see, as we think we do, that these four memorable days of which "The Cathedral" tells, days stamped upon the child's mind, "as never any since," were stamped there by the combined action of those two powers of his nature to the action of which may be attributed his best work. We quote the winter-day piece:

"And once I learned how marvellous winter was,
When past the fence-rails, downy-gray with rime,
I creaked adventurous o'er the spangled crust
That made familiar fields seem far and strange
As those stark wastes that whiten endlessly
In ghastly solitude about the pole,
And gleam relentless to the unsetting sun:
Instant the candid chambers of my brain
Were painted with these sovran images;
And later visions seem but copies pale
From those unfading frescoes of the past,
Which I, young savage, in my age of flint,
Gazed at and dimly felt a power in me
Parted from nature by the joy in her
That doubtfully revealed me to myself."

Who that can paint the world after that fashion needs, or is very likely, to let it trouble him too much? The descriptions of the other three days are less realistic than this; they painted themselves less instant and less vivid on the brain of the beholder. But his delicate susceptibility to the influences surrounding him they show quite as plainly; and more plainly they show his capacity of being moved by things vaguer and more impalpable to the mind than mental influences. In short, we see made evident in these four happy days the two things which are made manifest in what we have been accustomed to consider our author's very best and most enduring work, whether in verse or prose—namely, his wonderful power of sympathy, and his power as an objective painter of things conceived or observed objectively. And it would not be fanciful to say that we may see in the boy, affected as he here sets forth, the maker of the "Biglow Papers," so far as that work is sharp delineations of typical characters which are everywhere about us; and so far, also, as it is truthful pictures of individual men. The sympathetic diviner of other personalities whom we respect in the maturer critic and painter of character, and the observer who sees the thing as it is, seem to us clearly visible in the first half-dozen of these pages before us, which relate the boy's impressions.

* "The Cathedral. By James Russell Lowell." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1870.

We may say here that a jarring expression in the last three or four of the verses just quoted is an indication of a fault in our author which, while it has never detracted from what is called the interest of his works, rather, indeed, has added to it, has yet almost always more or less injured their beauty and final satisfactoriness. That "young savage in his age of flint" is a young savage, sure enough; if only for his barbarous intrusion. The mind goes off at a tangent from the matter in hand, the poet once letting go his hold upon it in that abrupt manner, and there is no reason why it should come back till after the age of "lake dwellings" and then all the metallic ages have had a little attention. Mr. Lowell says himself, as he is going away from the cathedral at which he had planned to spend happy hours of abandonment:

> "I, who to Chartres came to feed my eye,
> And give to Fancy one clear holiday,
> Scarce saw the minster for the thoughts it stirred."

And so it often happens with him. The self-pleasing activity of a mind remarkably quick and remarkably open to suggestion, wide-reaching and subtle, and which has at command numberless treasures with which to play, often prevents him from keeping himself steadily to the artistic elaboration of the piece of workmanship in hand. Thus we get many jewels, but not often the perfect jewel. And even if he gives us all that we should have had, he is apt to be unwisely prodigal and give us more—much that it would have been better for him, and better in the end for us, had he withheld. What is more exquisite of its kind than the little gem in "Under the Willows," called "Auf Wiedersehen"? But it has a palinode; which, however, as it graciously happens, does it no harm. And which, after all—let it be said in rebuke of our ingratitude—is at the worst no worse than some brilliants given us with our diamond. Nevertheless, there still stands, and always will stand, always to be regarded, the rule of "Naught in overplus"—to use the words of our author to himself; for no one finds any fault with Mr. Lowell that he has not already found with himself.

"O more than half-way turn that Grecian front," he says to the muse—

> "O more than half-way turn that Grecian front
> Upon me, while with self-rebuke I spell,
> On the plain fillet that confines thy hair,
> In conscious bounds of seeming unconstraint,
> The Naught in overplus, thy race's badge."

Listening to her advice, we doubt if Mr. Lowell would not have retrenched the amusing meeting with the three Englishmen in the town and here and there one or two other passages—too brief almost to be called passages—which also seem out of keeping, or else are such as distract the attention.

The poet decides, as we have said, that he will give his muse a feast which he had long secretly designed her—a day something like the days that stand out so bright and complete in his boyhood, and, to that end, he goes to visit the cathedral. He meets the British foe above-mentioned; then, escaping, and musing as he goes on various matters, he strolls through the town:

> "With outward senses furloughed and head bowed
> I followed some fine instinct in my feet,
> Till, to unbend me from the loom of thought,
> Looking up suddenly," the Cathedral stands before him. He sees himself

> "Confronted with the minster's vast repose.
> Silent and gray as forest-leaguered cliff
> Left inland by the ocean's slow retreat,
> That hears afar the breeze-borne rote, and longs,
> Remembering shocks of surf that clomb and fell
> Spume-sliding down the baffled decuman,
> It rose before me patiently remote
> From the great tides of life it breasted once, > Hearing the noise of men as in a dream."

Then he falls into meditations, which constitute the poem, and his muse's holiday is but a somewhat sad one. We have not space to follow the line of thought, but we indicate it generally when we say that the difference, in point of faith, between the men of to-day and the cathedral-builders first engages the poet, and both come in for some praise and some blame. Their likeness in essential qualities, even those affecting religion, seems to be asserted, and the hope and belief is expressed, though not without some misgivings, that we are again to have what will answer to the pervading faith, and the worship of ideals above ourselves, which distinguished the Middle Ages. Even the Western man, the new Goth, the son of Democracy—

> "Of earth's anarchic children latest born"—

"this backwoods Charlemagne of empires new," this "brown-fisted rough,"

> "Who, meeting Cæsar's self, would slap his back, > Call him 'Old Horse,' and challenge to a drink,"— even he is, by-and-by, to have a faith and worship, and it is to be not unlike some form of Christianity:

> "Doubtless his church will be no hospital
> For superannuate forms and mumping shams,
> No parlor where men issue policies
> Of life-assurance on the eternal mind;
> Nor his religion but an ambulance
> To fetch life's wounded and malingerers in,
> Scorned by the strong; yet he, unconscious heir
> To the influence sweet of Athens and of Rome,
> And old Judea's gift of secret fire,
> Spite of himself shall surely learn to know
> And worship some ideal of himself,
> Some divine thing, large-hearted, brotherly,
> Not nice in trifles, a soft creditor,
> Pleased with his world, and hating only cant,
> And if his Church be doubtful, it is sure
> That in a world, made for whatever else,
> Not made for mere enjoyment—in a world
> Of toil but half requited, or, at best,
> Paid in some futile currency of breath—
> A world of incompleteness, sorrow swift,
> And consolation laggard, whatsoe'er
> The form of building or the creed professed,
> The Cross, bold type of shame to homage turned,
> Of an unfinished life that sways the world,
> Shall tower as sovereign emblem over all."

There are a great many happinesses of thought and expression to which we should be glad to call attention—some of them only wit; some of them better than wit, as, for example, the last line of this:

> "Such wine as Dante poured, or he who blew
> Roland's vain blast, or sang the Campeador
> In verse that clanks like armor in the charge, > Homeric juice, if brimmed in Odin's horn;"

or this, of Gothic architecture:

> "And they could build, if not the columned fane
> That from the height gleamed seaward many-hued,
> Something more friendly with their ruder skies:
> The gray spire molten now in driving mist,
> Now lulled with the incommunicable blue,
> The carvings touched to meanings new with snow,
> Or commented with fleeting grace of shade.
> . . . . . .
> The painted windows, frecking gloom with glow,
> Dusking the sunshine which they seem to cheer,
> Meet emblem of the senses and the soul;
> And the whole pile grim with the Northman's thought
> Of life, and death, and doom, life's equal fee;"

or, thinking of the Parthenon, take this picture, in itself and in contrast with the last:

> "The Grecian gluts me with its perfectness,
> Unanswerable as Euclid, self-contained,
> The one thing finished in this hasty world,
> For ever finished."

But the poet confesses himself a Gothic soul; a believer in "the architects of dream," the "builders of aspiration incomplete:"

> "I looked, and owned myself a happy Goth."

And perhaps "the lofty rhyme" also may be so builded. Perhaps even it must be, if builded by men of our blood and time. However that may be, we can advise all our readers to spend "a day at Chartres"—so the poem was to have been called, they say—and having spent one they will find themselves ready to spend more, for the poem is all profitable, and much of it is beautiful, and it will endure studious acquaintance.

ECCE FEMINA.*

THE author of the work before us deftly exposes the weakness of the suffrage movement, but has not always armed himself to grapple with its strength. Though the book has a general tone of thoughtfulness and courtesy, it is yet likely to mislead in the respect that the positions which it charges upon the whole body of "innovators" can be justly affirmed only of its radical wing. With this reservation, we sympathize with its complaints of the free and independent logic which characterizes the suffrage advocates—their unreasonable presumptions against their respectable forefathers, their venturesome leap from certain evils to an uncertain cure, and, above all, their determination of woman's destiny, without even an oblique glance at her marriage relations. Mr. White insists upon those physical and mental distinctions which, adapting the sexes to different uses, are yet compatible with their equality. This equality he states to be one of usefulness (a sense in which a scavenger is equal to a statesman); whether it is also one of dignity he leaves to conjecture. He is right in his conclusion that a distinction of sphere is the corollary of a distinction of nature; but this admission merely opens the enquiry into the character of that sphere—an enquiry which admits of no dogmatism, for it involves much of political economy, and nearly the whole of social science. It is probable that the great body of disputants upon this subject are not as widely opposed as they imagine. Both parties will concede that the nature of the sexes is not so diverse but that each should be interested in, and exercise some influence upon, the pursuits of the other. According to Mr. White, the quiet suasion which women now exert is salutary to political life, and the dispute between him and his antagonists narrows, therefore, to the question, Should this political influence (admitted beneficial in society) be potentially expressed at the polls? Our author argues against the polls, asserting that the beneficence of woman's power is owing to her moral superiority; that this last is solely the effect of her situation, and would be lost by contact with the political world.

* "Ecce Femina. An Attempt to Solve the Woman Question. By Carlos White." Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1870.

In his chapter on the family, he answers that question which is really the fundamentality of this whole enquiry, viz., Is society an aggregation of families or of individuals? Upon this head, he reasons that government is made for the masses, and not the exceptions; that in almost all cases men do represent their wives as well as their children; therefore, to save expense, disorder, and corruption, the law judiciously regards every head of a family as its representative. In illustrating the danger of a different course, he points to those statutes which imply that a man and his wife are twain, by enabling the latter to hold property in her own right. As, however, the interests of married people are really identical, counterfeit bankruptcy is everywhere the result. This is an argument of great weight to those who agree with the author that the political disability of women is for the general good, and that the exceptions to its beneficence should therefore be disregarded. Those, however, whom he especially addresses might maintain that, if nature is the ground for considering the family a unit, it should be remembered that suffrage, or property laws, which merely recognize a distinction between the husband and wife, do not force an alienation of their interests, but leave the parties free to combine them, according to the dictates of affection and mutual advantage. They would further urge that the "innovators" are as hostile to contradictions of natural law as the conservators, but that the former insist that a jurisprudence which supplements nature (by forcing community of interest) is as false in principle as one that opposes it. With respect to the illustration cited, they might war as Greek against Greek, and maintain that a legislation generally benign must involve exceptional inconvenience; but that in the case referred to, special provisions might be framed to prevent fraudulent conveyances.

Mr. White successfully proves that the elective franchise is not a natural right, but a civil gift, grounded on expediency; and, by way of showing the inexpedience of female suffrage, asserts that women themselves decline it. He should remember, however, that none but extremists expect or even wish women to vote until they desire it; and that the present agitation is for the purpose of creating the desire. He refers their indifference or opposition to a natural aversion to politics; an explanation which we will supplement by the suggestion that a class raised to mental apathy might be expected to shrink from a privilege which involves a demand upon time and thought. In his opposition to female suffrage, Mr. White cites the Bible from Moses to St. Paul; but those who recollect that the same authority was quoted forward and back to prove that Ham should for ever remain a servant to his brethren, will be likely to trust that the exegetical skill which was equal to the one difficulty will suffice for the other.

In the ablest portion of his book, the author considers the question of woman's labor, showing that the existing inferiority of her wages is not only inevitable, but to be desired. As a fruit of the insane ravings about household drudgery, many of the industries for women are oversupplied, while the lack of female domestics has become a national evil. Even in those fields which they do not consider beneath them, women will not work ambitiously nor form permanent engagements, because of the "coming man." These causes, of course, lower the wages of the class, and the exceptions suffer with the rule. But even if it were possible to average the wages of men and women, and to give both the same remuneration for the same labor, the most disastrous effects would ensue; for the husband would then be unable to support his family, and the wife would be obliged to abandon her proper cares to assist him. Marriage, as a consequence, would lose half its attractions and usefulness, and fall into comparative neglect.

In conclusion, we will venture to predict that "Ecce Femina" will be welcomed by the opponents of female suffrage as a forcible presentation of their views, while those conservative innovators who have long been groaning "the Lord deliver us from our friends, and we will take care of our enemies," will regard it as the providence they invoked.

Tales of Old Travel Re-narrated. By Henry Kingsley. (London: Macmillan & Co. 1869.)—We trust there are some parents whose care for their children's reading continues after the season of gifts is past. To such we may say that Mr. Henry Kingsley, whose later novels have been so far inferior to his early promise, has partly redeemed his reputation by writing a really capital book for boys, and for men too, called "Tales of Old Travel Re-narrated." The tales are sixteen in number, stretching in space from Spitzbergen to the Southern Pacific, and all round the world, and extending in time from Marco Polo to "The Foundation of an Empire," which bids fair to be as great as any that Marco Polo told of—Australia. They form a small library of travels, an epitome of the narratives of sixteen adventurous rovers. Mr. Kingsley is well fitted to write such a book. His experience as a novelist and his experience as a traveller combine to render his accounts vivid and sensational.

His style is simple, straightforward, almost careless, tinged perhaps with a little conceit, but not the less enjoyable on that account, since he does not offend one's own; his subject is so full of matter that he has no need of padding. He says many bright things himself, and has the knack, while giving the pith of the stories in very small compass, to retain the most interesting details, and quote enough of the language to impart a life-like coloring. Those who cannot read the original narratives at leisure and in full—which, of course, is the best thing to do—will find it the next best to let Mr. Kingsley "skip" for them. He does not leave out all the plums, and he is not afraid to stop now and then to digress a little or explain an obscure phrase or fact; and in doing this he gives proof of a good memory and considerable reading—as where, in "The Sufferings of Robert Everard," he adduces in support of Everard's credibility the account of Captain Alexander Hamilton, who was at Bassorah shortly after Everard was there in 1692; and further illustrates the matter by an amusing story about the city from Franklin's voyage from Bengal to Persia (1787), besides quoting from Darwin, Palgrave, and Rabbi Benjamin; and all this without any offensive parade of learning, but rather as a bright boy will recall the parts of his reading that have made an impression on him. And so the book is a good example to put before boys of the right way to read.

Under Lock and Key. A Story. By T. W. Speight, author of "Brought to Light," "Foolish Margaret," etc. (Philadelphia: Turner Brothers & Co. 1869.)—Mr. Speight is fairly entitled to whatever amount of glory ought rightfully to belong to a successful imitator of a model so little worth imitating as Mr. Wilkie Collins. His preface to this novel informs the reader that he denied himself the pleasure of reading "The Moonstone" until after the completion of his own work, and that, therefore, the resemblances that exist between the two must be counted as accidental. They are very many and very strong; but we see no particular reason why each writer might not have evolved his plot unassisted. It was not, we suppose, by an act of the higher imagination that Mr. Collins conceived the idea of a yellow diamond worth thirty thousands pounds sterling, which, being stolen from the forehead of an Indian idol, should give rise to an ingenious game of hide-and-seek for its recovery; and there seems no reason why both he and Mr. Speight should not at about the same time have hit upon the plan of putting precious stones to so very appropriate a use as making them the hinges upon which should turn the plot of a novel. There is not only a diamond in each book, but in each an Indian idol, with a cavity in its forehead for accommodating the gem. As for Mr. Speight, he does not so much imitate Mr. Collins generally as travesty his details—he is contented with getting general outlines and ideas from other writers; for, though he is in the mass a disciple of Mr. Collins, he is not in particulars above accepting a hint here and there from Mr. Dickens. We suppose, for instance, that Lady Pollexfen owes her existence to Miss Havisham, and that her husband's coffin, which she keeps in an upper room of her house for twenty years, promenading nightly around it, is only a ghastly copy of her prototype's worm-eaten and spider-covered wedding-cake. Still, Mr. Speight's story is readable, and will be enjoyed by people who delight in the kind of novels of which it is a fairly good specimen. In some respects we are not sure that it is not preferable to Mr. Collins's own handwork. For example, Mr. Speight's theatrical properties are throughout of a cheaper kind than Mr. Collins's—a circumstance which we find greatly in his favor. To our taste, one of the least agreeable things about Mr. Collins's novels is the solemn clap-trap with which they abound, and with which their author seems trying to persuade himself, as well as his readers, that there is something intrinsically valuable and worth doing about his work. Mr. Speight, on the contrary, seems to have a lurking suspicion that it is not a branch of high art that he is pursuing. Such as it is, his work is done well enough to ensure him plenty of readers, however, and so give him all the encouragement he needs.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Appleton's Journal, Vol. II.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Brown (S. G.), Life of Rufus Choate, 2d ed.	(Little, Brown & Co.)
Broome (F. N.), The Stranger of Scriphos: a Poem	(Macmillan & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 19, swd.	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Froude (J. A.), History of England, Vols. V., VI.	(C. Scribner & Co.)	2 50
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Eoline: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Harper (Mrs. M. J.), Practical Composition	(C. Scribner & Co.)
McBride (J.), Pioneer Biography, Butler County, Ohio.	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)	3 50
Mommsen (T.), History of Rome, Vol. II.	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Martin (Mrs. C. B.), The Story of Muff: a Tale, swd.	(Short & Harmon)
The Little Nortons: a Tale	" "
Maverick (A.), Henry J. Raymond and the New York Press.	(A. S. Hale & Co.)
Mrs. Jernigham's Journal: a Poem	(Macmillan & Co.)
Smith (Julie P.), Widow Goldsmith's Daughter: a Tale.	(Brown & Gross)
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XXIII., swd.	(Hurd & Houghton)	0 75
The True Story of Mrs. Shakespeare's Life, swd.	(Loring)	0 10

Fine Arts.

A MUSEUM OF THE FINE ARTS FOR BOSTON.

We have spoken recently* of the simultaneous undertaking in New York and in Boston of similar projects for museums of the Fine Arts. The two plans are similar only in their general purpose, however; it would be difficult to arrange the two more dissimilarly than they find themselves arranged by circumstances over which nobody can be said to have any control. Here, in New York, everything is vague, undetermined, undefined. A few persons may know what they would have the Museum be, what collections are of the first importance, and which are the most practicable and within reach; but these few persons have hardly compared notes, and as yet they hold no power in the premises, no power over funds already raised, and no visible power of raising funds. The greatest things are possible; total failure and a speedy abandonment of the whole project is possible. Two months hence there may be a sufficient and intelligent scheme in full working order, money in hand and more coming in, collections forming and preparations making for the proper commencing of others; and two months hence we may be settled in the old despair, founded on a conviction that there is not social life enough in New York for the success of any undertaking of the kind. As yet it has not been announced in any way what the New York Art Museum is to be, nor has it been hinted at how any art museum is to be brought into being. Now, in Boston, at the same time, a tangible and comprehensible scheme is on foot, in the hands of persons who know what they mean to have, and who control funds enough to ensure at least a partial success. As there is every reason to believe that the first step well taken will be the only difficult one, and that the path will be easy, once entered on, we think that Boston must be admitted to be well ahead of New York. One building of the right sort, built and stocked intelligently—a hundred thousand dollars so expended—will explain to all the meaning of the words, "Museum of the Fine Arts," and will interest in the project those who are capable of being interested.

There exists in Boston, on the "Back Bay" made lands, a large lot of ground, pretty well known, as regards location and size, from having held the Coliseum last June. By the forethought of a few gentlemen who fortunately held influence at the right time, this lot was reserved, from its first laying-out and filling-up, for the buildings of a future museum or institution of the Fine Arts, to be used for no other purpose, but to remain a park for ever, unless put to the use above-named. The first enterprise which can promise and give bonds for vigorous action would seem, therefore, to have its land provided for it. So much assured, the question of money to build with comes next, and with it the question of works of art to put into the building, or money to buy them with. It is probable that the Lawrence collection of armor, spoken of in our former issue, can be had. It is probable also that the Gray collection of engravings can be released from its place of safe-keeping in Harvard College Library, and exhibited in any good and safe building in Boston; and we have tried to show, in two recent articles, how important it is that that noble collection should be accessible to all. The works of art in the possession of the Athenæum, such as they are, can also be counted on for the new building. And of money for building we hear of fifty thousand dollars as secure; the best possible ground for believing as much more to be procurable.

Fifty thousand dollars, however, will suffice to build a plain, fire-proof, substantial building, two stories high; the lower story lighted by windows looking toward the north, the upper story lighted by skylights; the lower story large enough for the engravings and the armor, the upper story more than large enough for all the desirable paintings now within reach. What is proposed for the contents of the larger building, if the additional sum is raised? A collection, systematic, select, historically arranged, of casts of Grecian and Græco-Roman sculpture.

Too many persons, and not in this country only, have allowed themselves to consider casts from sculpture as proper to a drawing-school, but unworthy of a place in a museum of art. Too many persons, impressed by the sight of the very original statue or group, so renowned, so quoted and praised, so ancient and curious, would forget, in the presence of even a perfect cast, that all the original was in it except the associations and the romance, and generally greater beauty of material. There is a danger that these feelings may influence too much the action of those who will control these projected museums, and that there will be too decided a preference of original works of art of less artistic value and of vastly greater cost to these inexpensive and invaluable reproductions.

Let it be remembered, always, that certain fragments of Greek sculpture approach perfection more nearly than any or all other works of art, and show us the profoundest knowledge of nature in its highest forms, and the most consummate artistic ability that man has been found capable of. Let it be remembered, also, that, while the only less perfect and more varied art—central Italian painting—cannot be in any way well reproduced, and can be imperfectly reproduced only at great cost, the art of Grecian sculpture can be studied as well in a cast costing fifty dollars as in the original—the pride of a great national museum. Twenty thousand dollars would buy and bring to our shores the best pieces of the central time of Greek art. Fifty thousand dollars would make the collection of the best period fairly complete, giving small pieces as well as large, bas-reliefs as well as statues, engraved stones as well as colossal groups, terra-cottas as well as marbles. Or fifty thousand dollars will give us the best pieces of all times, beginning with archaism and bringing the student to the cold formalities of Roman Greek sculptures under the later empire. But these sums will be small when we shall begin to contend with the galleries of Europe for those precious bronzes, marbles, paintings, vases, and manuscripts, which are at once the artist's and the collector's delight. We may hope to have those too; we can afford it; we may grow wise enough to spend millions on works of art; and we shall insist on originals at any price where the artist's touch and the purity of his conception cannot be preserved in a copy. But let us get first the very best things of all, which also are the cheapest.

In this respect, then, Boston is wise. And indeed the general plan, which consists in first accepting what is offered and housing it well, and, second, getting low-priced art of the best quality and most powerful educational influence, has a good look. We hope to be able to record equally wise action and intentions on the part of the New York Museum Association, whenever it shall have got as far as the Boston Committee has.

* The Nation, No. 237, for Jan. 13, 1870, pages 29 and 32.

MUSIC.

THE ARIONS IN OPERA.

In the article on Our Amateurs published in a former issue we referred to a long-standing rivalry that had existed between the Liederkranz and the Arion clubs. This has been fostered by the Saengerfests held from time to time in different cities, at which prizes are offered for the best singing. It is the misfortune of the Arions to have been defeated at certain of these battles of harmony, indeed we believe they have taken no prize in ten years. Last summer they ventured to enter the lists, but were not only not "first in the hearts of their countrymen," but not even second. The Liederkranz returned with a grand piano—the first prize; the Junger-Männerchor went home to Philadelphia bearing a square piano—the second prize; but the poor Arions came back with nothing but a heart-ache and bitter rue. However, with German pluck they set to work to retrieve their damaged reputations, they bestirred themselves to add new members, and they put their heads together to devise some grand undertaking that should bring them prominently into public notice. An opera was finally resolved upon—one that should be performed by their own members, and should make their names renowned. The thing had been tried by the Liederkranz at the old Astor Place Opera House in 1851, when Lortzing's "Czar and Zimmermann" had been performed with great success. What the Liederkranz had done then there was no reason that the Arions might not accomplish now. So Der Freyschütz—that opera so dear to the soul of every German—charming the ear with its melody and kindling the imagination with its romanticism, was fixed upon. Candidus, the pride of the club, was to sing Max; Remmertz, a new member, and one from whom great things were looked for, would sing Caspar; the orchestra should be increased to sixty; the New York Sing-Academie would furnish the female voices necessary to the chorus; new costumes would be provided; and the famous Wolf Glen scene, in which the devil is invoked and the magic bullets are cast, should be made terrible with the weird phantasmagory of another world. The society itself would be the chorus, and would crowd the stage with impressive numbers, and sing the Jäger-chor as it was never sung before.

This programme was an excellent one, but it had its difficulties. In the first place, opera is high art, and it is not for any man or any body of men suddenly to bethink them that they will crown themselves forthwith with its laurels, and to accomplish that result in a perfectly easy and satisfactory way. The business of the stage is a laborious thing to learn—a trade that requires an apprenticeship. The vocalism of the concert-room is one thing, that of the theatre another.

Then, again, the Arions must make their mark, if at all, by means of their chorus, that being the only point in which they could hope to improve on previous representations of the opera. But, unfortunately, Der Freyschütz does not lend itself readily to the plan, for it offers but little field for the chorus to display itself. The choral parts are only incidental, and are not made a prominent feature in the work. The 'Hunters' Chorus—for men's voices only—in which, if anywhere, the society might hope to make a success, is, after all, a poor composition for the purpose, lacking light and shade, and sentiment and expression, and all the elements that male voice quartettes rely on for their effects. During most of the opera no chorus is upon the stage, and so it happened that everybody thought that the society had played an inconsiderable part, wondered, in fact, what had become of the Arion, and there was consequently a feeling of disappointment in this direction. Nor did the soloists help the difficulty. As might have been expected, Mr. Candidus proved inadequate to the undertaking. Every one knew that he had a pretty parlor voice, but the Academy swallowed it all up. He sang in a feeble way, as though all the spirit had been taken out of him; and as for his acting, nothing could have been more hopelessly tame. If the man had been drugged for the occasion, it could not have been worse. An occasional ineffectual lifting of the arm was the final result of Mr. Candidus's studies in this direction. Madame Rotter and Madame Frederici, both well used to the stage, endeavored to instil a little fervor into him in the trio, and each took one of his hands. Candidus looked helplessly at them, as though anxious only to be let alone. He fixed his eyes upon the stage, as is the habit with novices, instead of upon the audience, and quite had the air of one vainly hoping that some friendly trap-door might open and let him suddenly out of his perplexities. The Caspar of Mr. Remmertz was really an excellent performance, especially so far as the singing was concerned; and Madame Frederici and Madame Rotter were tolerably good, in spite of a tendency of the former to sing flat, which is always a matter of regret, since she has so beautiful a voice. As to the Wolf Glen scene, which was to have been made so effective, there was nothing to impress the spectator but the splutter of gunpowder, the wriggling across the stage of impossible monsters spitting fire, the habitual owl with the flapping wings and glowing eyes, some poor painted figures, and an unpleasant smell of brimstone. To children the scene must have been one of magical terror; to the maturer mind it was foolish and unimaginative to the last degree. It is hopeless to appeal to the eye with these silly effects; if the audience is to be impressed, it must be by something addressed to their imaginations, and not by such noisy, vulgar, matter-of-fact displays as this old traditional stage trickery. On the whole the performance was rather a disappointment, though the orchestra was fine, and the chorus really did the little that fell to their share in an excellent manner. Mr. Carl Bergmann, the director of the society, conducted.

YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION SIX DOLLARS, OR IN MONTHLY PARTS AT FIFTY CENTS EACH.

A new work, entitled

Illustrated Travels

All Round the World:

A RECORD OF

DISCOVERY, GEOGRAPHY, AND ADVENTURE.

Edited by H. W. BATES,

Assistant Secretary of the English Royal Geographical Society.

The "Illustrated Travels" is copiously illustrated with beautiful and authentic engravings, and gives accurate information of foreign countries, in the form of narratives, by travellers of the highest repute who have recently visited them.

In the choice of subjects for each monthly part preference is given to those countries which happen to be of the most general interest at the time. Thus the different parts of the world are treated of in succession, and in course of time a body of useful information and entertaining reading on the most interesting subjects will be brought together, relating to the position, physical features, and natural productions of countries, and to the characteristics of their inhabitants, their institutions, customs, opinions, and everyday life.

The political and religious aspects of nations, historical geography, and visits to the sites of important events in classical and Biblical history, physical descriptions of interesting regions, narratives of naturalists, hunting adventures in wild regions, Alpine climbing—all these will be included in the range of subjects, as well as narratives of sea voyages, journeys of discovery, and descriptions of the modern condition of countries.

The twelve numbers at present published are forwarded free by mail on receipt of six dollars.

CASSELL, PETTER & CALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

HAVE RECENTLY PUBLISHED:

The Life and Letters of Faraday. By Dr. Bence Jones. 2 vols. 8vo, illustrated, cloth, $12 50.

Xariffa's Poems. 12mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $1 50.

The Professor's Wife. A Novel. By Annie L. Macgregor. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 75.

The History of American Socialisms. By John Humphrey Noyes. 8vo, extra cloth, $4.

Compensation; or, Always a Future. A Novel. By Anne M. H. Brewster. Cloth, $1 75.

Russet Leaves. Poems and Sketches. By James Pummill. 12mo, illustrated, extra cloth, $2.

Helen Erskine. A Novel. By Mrs. M. Harrison Robinson. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 50.

Stories for Sundays. Edited by Bishop Coxe. 12mo, illustrated, extra cloth, $1 75.

Puck; his Adventures, Observations, and Conclusions. By "Ouida." 12mo cloth, $2.

The Great Empress. An Historical Portrait. By Prof. Schele de Vere. 12mo cloth, $1 75.

The History of Canada. By John McMullen. 8vo, fine cloth, $3 50.

In Both Worlds. A Novel. By Dr. W. H. Holcombe. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 75.

Evidences of Natural and Revealed Theology. By Rev. C. E. Lord. 8vo cloth, $3 50.

Manual of Hypodermic Medication. By R. Bartholow. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 50.

A Compend of Materia Medica and Therapeutics. By J. C. Riley, M.D. 8vo cloth, $3.

Percussion and Auscultation as Diagnostic Aids. By Carl Hoppe. 12mo cloth, $1 50.

Garretson on Diseases of the Mouth, Jaws, and Associate Parts. 8vo, illustrated, cloth, $7 50.

Bible Gems; or, Manual of Scripture Lessons. By R. E. Kremer. 16mo boards, 60 cents.

For sale by all booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Publishers,

715 & 717 Market St., Philadelphia, & 449 Broome St., N.Y.

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK-STORE.

NEW BOOK by DEAN GOULBURN. English Edition. Price 75 cents.

THE PURSUIT OF HOLINESS.

A Sequel to "Thoughts on Personal Religion," intended to carry the reader somewhat further onward in the Spiritual Life. By EDWARD MEYRICK GOULBURN, D.D. 12mo, cloth.

CHEAP EDITION OF MONSELL'S POPULAR BOOK,

OUR NEW VICAR.

By the Rev. I. S. B. MONSELL. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

JUST READY, PRICE $1 50,

CREATION:

A Recent Work of God. By the Rector of St. Mary's Church, New York. Crown 8vo, cloth.

POTT & AMERY,

COOPER UNION, FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

A LARGE STOCK OF

London Bibles,

Episcopal Prayer-Books, Church Services, etc., in plain and fine Bindings, mounted with Enamelled Crosses and Monograms, etc., etc. The largest and best Stock in the United States may be seen at the LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

SOLE AGENTS:

POTT & AMERY,

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue,

NEW YORK.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1870.

The Week.

NOTHING can be said to have been settled by the week's work in Congress, except the League Island Bill, which was tabled in the House on Wednesday, the 26th, and for this we ought to feel thankful to Mr. Dawes in particular. We must also do him the justice to say that he did not criticise the estimates of the Administration until he or others of the Ways and Means Committee had applied at headquarters for information. Mr. Butler's reply to his argument for retrenchment appears to have consisted in procuring slightly reduced or corrected estimates from the Departments, and thus, of course, altering somewhat Mr. Dawes's standard of comparison; but the difference was not great, and the latter's rejoinder served rather to strengthen his original position. We observe, too, that Mr. Dawes's appeal to the people of Massachusetts to judge between his political career and that of his colleague, has not resulted in Gen. Butler's favor. Under the lead of Mr. Hill, of New Jersey, the House on Thursday abolished, so far as its action could, the franking privilege, in a much shorter time than is usually needed for so advanced and (to Congressmen) self-sacrificing a measure, and by a handsome majority. The Senate is likely to amend but not to resist it. Until new provisions are made for the payment of postage on newspapers and periodicals, the reform, like other hastily considered measures, may be productive of trouble between publishers and their subscribers, as well as between exchanges. The law as it passed the House is to take effect July 1. The Virginia members have been admitted to the House—Fernando Wood, in the case of Mr. Porter, paying homage to the memory of President Lincoln and his war government—and to the Senate. The Senate has done little else than discuss finance.

The discussion in the Senate during the week has been mainly over Mr. Sherman's Currency Bill, proposing to issue $45,000,000 more National Bank currency, withdrawing the same amount of three per cent. certificates, and compelling the banks to keep on hand twenty-five per cent. of their circulation in gold. The main object of the bill is to "equalize" the circulation, as it is called, by giving the Western and Southern States, which have fewer national banks than the Eastern, their "fair share" of the paper money of the country. We discussed this subject at full length in April last year (No. 197), when similar measures were under discussion, taking the ground that no matter how you "distribute the circulation," it will flow where it is wanted in the transaction of business, and will only stay where people can afford to keep it; that if the West or South want more currency, they can always have it by coming to the East and buying it with their products; and that there is no way of getting it except by purchase, unless the Government should present it to them for nothing, which, we believe, Mr. Sherman does not propose it should do. He requires each new bank organized under his bill to deposit 90 per cent. of its circulation in Government bonds; but if the West or South have bonds to deposit in setting up banks, they can go and sell them, or borrow money on them, in Wall Street, and thus get nearly the same amount of money; but if they have not the bonds, or the means of buying them, they cannot set up the banks. Of course, banking under the National system is profitable, and plenty of men will be ready to go into it under Mr. Sherman's bill; but that anybody will be able, by means of the bill, to keep currency in any particular section of the country in which business does not require it, and in which it would not stay of itself without an act of Congress, we look on as a curious and interesting delusion. Currency is plenty at the East because capital is mainly owned at the East, which is another way of saying that rich men have a great deal of money and poor men very little; and Congressional devices for equalizing the distribution of the currency are like plans for equalizing fortunes, or making Venice as prosperous as London, or making water run up hill. The debates of the week, therefore, will carry everybody who takes this view of the matter back a good way into the past.

While the franking privilege still remains in force, it could scarcely be used to better purpose than in distributing copies of Mr. Blake's report concerning the Indians of British America, submitted to the House on Thursday. Mr. Blake is United States Consul at Hamilton, Canada, and he was instructed to examine into the condition of the various tribes living under the rule of the Dominion, with a view to getting light on their progress in civilization, and the measures adopted to remove the distinctions between them and the French and English population. His observations showed that during the last fifty years there has been no difficulty with the Indians or among themselves; that the Government has given them reservations, without ceasing to care for and protect them, especially by extending medical attendance and enforcing vaccination; that they take kindly to schools and education, because it puts them on an equality with white men; that some of them are, in fact, indistinguishable from the whites in manners and cultivation; that as a whole they are increasing in numbers—apparent decrease in some cases being attributable to emigration or to intermarriage and social fusion with the whites; in short, that they "have passed through the most critical era of transition from barbarism to civilization." This is true, while it is also true that many of the Indians are still addicted to the pagan worship of their forefathers; but the wise conduct of the Government has made it morally certain that these last will eventually be brought up to the level of the others in customs and intelligence. There is a lesson in this spectacle which even the inhabitants of Minnesota might receive if they would, and our border population generally; and we hope that even before this country undertakes to annex Canada, it will annex its Indian policy. For this no reciprocity treaty is needed.

Apropos of the public debt, there is one curious thing in connection with the Democratic policy about it which we would thank our ingenious contemporary, the World, to explain. The Democratic party, we are constantly told, are in favor of the punctual and loyal payment of the debt, which is all very well; but then, how does it happen that all, or nearly all, Democrats are in favor of paying it in greenbacks? Republicans differ occasionally about the "meaning of the contract," but how is it that Democrats are always of one mind about the meaning of the contract, and never, by any chance, fall into the error of supposing that the bondholder is entitled to gold? Surely one might expect some of them to go astray now and then on so knotty a question. When Mr. McNeely, of Kentucky, proposed to declare the five-twenties payable in greenbacks in the House on Monday, his resolution was only laid on the table by a strict party vote.

A negro, Mr. Revels, has been elected senator from Mississippi, and is awaiting the admission of the State to take his seat; and in the interval, some of the newspapers have been entertaining themselves with the discussion of his eligibility under the Dred Scott decision—some holding that he only became a citizen at the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, and, therefore, cannot sit in the Senate till the lapse of nine years from that date. Even if, however, the majority in either House were likely to accept the Dred Scott decision, as including not only slaves but free blacks, in the teeth of the historical evidence as to the recognition of negro citizenships in the earlier days of the Republic, they would be delivered from all difficulty in the matter by the practice of the Government, even under Democratic auspices, in the annexation of foreign territory. The Texans became citizens forthwith on the annexation of the Republic to the United States; the people of St. Thomas and the Dominicans will do the same—a proposition to keep them waiting nine years would be laughed at; and the argument of expediency is still stronger in the case of our native blacks than in their case. There is a touch of the comic in Mr. Revels's being the successor of Jefferson Davis.

General Butler seems to meet with no favor in any quarter in his new rôle of a defender of the Administration. The Republican press, as far as our observation goes, abuse or reprove him, partly, apparently, owing to a general want of confidence in him, and partly owing to his attack on Mr. Dawes, which, being in the nature of an attempt to "read him out" of the Republican party, was, coming from the General, absurd as well as unseemly, as Mr. Dawes had no difficulty in pointing out. Mr. Dawes's onslaught on the Administration we thought, as we said a week ago, ill-judged, because it is a kind of attack against which it is impossible to defend one's self without notice, and against which, even with notice, it is very difficult for the Government to defend itself at all. The difficulties of its position could hardly be better illustrated than by its having to let General Butler appear for it. The real weight of Mr. Dawes's character and services of course rendered his assault all the more serious. As far as he is concerned, however, he has every reason to congratulate himself, as it has been the means of calling forth in every direction the strongest tributes to his worth, in which we cordially concur. It has had, too, the good effect of revealing in a very marked way the decline of General Butler, even in the estimation of the noisy and unscrupulous band of worshippers who rallied round him two years ago. A few months more, and he will have once more adjusted himself to a peaceful state of society and the normal calm of the public mind, and will count for no more now than he did before the war, to the great gain of political morality and of the public credit.

The Tennessee Constitutional Convention, which began its sessions with an apparent intention to abrogate everything which the Radicals had enacted, seems to improve with length of days. The question of the franchise has been thoroughly debated during the week, and the opponents of negro suffrage have been signally defeated in an attempt to get the franchise clause, which makes no distinction of color, submitted separately to the popular vote. This saves it, since a majority of the people would undoubtedly vote it down, unless by so doing they risked the Amended Constitution at the same time. The Memphis Post thinks the Convention's liberality is due to a wholesome fear inspired by the Georgia precedent; but the tone of the arguments used by prominent ex-Confederates is against the supposition. There is, in fact, no reason why a former secessionist in Tennessee should not be prompter to recognize existing facts than a Democrat in Illinois, both being engaged in adjusting Constitutions to altered times. In the South Carolina Legislature a colored senator has been chosen Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, with the aid of the entire Democratic vote.

Mr. Wells was accused by the Tribune (Jan. 13) of untruthfulness in his estimate of the wool-clip of the United States in 1868, in having asserted that the wool-clip was only four and three-quarters pounds per head of sheep, and that the total clip of that year was 177,000,000 pounds; and it styled him "a Special Munchausen who thus figured up the statement that it is a waste of capital to invest more money in woollen spindles." To which Mr. Wells replied that he never estimated the clip per head of sheep at four and three-quarters pounds or any other figure, and that his estimate of the total was taken from the Bulletin of the Woollen Manufacturers' Association, and had been adopted by Mr. E. B. Bigelow, the well-known protectionist, in his address before the American Institute (Mr. Horace Greeley, president), Oct. 5, 1869. Of this the Tribune took no notice till Monday last—an interval of a fortnight—when, being goaded by the Detroit Free Press, it announced that Mr. Wells had not contradicted its charge (of being a "Special Munchausen"), but had simply said that his estimate was taken from "recent essays by Messrs. Bigelow and Hayes," and that, had "he mentioned in his report that his estimates had been borrowed, it would not have held him responsible for their accuracy." Here we see a man is accused of lying, partly by imputing to him a statement he never made, and partly by denying the correctness of one he did make. He denies that he made the first statement, and shows that he adopted the second from a trusted friend and colleague of his accuser; but his accuser takes no notice of the defence, and, more than that, uses the special and peculiar means at his disposal to prevent the public from hearing of it. What does Mr. Greeley think of the morality of this kind of editing? We should really like to know, not for the purpose of harassing him hereafter, but as an interesting contribution to the sociology of the day.

When he is in the way of explaining, we wish he would also define the Tribune's position about capital punishment. It frequently contains wild articles, strongly denunciatory of the death penalty, and in so doing without suggesting any substitute, has done much to throw the public mind into great confusion on a very important question. The death penalty is disappearing, like some better things, before a kind of mushy and unthinking doubt of its morality and expediency; but hardly anybody is giving any sober attention to the provision of a certain mode of removing manslayers from human society,—a thing which no civilized community can dispense with, if it means to preserve any sentiment of respect for human life. The Tribune, however, not only renders no help in this matter, but, when it gets into hysterics over a murder like the McFarland or the Townsend case, seems to forget all about its views on capital punishment, and not only calls for the death of the criminal, but his death without trial. Apropos of the Townsend murder on Sunday last, it exclaimed on Monday morning: "If a few of these criminals could be made to suffer the extreme penalty of their acts before the burial of their victims, we might hope to awe their fellows into something like regard for their necks, if not for the laws of the State." Here is actually a suggestion that murderers should be hanged within two days from the death of their victims—that is, substantially without trial—emanating from a paper which maintains about one hundred times a year that all legal killing is wicked and unnecessary.

The Sun accuses us of indicating, by our remarks last week on "Editorial Perspective," our belief that the daily papers should have passed over the Cooke scandal in total silence. That was not our idea. What we meant to say, and we hoped had succeeded in saying, was that an editor's duty was not only to lay the facts of the day before the public, but to indicate, by the greater or less prominence he gives them, the relations of each fact to other facts. The space and prominence given to the Cooke abduction would have been justified if it were in any way a symptomatic fact, or if it were likely to be followed by serious consequences to the community—if, for instance, it was a sign of the state of morals in Methodist churches or in public schools, or if the probable result of it would be that other ministers would follow Cooke's example, or if Cooke had been in any way a prominent or widely known or influential man. But none of these things was true. The incident was nothing more than the elopement of an apparently half-cracked minister with a silly girl. It was right to give an account of it; but to give up whole columns to it day after day; to send out reporters right and left to scour the country for "items" about Cooke's life; to speculate about him, and his motives and whereabouts, as if his crime was unprecedented; to pester his unfortunate wife to let the public know how she felt, the unfortunate school-girl's father to know how he felt; and, in short, expend as much time, money, and nervous force on the working of it up as if it were a revolution or a tremendous public calamity, or the revelation of a great social sore, was to give the public a totally false impression of the real value and true place of the incident, and what is worse, was to foster and encourage one of the most depraved of human tastes—the appetite for dirty scandal. This is as well as we can state in a few lines our position about it. The Sun will hardly maintain that an editor has no right to exercise his own judgment as to the importance of what he publishes, or that he is bound to think only of the number of people who will be likely to want to know a thing, in deciding what space he will give to it; because this would fill every paper with simple obscenity.

The news from France continues to be peaceful, and shows that the new ministry grows in strength and confidence. M. Ollivier has addressed the Senate in explanation and defence of his policy, and received, in return, a strong vote of confidence. The press, generally, treats the issue of the struggles of the last year as proof positive that Frenchmen are vastly better politicians than they were forty years ago; that they want liberty, but not revolution; and that they have come to understand that revolution means the destruction of popular confidence in free government, and the increase of the tendency to take refuge in dictatorships; and that the pretence of the Parisian Reds, that they are competent to form a republic which people who have to earn their bread and provide for their children by other means than public spouting will consent to live under, is simply farcical. Their latest advice to the Republicans is, not to pay rent or taxes; and Rochefort's remedy for the anomaly known as the "High Court," which is to try Prince Pierre, is to have "the people take arms and administer justice for themselves." The additional details which have appeared about the murder show that, as far as regards the dirty abuse which led to it, the prince and the journalist were about on a level. The former had, in a Corsican paper, delicately expressed a wish to have the "tripes cut out" of the Republicans of that island, and used as manure. This the statesmen of the Marseillaise, whose own language is only one degree better, could not endure, and, accordingly, the Corsican member of the staff, M. Paul Grousset, sent to demand satisfaction for it, and everybody knows the rest. The melancholy feature of the affair is that it should be possible, in this age, for a great nation, one of the foremost, if not the foremost, in civilization—the country of Royer-Collard, Constant, Guizot, De Broglie, and Montalembert—to be convulsed, and its peaceful progress absolutely impeded, by the quarrels of men of this sort, without mind or manners or morals, using their pens mainly to fling garbage at their enemies, and wearing pistols and daggers to supplement their mutual vituperation.

The only apparently positive and reliable news from Rome is, that the hope of getting the Pope made infallible "by acclamation" (the ecclesiastical equivalent of the "previous question"), has been definitively abandoned. This has been reported for some weeks, but there now seems to be no doubt of it. The Council has then got down to the ordinary human means of having it declared through discussion; or, if it be irreverent to speak of the process as "human," of getting it divinely declared, after a certain amount of discussion. About the debates the Pope feels very much as Thaddeus Stevens used to feel about the debates over his Reconstruction bills; he knows he is right, but, in consideration of the weakness of the brethren, he lets them talk a little over his propositions. The inconveniences of this concession are, however, numerous. As soon as it was evident that the plan of an "afflatus" was given up, the opponents of the dogma began to seek each other out and organize—headed, as we said a fortnight ago, by Cardinal Schwartzenberg and Bishop Dupanloup. A paper either protesting against or in some way indicating hostility to the dogma was then passed about. We have already mentioned the rumor—and we believed it—that Cardinal Schwartzenberg had at the last moment refused to sign it, and then collapsed into obedience to the Pontifical will, and left Rome an object of pity to his friends and enemies. It is now alleged, however—as indeed it has been alleged by somebody of nearly everything anybody else has ever said about the Council from the beginning—that this is "a wicked lie," and that the Cardinal has signed the paper, and is still in Rome. The movement against the dogma has, however, as might have been expected, produced a counter movement in its favor, its supporters, who are far more numerous than its opponents, also signing a paper, begging for its submission to the Council. It is in its very nature something which it would be dangerous to pass over the heads of a recalcitrant minority. The latest talk is of a compromise in the shape of a declaration, in which the Pope's infallibility will be spoken of as a desirable thing, though not as an ascertained fact, but then this would appear to leave it still in the ranks of a "pious opinion" simply, where it would do the world little or no good. It is right to say that nearly all the correspondents agree in accusing members of the Council and their ecclesiastical followers of telling falsehoods, both about what has happened and is going to happen concerning the Council, basing their charges on the frequency with which the fathers contradict each other. The ecclesiastics in their turn describe the newsmongers in terms which leave little room for doubt that they are emissaries of Satan. We have described elsewhere the consequences of the latest Papal decree, which the bishops consider a direct infringement of their prerogative, as it almost completely deprives them of their power of damnation, and, combined with the secrecy of the debates in the Council and the arbitrary restrictions on freedom of speech, has done much to foster discontent and division.

Two or three months ago, when a rumor was spread by one of our daily contemporaries that an alliance between Austria, France, and Russia, against Prussia, was on foot, we threw discredit on it. Everything which has since occurred goes to confirm our conclusions about it. The internal condition of Austria, which we gave as one of the reasons for refusing credence to the report, is still one of great confusion and perplexity, rendering all talk of an offensive foreign policy on her part almost ridiculous. She has had since then an insurrection in Dalmatia, which she suppressed with considerable difficulty; a ministerial crisis, not yet over; and the Czech question—that is, the question of the share the Bohemians and Galicians are to have in the government, which is alone serious enough to tear the empire to pieces—is still unsettled. Along with this comes up the question of reforming the Military Frontier along the Turkish border—a wide strip of territory occupied since the beginning of the sixteenth century by the Gränzer, soldier colonists, living in regiments governed by martial law, and supposed to be constantly ready to repulse the raids which for nearly two hundred years were the pastime of the Turkish beys. These Gränzer furnished regularly 60,000 men to the Austrian army. On a pinch, they could furnish 100,000. They were at the absolute disposition of the Crown, down to the last boy, and, since they ceased to be needed against the Turks, have been used in all the Imperial campaigns. The Military Frontier was, therefore, as might have been expected, one of the pet institutions of the old régime; but it was utterly incompatible with constitutional government, and kept a million of people in a state of barbarism, and it has to go down. Two of the regiments have been dissolved, the rest are soon to follow, and thus the last trace of the old relations of Turkey to Christendom will have disappeared.

It appears, however, that not only has Austria never thought of threatening Prussia, but Russia thinks of it just as little. About a month ago, the Emperor of Russia sent the King of Prussia the decoration of the military order of St. George, and the King in his turn sent the Emperor the Prussian order of Military Merit, and the Emperor took occasion in doing so to recall to the King remembrance of the grand days when their armies were fighting together for a "sacred cause;" and the Russian Minister at Berlin, in investing the King with the order of St. George, said it must be looked on as "a new pledge of the ties which bind together the two peoples and two armies." France was the enemy against which the two armies fought in the "sacred cause." This ostentatious revival of the memories of 1813 is looked on as intimation on the part of both sovereigns that the Fleury mission to St. Petersburg means nothing, and least of all a drawing together of France and Russia as against Prussia.

Salnave, after a checkered career, has been caught and shot, after the Dominican manner; but his army survives him, and, having joined Cabral, the foe of Baez, the combined force talks of attacking the Dominican territory, apparently disputing Baez's right to sell it to us, and being evidently likely to interfere with the proper taking of a popular vote on the annexation. If, as is not at all improbable, we have to make good our title by force of arms, it might be well to calculate beforehand what the island will stand us in, cost of subjugation included, and what the expense of police will be after we have subdued it. A fighting population, such as the Dominicans are, are not likely to be kept very quiet by sheriffs of their own choosing.

THE ST. DOMINGO BARGAIN.

We hope sincerely the Senate will now act on the St. Thomas matter, and deliver the country from the somewhat discreditable position in which it stands with regard to the bargain made by the late Administration with Denmark for the purchase of that island. Whatever the hostility of the Republican majority to Messrs. Johnson and Seward may be, they would do well to consider the effect, both on our foreign relations and our domestic politics, of treating a change of Administration as a kind of break in the Government, over which no moral responsibility could be transmitted. Moreover, while it is acknowledged on all hands that we want St. Thomas as a naval station, and that it will answer all the purposes of a naval station, it has also the immense advantage of possessing a population in our own stage of civilization, and comparatively easy of assimilation, who may, in fact, be trusted to govern themselves and make a respectable and useful contribution to our public opinion.

The case of St. Domingo is different in many ways—so different that it is difficult, supposing St. Thomas to be ours already, to see what use it can be to us, except to supply custom-houses and post-offices to politicians. Were its population in any sense of the word a civilized population, or had we a civil service so officered and managed as to furnish a civilizing agency, we should have little to say against the acquisition. But we absolutely have no civil officers whom we can trust even to distribute Government charity amongst the Indians; for this small and simple duty towards a handful of barbarians we have had to call for volunteers amongst the religious denominations. What the state of things will be when we take in hand the regeneration of the Dominican "Republic" may be guessed from a very cursory survey of the facts of the case.

The coast-line of the island, embracing the two republics of St. Domingo and Hayti, is about twelve hundred miles long, and, striking off, say, four hundred of these as Hayti's share, we have eight hundred left for St. Domingo. But in all these eight hundred we have been only able to discover one solitary custom-house. How many post-offices there are in the country it is impossible to say, as it is also to discover what the precise nature of the postal service is; but the probability is, judging from the general character of the inhabitants, that there is no great necessity for postal "facilities." The staple products of the country consist of gold, silver, iron, cattle, wood, tobacco, and hides. The area of the island is 22,000 square miles, and the population consists of 150,000 persons, of whom about one-tenth claim to be whites. What their color really is we have no means of knowing. The inhabitants have not, however, developed any great industrial capacity, their energies having been chiefly consumed, ever since the landing of Columbus in 1492, in perpetual wars. As a military community they have no equal on the surface of the globe, always excepting the inhabitants of the neighboring republic of Hayti, which is considered by some historians to surpass them. With such historians we are not inclined to agree. To go no further back than the present century, we find that in 1808 the "tyranny of Dessalines drove the Dominicans back" (from the kind protection of France) "into the arms of Spain." The next year they declared their independence, and for the succeeding thirteen years were in an "unsettled" state, till in 1822 the whole island was united under a republican form of government, and Boyer chosen President for life. Before the end of his life, however, Hayti, in 1844, cut adrift and became an independent negro state, after the celebrated battle of Santiago. After that Soulouque formed the habit of attacking St. Domingo every other year or so, and when he did not do it alone he did it in conjunction with a certain Jimenes, who appears to have been made a duke by Soulouque in consideration of his distinguished services. At length Buenaventura Baez, the gentleman who has just been negotiating with General Babcock, became "constitutional President," and immediately on his accession Soulouque began again. This cat-and-dog state of affairs has continued down to the present time; and the rôles of Usurper, Dictator, Invader, and Tyrant have always been readily filled upon the Dominican boards. The constitutional form of government as administered in St. Domingo affords great opportunities for this. It is moulded upon our own, with a President elected for four years, five senators and fifteen representatives, a Supreme Court and various inferior courts. "Rotation in office" is with the Dominicans carried much further than with us, as, whenever an official is considered by a majority of the people to have held office for a long enough period, the latter rise en masse, slay him, and distribute "the spoils" among themselves. These risings, combined with the natural effect of the frequently recurring constitutional elections, make St. Domingo the office-seeker's paradise. Every Dominican expects some day or other to be President, and most of them succeed, unless they have the misfortune to be cut off in their prime by some one or other of their compatriots. It is difficult, indeed, to understand, in view of all these circumstances, why Baez should be so desirous of annexation. He has been President, off and on, for twenty years, and when he comes into the United States he only comes in as citizen of the least civilized State in the Union. But it is said by a correspondent of the Tribune (and this may explain the difficulty) that Baez expects on the annexation of his country to be elected to represent her in the Senate of the United States. But if Gregorio Luperon and Josè Maria Cabral don't press him hard for that office, to say nothing of the chances of his throat being cut between now and his election, we are much mistaken. Luperon and Cabral have just united in a card to the American public, in which they conclusively show that Baez had no right to sell the island, because the constitution expressly forbids the cession of any territory to foreign powers.

This description of the condition of the island must show clearly enough what a splendid field will be thrown open by the purchase to all unemployed collectors, assessors, appraisers, postmasters, consuls, and district attorneys. The moment the treaty is ratified we shall witness an invasion of St. Domingo which will cast into the shade the worst filibustering of Soulouque. From every Northern State, from every Republican and Democratic headquarters throughout this broad land, we seem, with our prophetic eye, to see a stream of disappointed office-seekers pouring down upon the virgin soil of Dominica. Thither, with his carpet-bag in his hand, will go every would-be consul who has been denied a place by Fish, every would-be marshal spurned by Hoar, every Treasury clerk dismissed by Boutwell. Then will they acclimatize themselves, acquire rights of citizenship, and begin to speculate in real estate. Some will acquire an interest in the coal mines; others in the lumber districts; still others in the tobacco crops; not a few will start a hotel; not a few will organize "staunch journals;" while it may be that here and there will appear the prospectus of a railroad, a national bank, and a line of steamers from the ancient port of Santo Domingo to New York, or perhaps to Pekin. And then will come the second act in the drama. The curtain rises and discloses Washington. Here is that faithful friend of freedom, Jabez Tucker, sometime of Downieville, Maine, now of Samana, S. D., U. S., who seeks at the hands of a generous Government the reward of his faithful service in the late war in the shape of a small Dominican post-office. And here is our old friend Silas Jones, born in Denver City, and late editor of the Kunkapot Pioneer, who asks for a small assessorship in the district of Santa Cruz del Seybo; and another applicant who comes for a steamship subsidy, and a thousand or two more who desire a consulship. But the thought which pleases us most is that of gentlemen who will apply for some of the internal revenue offices in the up-country. The interior of the country consists of mountain ranges, rising to an elevation of six thousand to eight thousand feet. What a place these tropical forests would be for the combination office of assessor and whiskey-distiller! There may the just man distil whiskey and assess his own tax till the end of time, transmitting the secret of his art to his children on his death-bed; and, if he goes out of office by rotation before that time, as he probably will, making an equitable arrangement with his successor whereby neither shall lose anything in the fair way of business. Clearly the internal revenue offices in the interior will be the best; but we should by no means recommend any one to refuse the positions on the coast. The custom-house of the port of St. Domingo, or of Samana, for instance; how pleasant a place for retirement after a long political life!

MODES OF PERSONAL REPRESENTATION.

We are gratified at the interest in the subject of personal representation called out by our recent article upon that subject, and glad to have the objections which we made to the different schemes met by the friends of these schemes. The question is, at any rate, a difficult one; it is much easier to point out defects in a plan than to propose a better one, and we shall be abundantly satisfied if either Mr. Hare's plan, the New York plan, or Mr. Buckalew's plan receives a fair trial in the State of Illinois. We are glad to see that the Chicago Republican plan, which, as a correspondent well says, "would remove the sole remaining check upon the tyranny of the wire-pullers," appears to meet little favor in the Illinois Convention. Mr. Medill's proposition, which will probably be adopted, if any, embodies the leading principle of Mr. Buckalew's plan, by giving every elector a number of votes equal to that of the senators or representatives to be chosen by the same constituency, and allowing him to "cumulate" them. It very properly leaves it for the Legislature to determine the details in the practical application of the plan; and here we will say that its success will depend very much upon the skill with which this is done. If the State should be divided exclusively into "three-cornered" constituencies—as is very probable—it would still be hard for any candidates but regular nominees of the two great parties to be elected; the most efficient working of the plan demands that the election districts should be large enough to give wide scope to the individual choice. While we ourselves incline to regard Mr. Buckalew's plan as the best which has any chance of being adopted, we wish that the Convention were to have all three distinctly before it, and we should be glad—seeing that the whole thing is an experiment—if all of them could have a fair trial, each in a separate field.

In answer to "W.," we will remind him that we did not say that Mr. Hare's plan was too complicated, but that it is tacitly assumed to be so, and stands therefore no chance of adoption for the present. We agree with him that the work of the elector is as simple as possible, and that the clerical work, in which alone the real complication consists, would be done by hired experts, and need not be at all formidable. But a system, to be accepted, must not only be simple, but must be shown to be so to the average voter. And it is a fact that the average voter will not take the trouble to examine a scheme which certainly is complicated, for it requires lengthened explanation; and that until the voters understand it and urge it, it is idle to expect the politicians to take it up. We wish with all our heart that the Illinois Convention would try it among themselves as he suggests; but we must wait to see whether the Harvard Alumni will try it, as was proposed last summer. When they have tried it, and it works well, perhaps we can get politicians to look at it. Meanwhile, it is, as we said, tacitly set aside, on the ground—whether correctly or not—that it is too complicated for our community.

In regard to the New York plan, we are glad to learn from our correspondent that its application is intended to be confined to votes where the ayes and noes are called. Our former understanding was derived from the memorial of the Personal Representation Society to the Constitutional Convention of New York, which reads: "Each of the members would vote on all divisions according to the number of votes which he had received." It is true, the accompanying "report" says "upon every measure or act coming to a vote;" but we supposed that the formal "memorial," especially as it made use of italics, would contain the plan in its authentic form. But even now the plan is not free from objection. Its essential idea is, that it does not matter how many members there are in all, or of any given party; even a minority of members might efficiently represent a large majority of voters. That is very true, on the final votes. But on the preliminary votes the numerical majority of members, representing, perhaps, a minority of votes, would have it all their own way; so that, after all, on the New York plan we must choose between having this cumbersome method of voting applied to all divisions, and the chance that a minority of voters may have a majority of members to control legislative preliminaries.

But we are surprised that our correspondent should take exception to our identifying this plan with the theory of delegation. We had supposed that this was the peculiar merit claimed for it and possessed by it; why else should one member of a legislative body have double the voting power of another, if not because he is supposed to reflect the wills and opinions of double the number of votes? It is no advantage to a man—and here is a frequent fallacy of the advocates of minority representation—to have a person in Congress whom he voted for, unless that person continues to hold the same views with him. The New York plan and Mr. Hare's plan both, it is true, propose to have every citizen equally represented, and thus the voting power precisely proportioned to the constituency; but it appears to us that a scheme which accomplishes this by cumulating the voting power in the hands of individual members in this proportion, may be fairly said to recognize the principle of delegation more distinctly than a plan which provides equal constituencies and then gives the representatives equal power. In the one case, every call of the ayes and noes forces attention to the fact that these men are the agents of such and such constituents, and are naturally expected to vote as those constituents desire; in the other case, there is no such preponderance of power possessed by one member or another as to lead to any exaggerated sense of dependence. By the theory of delegation we mean the theory that the representative is only the agent of his constituents, and is bound, whenever he knows their will, to act in conformity with it. Opposed to this view is that which considers the legislative body as trusted with discretionary powers, which it is bound to exercise for the public good, whether it may fall in with the wishes of any portion or proportion of the community or not. We held, in our former article, that the theory of delegation is correct when applied to issues which are distinctly before the community at the time of the election, but that for new issues it must fail. Now the New York plan would be perfect for the first class of issues; to the second it is unfitted, for the reason that it gives disproportionate powers to different members, based upon issues which now no longer exist. Of course, as our correspondent says, "under any system whatever, citizens must choose their representatives in view of the political situation as it presents itself to them at the time." But this, which is a difficulty under any system, will be aggravated by the one under discussion, for the very reason that it does provide so perfect a representation for the questions immediately at issue. To take an example: General Butler, who was chosen purely on the question of Reconstruction, probably misrepresents his constituents on the greenback question; but under the plan under discussion this misrepresentation would be enhanced in the ratio of the extra votes that were cast for him in a bitter personal canvass.

For the matter of that, as between this plan and Mr. Hare's, we do not hesitate to say that a more equitable and efficient representation will be attained by having the legislative body made up of men representing nearly the same number of voters and equal to each other in power, than in having the members vary in their voting power. It would be found, we feel sure, a better organized legislature for practical work. Both these plans lay more stress than Mr. Buckalew's upon absolute equality of representation, and in so far are superior to his; but, as we remarked above, this equality, after all, is of less importance than is often supposed; the present glaring inequalities in representation are among the smallest of the objections to the present system. Mr. Buckalew's plan has certainly the merit of simplicity, and will give good opportunity for an improved representation, while it avoids the difficulties of the New York plan. But all the plans proposed have objections on the score of expediency or fairness, and it may be that some plan will yet be devised superior to any of them.

But, after all, the most serious obstacle in the way of reform is not the inability or unwillingness of the community to understand a complicated scheme, but its inability to comprehend what is meant and intended by the reform. The public has become so habituated to our present methods, the majority is so accustomed to consider only itself, parties are so wedded to the belief that they are the nation, the district system is so universally accepted as a finality, that the first thing to be aimed at is that the community should understand the real meaning and aim of personal or minority representation. As our correspondent intimates, there is a great deal of misapprehension arising from this expression, "minority" representation—a misapprehension which lies at the bottom of the Chicago Republican plan. There are two parties—just these and no more—and it is fancied that our end is reached when these two parties are proportionately represented. But it is not the minority, but minorities, that we wish represented. The only objection that we have seen telegraphed as being made to the principle in the Illinois Convention is, that it would enable the railroad interest, or what not, to combine and run in a member. Well, that is just what we want. What we desire is that every interest, every phase of opinion, every section should have its representative. Be sure any rich interest, like that of the railroads, will have enough representatives under any system; what we want is a system under which poor and scattered interests may do the same.

"THE NEW EDUCATION" AT YALE.

YALE COLLEGE has thus far shown, at least as regards its Academical Department, a strong determination to walk in the ancient ways, and, as far as its curriculum is concerned, to yield little if anything to what is called the "spirit of the age." Its Scientific School, however—to which President Eliot, of Harvard, in the remarkable series of papers on the "New Education" contributed by him in the Atlantic Monthly before his elevation to his present post, assigned the highest rank among institutions of its kind in this country—may be looked on as an attempt on the part of the University to compromise with the radical reformers. The foundation of it was laid by the gift of a building from Mr. Sheffield, of New Haven, in 1860, from whom, if we are not mistaken, it has also received an endowment in money. What with this and donations from other sources, including the Connecticut share of the Congressional land grant in aid of education, it is now in the enjoyment of an income of about $25,000 a year. It has nine regular professors, nine other instructors, and about one hundred and forty students. But it needs at least three more professors, and those it has already need to be paid decent salaries; they have during the nine or ten years the college has been in existence been working literally for love. In other words, it needs an income of $50,000 a year to enable it to do comfortably and efficiently the task which it has undertaken. Its difficulties have been aggravated, oddly enough, by the fact that its professors are men of unusual merit in their respective fields, and have consequently been exposed to solicitations from other colleges which the state of their funds made it exceedingly difficult to resist, and which nothing but a very strong esprit de corps and great enthusiasm for their work would have enabled them to resist. It was hardly to be expected, however, that serious breaches would not eventually be made in their ranks, if they were not armed against these temptations from the outside by the provision of adequate salaries by their own institution; and, accordingly, when President Eliot made a descent on the School last fall, and tried to carry off two of its leading members, Professors Whitney and Brush, although the immediate object of his attacks made a vigorous and successful defence, the attempt seriously alarmed the whole neighborhood, and made it plain to the Faculty that something would have to be done to prevent the recurrence of similar raids.

Accordingly, an active movement in aid of the funds of the institution has been set on foot within the last month, in which all the professors, but more particularly Messrs. Gilman and Brush, are taking a part. Forty or fifty thousand dollars were almost immediately raised in New Haven, and a meeting was held in this city last week at the house of a gentleman strongly interested in the institution, preparatory to a personal appeal to such of the solid men of New York as are interested in the higher education. It was addressed by Professors Gilman, Brush, and Lyman on behalf of the School—the first, however, doing most of the work of exposition and explanation.

He evidently addressed himself mainly to the friends of what is called "practical education," of whom his audience was in large part composed, and to them he was able to say, what nobody could deny, that the waste which goes on in this country every year in its mining, manufacturing, and agricultural industry, through the ignorance and incompetency of persons charged with the solution of the various scientific problems which all the arts present, was incalculable. Bad mining and mechanical engineers and assayers, for instance, cause immense waste of labor and capital in the mines; ignorance of the quality and constituents of soils and food, and inability to detect the frauds perpetrated in the manufacture of artificial manures, cause great loss of labor and capital among farmers; while ignorance of chemistry and mechanism works similar waste in nearly every branch of manufacture. What is worse is, that the large class who get their living by cheating the industrious and saving portion of the community are able to command the services of a force of scientific quacks, who supply assays, analyses, and reports to order, and lure hundreds and thousands to their ruin by devices against which no amount of ordinary business experience or sagacity is a sufficient protection.

Now the scientific schools endeavor to supply men thoroughly trained to superintend the industrial operations of which this continent is the scene; and the Yale School is able to boast of having contributed a large number of the very best of them. Its graduates are almost immediately bought up for positions of great responsibility, and they have, almost without exception, filled them with extraordinary success. They are found all over the Union, in mines, mills, factories, and workshops, from Maine to California; and their course has been such as to give the diploma of the School a real value in dollars and cents, which business men have begun to recognize. This training, however, it must be said—and on this point Professor Gilman rightly laid great emphasis—derives more of its value from its moral than from its scientific ingredients. The students are taught, above all things, to be honest—to bear in mind that all pretence of knowing what they do not know, all hesitation in confessing ignorance where ignorance exists, is fatal to the scientific character, and converts the philosopher at one stroke into the humbug. To capitalists and investors—and their name is legion—who are suffering from the performances of pretenders and charlatans, this is, of course, a powerful recommendation in any institution which professes to train men for practical pursuits. We ought not to omit saying, too, that the School has made a beginning in the work of medical reform, by offering to young men who wish to qualify themselves for the honest practice of medicine a place where they may pursue those preliminary studies in botany and chemistry which are absolutely necessary to every doctor, but of which not one doctor in ten has even a tincture.

There was one point on which Professor Gilman touched slightly, if at all, at the meeting we have mentioned, owing, we are sure, rather to doubts of his audience than any want of appreciation of it on his own part, and that is the extent to which the new education, as he and his colleagues profess to impart it, is competent to do the work which the old professes to do. That portion of the community to which the higher education, whether it be scientific or classical, is valuable and important, will, we feel certain, never be fully satisfied with any training for young men which has no better claims to respect than its success in fitting them for "practical" pursuits. The test of any education to the community must eventually be, if it is not now, not the kind of engineers or chemists, but the kind of men, it produces. Of knowledge proper, the best of schools and universities can only supply a small amount; their main value to society depends, after all, on the kind of character they help to form, and the kind of quality they give to the mind. The great end of scientific training, as President Eliot said in his inaugural address, is to "develop and discipline those powers of mind by which science has been created and is daily nourished, the powers of observation, the inductive faculty, the sober imagination, the sincere and proportionate judgment." Greater things than this no education can do for any man. Less than this no education should set itself to do. If the new education does not do it, its effect on the profits of capital is a matter of small moment; no nation can live by profits any more than a man can live by bread alone. If it does do it, it cannot be proclaimed too loudly and too often, or dwelt on too strongly, as of all its doings the most important. Underneath the struggle for material good which is so marked a feature of American life, there is among all classes and conditions a strong and abiding dissatisfaction with it—a consciousness that there are things better worth striving for, pleasures which dividends cannot give and bad investments cannot take away; that even if our wildest dreams of material prosperity were realized, we should still be far from our ideal life. This noble discontent shows itself in many ways that seem impotent and mean. Swarms of quacks and pretenders in literature and science and art and politics live and grow fat by pretending to be able to satisfy it. It produces many of the oddities of the stump and reformatory convention, and finds vent in most of the impulsive outcries and wild schemes which are the terror and surprise of conservatives. But it furnishes to those who rightly appreciate the function of universities in this age, and in our society, their strongest incentive to exertion and their surest ground of hope. No college which means to do the work the times call for will ever overlook or underrate it, or place it anywhere but amongst the most prominent and most imperious of the wants it has to meet. Colleges, it must be remembered, however, are corps of instructors. It is the professors who make the atmosphere in which the student has to live. All else is bricks and mortar and chairs and tables; and it is because we believe no institution in the country can boast a body of men more thoroughly imbued with the university spirit, the desire to live by truth and for truth, than the Yale Scientific School, that we think they can never go wrong in placing what they are doing for the American man, as something better than and distinct from the American engineer or chemist, foremost amongst their claims to the support and gratitude of the community.

DAMNATION DISTRIBUTED.

We cannot imagine more cheerful reading for an orthodox Catholic than the recent Papal Bull of Excommunication, which, though dated October 12, has only just been published. In the preamble, his Holiness recites how, for good and sufficient reasons, numerous proclamations of ipso facto excommunication have been issued by the church from time to time, some of which have grown obsolete and useless in the changes of society and manners, giving rise to great anguish of conscience among the faithful. To relieve them from this unnecessary torture, he therefore proceeds to define now and for evermore the offences for which the aforesaid ipso facto excommunication is positively incurred, assuring them that these and no others are subject to that dreadful penalty.

This is really a work of benevolence, when we consider that by the ancient canons, in force up to the 12th of October last, there were several hundred offences so heinous as to be properly punishable only by this last resort of spiritual power—a penalty which separates from the church militant on earth and the church triumphant in heaven, without trial, sentence, or appeal, the unlucky sinner who either knowingly or ignorantly incurs it. In reducing these hideous transgressions, therefore, to the comparatively trival number of three dozen, Pius IX. has earned a new title to the gratitude of his flock—though it must be confessed that some of them are drawn up in terms so general that a single one embraces matter which the older custodians of heaven and hell divided into twenty or thirty.

Having thus resolved to be more liberal than his predecessors with the treasures of salvation entrusted to his charge, his Holiness proceeds to announce that all apostates and heretics, and all who refuse obedience to the Roman Pontiff, are excommunicated by the mere fact of their disobedience, and can only be reconciled by special application to himself. Geographers, we believe, estimate the population of the world at about a thousand millions, of which the Catholic Church boasts of possessing two hundred millions, including the Indians of Arizona and Paraguay. Thus, as the mouthpiece of Omnipotent mercy, Pius IX. at one word cuts off from all rational hope of salvation eight hundred millions of human beings, with their innumerable posterity, and it is no wonder that the official organ of his court declares this act of crowning mercy to be "une des plus belles pages du généreux pontifical de Pie IX."

Even this, however, does not exhaust the resources of his benignity, for he proceeds to include in the same curse all those who, without special authority from the Holy See, knowingly possess or read any books condemned by the Papal court. Thus, of the two hundred millions of faithful and obedient sons of the church, a very large proportion of the educated and cultivated are at once cut off. We tremble to think of the innumerable Catholic libraries which are condemning their possessors to eternal punishment by sinfully including on their shelves volumes which have been prohibited by the infallible judgment of the Congregation of the Index. Think of the Englishmen who have ignorantly indulged themselves by possessing Bacon's "De Augmentiis Scientiarum," Gibbon's "Rome," Swift's "Tale of a Tub," Robertson's "Charles V.," Roscoe's "Leo X.," or even Combe's "Phrenology"! Pity the Frenchman whose historical researches have led him to peep into De Thou's "Historia Universalis" or Sismondi's "Républiques Italiennes," or whose literary tastes may have seduced him into the forbidden ground of Rabelais, or Montaigne's "Essays," or La Fontaine's "Contes et Nouvelles," or who, if scientifically disposed, has studied Raspail's "Chimie Organique"! One would have thought, indeed, that the perusal of Raynal's "Indies" or Vertot's "Knights of Malta" was in itself sufficient punishment, but the infallible judgment of Rome has decreed otherwise, and the weariness of reading those interminable books is but the foretaste of the endless torments in store for their luckless students, nor will the owner of Montesquieu's "Esprit des Loix" be allowed to plead ignorance to avert condemnation. So the Italian is hopelessly lost whose rash curiosity has tempted him to look into Botta's "Storia d'Italia," or Giannone's "Istoria Civile di Napoli," or Ginguené's "Storia della Letteratura Italiana," or Dante's treatise "De Monarchia." Not many Italians, we presume, have incurred the penalty by wading through Rolli's translation of "Paradise Lost"—but as the condemnation of the translation doubtless includes the original, we tremble to think of the number of Englishmen and Americans who may now be expiating their indiscretion in eternal torment. It is to be hoped that the proportion of educated and accomplished Catholics is not very large, for we fear that this manifestation of Papal benignity may go hard with them.

Then the number of the saved is still further reduced by the condemnation of all who impede directly or indirectly the external or internal jurisdiction of the church. As Englishmen and Americans are lost by the previous clauses on heresy and disobedience and literary culture, this cannot do much harm to them, but as France and Italy and Austria have resolutely set bounds to the external jurisdiction of the church, and as the States of Central America have been somewhat recalcitrant on the same subject, we fear that some hundred or more additional millions are thus swept into perdition—especially as the succeeding clause specifically includes those who directly or indirectly subject ecclesiastics to secular tribunals—a crime of which all those states are guilty.

Then Spain and Mexico are likewise brought within the circle of condemnation by a clause which includes in the common curse all who invade or retain the revenues of the church or of her ministers, thus striking off at a blow some thirty millions more from the rapidly narrowing group of the elect.

All these being particularly heinous offences, Pius then proceeds to withdraw any powers which may have been previously conferred on any one to pardon them, and to include in the common excommunication any dignitary or prelate who may dare to grant absolution for them, except in articulo mortis—and then only with a reservation in case the dying man recovers.

Ireland we looked upon as a favored spot, exempt from this contagious perdition, until we came upon a special clause, apparently designed to bring the Green Isle under the ban. This includes all members of secret societies engaged in open or secret machinations against legitimate governments, as well as all who favor or give aid to such societies. Remembering Ribbonism and Fenianism, we felt that the doom of Ireland was sealed, and we grieved to think how few of the Patricks and Bridgets of America, who contributed their stamps to the "Sunburst," could escape.

Having thus weeded out the faithful until few are left, except the clergy and the inhabitants of the Roman Territory, who are known to be enthusiastically attached to their paternal clerical government, his Holiness proceeds to decimate the scanty remnants of his flock by pronouncing the same terrible anathema against a number of less wide-spread offences, such as holding converse with excommunicants, farming out masses, simony, and a number of other peccadilloes, mostly of a clerical character.

As we said before, there must be something particularly cheerful to a devout and obedient son of the church in contemplating the care with which his spiritual father separates the black sheep from the white. Knowing that his faithful obedience secures him a place in heaven, he has the satisfaction of feeling that there is little danger of being crowded there so long as the vigilant custodian of the keys uses the power entrusted to him with an eye single to keeping out and not to letting in the countless millions of souls whose fate depends upon his will. On the other hand, as our comments are based on an official copy of the original document, no person who reads this need flatter himself with the hope that we have made a mistake, and that if he possesses any of the works we have mentioned, there is any excuse for him.

ENGLAND.

January 14, 1870.

Ministers have been unusually silent during the recess. They are conscious, I presume, that they have a heavy task before them, which will absorb the attention of the country in an unusual degree For obvious reasons, they cannot talk about that, and they do not wish to incur any minor responsibilities. Moreover, we are at a period in which active agitation from outside is not specially desirable. The ministerial majority is quite sufficient to force a comprehensive measure through the House of Commons and to send it up to the Lords with an impetus which they would find it difficult to oppose. The problem is to secure a measure which will give tolerable satisfaction to the Irish, and which yet will not be too strong for the digestion of weak-minded Liberals. The ministry are of course applying their intellects to the excogitation of such a measure, and do not wish so delicate an operation to be disturbed by external clamor.

However, Mr. Bright has lately addressed his constituents at Birmingham in a speech which deserves notice in several ways. It does not, indeed, tend to clear up the question—What are we to expect? In a general way, he states that he adheres to his opinions, and that when the curtain is drawn, we shall be thoroughly satisfied with the spectacle. A minister could not well say more. It also appears that we are to have a decided measure upon education. For this we may thank mainly the new Education League, which is receiving great support and is fairly forcing the subject upon public notice. The battle between secular and denominational partisans is beginning to wax hot, and there is every chance of a very lively contest before the session is far advanced. So far, however, there is little news. I have more than once expressed my hope that these two questions would be in the foreground during the next Parliamentary campaign; and, to say the truth, it has been plain for some time past that that would be the case. But is anything more to be done? Upon this question, I am sorry to say that Mr. Bright took up a very doubtful position. He enlarged at great length upon the difficulties of the ministry; he said that it was impossible to "drive six omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar"—a fact of which Londoners are painfully aware both in the literal and the metaphorical sense. Indeed, I might say that the omnibus difficulty is owing in great part to the same cause as the legislative difficulty. Why does Temple Bar still obstruct locomotion in London? In America, I fancy you would have put it upon wheels and marched it down to some open space years ago, if you had not preferred the more radical remedy of simply levelling it with the ground. We do not move it, partly because we love everything old, even if it is ugly into the bargain, but even more because London has no single and vigorous municipal authority. It is a collection of parishes, governed by a whole wilderness of boards, whose various rights and duties are beyond the power of mortal man accurately to divide and describe. Consequently, when any improvement is seriously required—the embankment, for example, or the formation of a new street—we generally have to apply to the omnipotence of Parliament to come and cut the knot for us. Now Parliament, being choked with all kinds of more important interests, is very slow in coming to the rescue. And, consequently, old abuses are left standing which would be abolished at once by any vigorous local authority. This explains one great defect of our legislative machinery, which led Mr. Bright very fairly to describe it as a "clumsy instrument." It undertakes to be omniscient and omnipresent; to be about our paths and about our beds and to spy out all our ways. Nothing is too great or too little to occupy its attention. It talks about some big subject till it is bored, and meanwhile the members are exhausted by attending to what is called "private business" in committee meetings all the morning. They have absolutely no time to spare for the affairs of the nation whilst they are occupied in deciding about new railways and settling petty details about the rights of town corporations. Add to this the latitude which is very properly allowed to the minority of opposing measures by all kinds of motions meant merely for delay, and the freedom granted to individuals of talking indefinitely about any grievance which happens to strike them, and the wonder is rather that Parliament is not absolutely choked with the business which it undertakes than that it does not manage to transact more. However, a strong government can do a great deal; and if Mr. Gladstone chose to express his determination that almost any measure should pass, he might force it through in spite of any possible opposition. It is rather unsatisfactory, therefore, to find that Mr. Bright brings up these excuses as against the measure of abolishing university tests. There are few points upon which the Liberal party is so thoroughly united, and on which there is so little chance of compromise or useful opposition. If it is to be thrown overboard till a better time, there is little chance indeed of getting any wider measures through the troublesome defiles of Parliamentary discussion.

There is one other matter on which Mr. Bright spoke, which deserves a short notice. As you probably know, Mr. Odger, an artisan, is at the present moment contesting the borough of Southwark. It is a large constituency, and there, if anywhere, a workingman candidate ought to have a fair chance of success. Moreover, Mr. Odger is in some sense a pattern workingman. He is really the ablest of those who came forward during the reform agitation, and seems to possess altogether a more educated and generally cultivated intellect than is common in his class. Mr. Bright, however, spoke rather unfavorably of the principle. He said that the House of Commons required men who had really studied political questions, and were capable of forcibly expressing them. So long as they voted generally in favor of the sense of their constituents, they did all that could be wanted; and, as a general rule, class representation was a mistake, and calculated to produce many evils. The members of the House of Commons still belonged to the same class as formerly, but their action has been most materially affected by the very different constituents behind them.

Without following out the argument, I will only say that it was rather a bold one for Mr. Bright, and appears to have given considerable dissatisfaction to workingmen. It suggests the remark, which is worth making on other accounts, that Mr. Bright, though known as a radical, is by no means a man of thoroughly democratic tendencies. On the contrary, his sympathies are, and always have been, very strongly with the middle classes. He is a man of genius, but not a man quite in sympathy with the advanced school of the time. He opposed the legislation for limiting the hours of employment in factories and insisting upon the education of children employed in them. He believes thoroughly in the laissez-faire doctrines, which, I take it, are radically opposed to the views of the more revolutionary school. And it is curious to observe that, popular as Mr. Bright is amongst a large party, his popularity among the artisans proper is by no means equal to that of Mr. Gladstone, who, though more imbued with certain antiquated prejudices, is also on many sides more susceptible to the influence of new ideas. I should not be surprised to see Mr. Bright earn a good deal of unpopularity by opposing certain democratic theories, after having won his place in public esteem by supporting others.

This at least is the view which many people will take of his action in this case. I must add that to me he seems to be substantially right. I do not believe that workingmen will do much, as things are at present—if they will ever do anything—by sending representatives of their own class to Parliament. It is curious to see that Mr. Odger is very generally supported by Conservatives. The reason, however, is very simple. In the first place, they are coquetting to a certain extent with the working-classes everywhere, and trying to make capital out of their prejudices against free-trade. The plan is not very deep-sighted or sagacious; for they may be pretty sure that their new allies would in the long run get the lion's share of the bargain. But there is such a tendency, and Mr. Odger so far falls in with it that, although a free-trader, he promises to ask for an enquiry into the working of the French Treaty. An enquiry, be it observed, is a way either of satisfying your constituents without injury to your principles, or, in some cases, of finding a pretext for evading your principles. I do not, of course, mean to deny that Mr. Odger is perfectly honest; but he is to a certain degree in a difficulty. Secondly, the Conservatives are far too sure of their power in the House to be in the least degree anxious as to the effect of admitting a workingman. It has a good appearance, and will not lead to any possible results. Mr. Odger will make a few speeches, and be very kindly received. If he is a man of real ability, he will, of course, do good service, as men of ability in other classes would do it. But he will certainly be in a very difficult position. On the one hand, he will be in danger of being put down as a simple demagogue, and of merely giving excuse for a little more ridicule against the political party to which he belongs. On the other, he will be petted and caressed by a number of interested people, both genuine Conservatives and professed friends of the workingman; and he will require a very independent spirit to resist their delicate addresses. But in any event, one workingman amongst 658 country gentlemen, merchants, railway owners, and prosperous lawyers will make little difference. The Reform Bill of 1867 has certainly made a change in the political atmosphere, though it is difficult to pronounce confidently on the final results. This, however, is plain enough, that, so far, it has not tended to diminish the power of wealth in the House. A long purse is as useful as ever towards getting into Parliament and attracting respect within its walls; and even if a few men in fustian coats should be mixed with an audience so little homogeneous, they would have little chance of really changing the spirit of its discussions.

I should, however, be glad to see Mr. Odger elected—not because I am very sanguine as to the effect he would produce, or believe that the workingmen would have made a specially good use of their power. But I should be glad to see that they do really possess power and are not afraid to use it; for we must, I suspect, look very much to their influence to force Parliament to set seriously about the much-needed task of social reforms. However, I am coming too near the borders of a discussion on democracy at large. I refrain from going further, and will end by stating that Prince Napoleon's little feat has just now put most other matters out of English as well as out of French heads. Unless the Duke of Cambridge shoots the editor of the Times, we shall hear of little else for the next few days.

Correspondence.

THE ALABAMA QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: All disputed questions must ultimately be settled by fact. No respectable person or nation would wish to have them settled otherwise. The British Government is accused of being over-hasty in recognizing the belligerency of the rebel States, in furnishing ships and opening ports to the belligerents to wage war on our commerce, by which means our commercial marine has become very much reduced. And many other ruinous effects growing out of the prolongation of the war are attributed to Great Britain.

With respect to the early recognition of the belligerency of the rebel States, it would have been much wiser in ourselves if we had perceived and acted on the real belligerent spirit of those States, earlier even than did the Government of Great Britain. That spirit had been manifested long before open hostilities commenced; but if when they had once broken out, we had resorted immediately to the use of such resources as were at our disposal for their suppression, among which were the colored militia of the nation, the war would probably have been shortened by two years, and its expenses lessened by at least one-half, if not more. By this means our sailors' and shipbuilders' wages would not have run so high, our commercial marine would not have been so much reduced, and our losses of ships would have been comparatively few; and above all, we should not now be paying some one hundred millions of dollars' tribute every year, by way of interest on our immense debt, to Western Europe.

The laboring millions of Great Britain and the Continent were as much interested to have cheap cotton as were ours; the poor men of both countries were, and still are, paying an enormous price for cotton, owing in a great measure to our failure to make a timely and vigorous use of our resources for the prosecution of the war; and the responsibility of this want of decision and vigor rests entirely with the war administration, and largely with the late Secretary of War.

If the prolongation of the war is due to a mistaken deference for the Democracy, out of fear that the nation might not be sustained in its struggles for existence unless the said Democracy should be conciliated to that degree that the principle for which we fought and the national life both should be endangered, then it is wrong either to attribute so much blame to Great Britain on the one hand, or such extraordinary laudation of individuals as the country has recently witnessed on the other. It behooves us, as a free, self-governing people, to see if the faults of which we complain did not originate with ourselves: if they did, it is revolting to true manhood, and exceedingly demoralizing to the community, to attempt to hide our eyes and those of the world from them by political demonstration and stunning eulogies over the dead. Nothing could more thoroughly or quickly demoralize a nation than an indiscriminate bestowal of office and honor, for imaginary political effect, upon unmistakable inefficiency.

The object of war is to make peace. The nation has furnished almost unlimited means in men and money for the purpose of securing peace, and yet, now nearly five years after hostilities have ceased, four of the ten original rebel States are still out of the Union, and under the rule of martial law, and still the country is resounding with praises for those who have left us in this condition!

No Christian nation has any excuse for prolonging war when it holds in its hands legitimate means, as we did, for its speedy termination, any more than it could have for carrying on war after its resources are so much exhausted that it resorts to inhuman means like those of prison-pens for its continuance.

The futile yet constant efforts of our late Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, as unwise as they were persistent, to pacify our disturbance at home by oily diplomatic appliances abroad, has resulted in the transference of our unfinished domestic quarrel to the arbitration of England, which is to have the lion's share and control in the decision, while we, against the maxims of our traditional policy, are thus drawn into an entangling alliance, of uncertain issue, in which our national independence is sure to be abridged so long as it continues, and our debt remains unpaid. J. W. Phelps.

Brattleboro, Vermont, Dec. 29, 1869.

MILTON'S GREEK IMITATIONS AND IDIOMS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It is much to be desired that the Congress of that "republic of letters" of which we hear so often, should pass a law forbidding all persons to write about Milton, and especially to criticise his verbal expressions, without some knowledge of the ancient Greek language and literature. Some years ago, a magazine writer charged Milton with plagiarism because an obscure versifier had anticipated him in—imitating a passage from Theocritus. A discovery almost equal to that wonderful mare's nest of Theodore Tilton's, who impugned Miss Barrett's originality because her translation of an idyll of Theocritus resembled in some points Shelley's poem—which was an imitation of the same idyll. Theocritus, you will observe, is a frequent sufferer in these transactions, owing to the average American littérateur's utter ignorance of him; but we must do Mr. Tilton the justice to say that he corroborated his charge by showing that a certain line of Miss Barrett's resembled one of Poe's—written about a year later. But to return to Milton. A writer in Appleton has recently accused him of making a bull because he calls our first parents

> "The loveliest pair
> That ever since in love's embraces met."

Now this was not an involuntary Hibernicism on the poet's part, but a voluntary Hellenism. Milton uses it elsewhere, e.g., he styles Adam "the goodliest man of men since born," and Eve "the fairest of her daughters." The idiom, as you are aware, is very common in Greek. An instance of it occurs in the very first sentence of Thucydides, who designates the Peloponnesian war as the most important of those that had occurred previously. The expression may be absurd logically, but so are many idioms in all languages. Carl Benson.

Notes.

LITERARY.

We have received a printed circular from the "National Publishing Co.," of Cincinnati, informing us that they "have in press, and will soon issue," a "full and plain treatise, called 'The Medical Adviser,' by Rezin Thompson, M.D., Permanent Member of the National Medical Association," and "author of 'Thompson on Fever.'" The circular says, with a show of professional testimony, that some of the ablest members of the medical profession have examined it, and highly approve of it—in fact, allege that it is "the best" work of the kind ever published—and adds other praise of the publisher's own. It closes by promising that on receipt of a copy of the Nation "containing commendatory notice of the work," the publisher will send us, "at his expense, a copy of the work as soon as issued." In other words, he invites us to join him in practising a fraud on the public, by commending a book we have never seen, and which is not yet issued, and of which we know nothing except what the persons interested in selling it say about it. As it is hardly likely that this dodge was resorted to without the author's knowledge, we beg to call the attention of the "National Medical Association"—if there be such a body—to the performance, and should like to hear what provision the "Code of Ethics" makes for such cases. The public will understand that all "commendatory notices" of the book which they may see about this time are simply mendacious puffs.

—The first feeling with which we laid down the new Woman's Journal, published in Boston, was that, while differing wholly from the Revolution in those qualities which have made the latter discreditably notorious, and done so much to injure the cause it seeks to further, it resembled it in not rising much above platform discussion; and that consequently it brings no new method to the discussion of women's rights. Undoubtedly we should do wrong to generalize concerning a paper barely a month old, and we should be gratified beyond measure if the conductors of the enterprise succeed in winning contributions from the thoughtful, cultivated, and withal modest women whom the Revolution has thus far succeeded only in repelling and silencing. There are topics enough, after the right to vote is conceded, to engage the attention of women whether as actual or merely prospective citizens, and which it will be well to argue before the responsibilities which they court are laid upon them. True, so long as women have not actually gained the right they assert, the chief business of any organ of theirs will naturally be to combat opponents. But as the readers of a paper are not in general opposed to it in principle, this warfare has for them its limits of interest and profit. We should therefore like to see a department given over exclusively to instructing those already convinced on the main question, and containing something besides the constant assurance to women of their present fitness for citizenship. That a woman is as well qualified to cast a vote as an ignorant foreigner, is an argument so common as to be in danger of being unconsciously adopted as a standard, with the evil effects of all low standards. The proper enquiry is, whether she can attain a fitness equal to that of the best men; and that every untried woman citizen may put to herself. The Woman's Journal has Mrs. Mary A. Livermore for managing editor, and Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Lucy Stone, Mr. Garrison, and Mr. Higginson for associates. Each editorial article has initials appended, but contributors may be as anonymous as they please. As to the editing, we may be allowed to say that we think it shows signs of the want of steady supervision from a single eye, and that it is a great mistake to make a paper, which is intended to influence the public opinion of the whole country on an important social question, even seem to be the organ of a body so fearfully and wonderfully speculative and local as the Boston "Radical Club." But, after all, we are, as we have said, only criticising the early numbers of a journal which is, after all deductions have been made, really the best effort yet made in a new and difficult field, and to which, though we are pretty sure to differ from it on a variety of points, we heartily wish success. The tone is excellent, and one paper—that of Colonel Higginson in No. 4—touches the kernel of the woman question. We trust his line will be followed up.

—The month just gone has made two or three contributions to the list of the distinguished dead of 1870. Salnave, the Haytian political chief, has just died what may be called the natural death of noted Spanish-American politicians, whether of mixed blood, or of white, or black, for he was shot the other day by a file of soldiers. It was a fate rather too hard for him, perhaps, he being a man of sense and good manners; but politics in Hayti consists in conspiring and shooting others, or conspiring and being shot; and Salnave had tried the former in his day, as well as the latter. In this country we have to chronicle the death of Mr. George D. Prentice, who not long since was perhaps the most influential, and was certainly the best known, of Southern journalists. Like a good many of the men who were serviceable, and who have become more or less famous, by working in literature for the Southern side of the slavery question, Mr. Prentice was a New Englander by birth; but going into Kentucky, as a young man not far past his majority, he soon became almost completely imbued with the Southern spirit. Up to the day of the breaking out of the rebellion, he might very well have been taken as a type of the regular semi-educated politico-literary Southerner who had no claims to be considered aristocratic in blood. He knew the Resolutions of '98 and English literature between Addison and Thomas Moore; he was always ready to take his chance under "the code" of his adopted State; he became a free liver after the extremely unpuritanical fashion of Kentucky; he could talk of chivalry as one to the manner born; and slavery had in him as willing a defender as if his father had been a planter, and he had not first seen the light on a Yankee "sidehill." Many are the stories told of the duels and the rough-and-ready fights in which he was engaged, as were most of the editors of that day and country; of the newspaper wars, peculiarly Southern in character, which preceded them; and of the orgies which accompanied them, and which were, indeed, part of the warp and woof of the life of the Southern and Border States a few decades ago. It is a characteristic anecdote that they tell of him and Mr. Reuben Darrett, once editor of the Louisville Courier, which was the local rival of Prentice's Journal. For several consecutive days in 1858, the Courier printed a paragraph—doubtless true enough—stating that Mr. Prentice, while "under a cloud," had fallen from the gangway plank of a steamboat, and been nearly drowned. "Probably," says our authority, "he felt that even his great command of language would not permit him to do justice to the subject;" so he announced that, in case the Courier should print the statement one time more, he should hold the editor responsible. Of course, Mr. Darrett gave his personal attention to the matter, and next morning the paragraph appeared in a conspicuous place. "Mr. Prentice," says our chronicler, "waited upon Mr. Darrett, and fired twice at him." His "brother of the quill," as the phrase used to go, was not behindhand in the use of firearms, and when satisfaction had been given, "each editor had a ball extracted from his hide." But, thoroughly as he seemed to have adopted Southern manners and opinions, there appears to have been something of New England left in him; for when the war broke out he took strong ground in favor of coercion. He hated an abolitionist; but his Whiggism, his dislike of Democratic secessionists, the sort of fetish-worship of the Constitution, and ardent love of the Union—the pride in America as the home of the eagle—which was so powerful a sentiment in the breasts of many men of the generation to which he belonged, kept Mr. Prentice, pro-slavery as he was, from going into rebellion. He was a fearless Unionist, and for a while in the beginning of the war he was very popular in the North, and got many subscribers in this part of the country, who took the place of the many he lost in the South. But soon the war became what he called "a nigger war;" his sons went into the Confederate army; he was grown old and was sick, and his zeal for the Union as it was to be was a very different thing from his zeal for the Union as it was. Still, he did good service of its kind, and this should not be forgotten, although we find it impossible to think of him as a man of enlarged views, and although we know he was so far from being alive to the real issues before him that he never in the least comprehended them. He spent his best strength in the politics of Henry Clay's time, and was at one with Mr. Greeley in thinking that politician a man of vast ability and eminently worthy of the name of statesman. After the war was over, Mr. Prentice, of course, took sides with Mr. Johnson, and "even his great command of language" hardly sufficed to enable him to give expression to all the scurrility and bad temper and bad logic and forcible-feeble invective which he heaped on his antagonists. But, as we have said, he had grown old; his life had been in many ways exhausting; he was poor, and not his own master; his Journal had gone out of his hands and been swallowed by its old rival the Courier, and there is no saying for how much of what has been bad and weak in the Courier-Journal he is to be held responsible. Probably for little. Yet it is not denied that in his days of strength his paper was almost as noticeable for its malice and unscrupulous personalities as for its inexhaustible flood of cheap, coarse pleasantry. The editor always wrote as if the pistol was to make good what the pen said, and as if the community in which he lived would tolerate and applaud all brutality that had a pistol behind it. In this he was not mistaken. Even when he defended the notorious Matt. Ward for shooting a schoolmaster who had punished a younger Ward, it was easy for him by a little buffoonery to win over to his side the public opinion which at one time appeared to be setting against him. His ready wit, unscrupulously used, and his "appreciation of the value of short spicy paragraphs"—for circulation among an uneducated people, with a stock of prejudices which could do duty for ideas, and entirely unpractised in thinking—these qualities of his are those by which he made his mark on his own generation of his countrymen and those by which he will be remembered so long as he is remembered at all. Like many men of his stamp—men of quick feelings and no moral strength, who have lost many opportunities and thrown away much time and some power of mind, and who know and feel that they have done so—Mr. Prentice wrote some sentimental poetry, all of a pensive cast. None of it, however, caught the popular taste, for its author had little poetic capacity. A life of Henry Clay—published for partisan purposes—is Mr. Prentice's principal work, and it is now not known.

—It was in the last days of last year that the death occurred of "the Nestor of German Philology;" but the news was not received here till after the new year began, and the name of Wilhelm Wackernagel goes into the necrology of 1870. He died at Basle on the morning of December 21, in the seventieth year of his age. He had not made for himself a world-wide reputation, and many who knew of the renown of Jacob Grimm were ignorant that Wackernagel was, as a "Germanist," next in rank to that famous scholar. He was but twenty-one years old when he began to publish, and by the time he was twenty-seven he had secured a chair in the university at Basle, had published his work on the history of the German hexameter and pentameter since Klopstock, and was active as a politician, and ready for the municipal offices which he soon afterwards obtained. He was, indeed, a man of very active mind, always with many irons in the fire, as the titles of his works sufficiently show, and as would be more fully shown if to the titles of his elaborate works were added those of the innumerable articles which he wrote for magazines. He wrote elaborate treatises on philology, comparative mythology, the history of literature, the history of manners and customs, the history of art, the philosophy of art, and jurisprudence. He was an editor also, and a poet of no mean order, and his character, as well as his abilities and labors, will cause his death in the midst of his usefulness to be much and sincerely regretted.

—The importance of the wide-spread movement for getting German taught as of course in our common schools, makes it desirable to keep sight of its progress. At the West such a movement was natural, and so too in Pennsylvania. In New England, one would least have expected to meet with it. But it appears that in New Haven the German population is massed in a single district, and on their representations a German teacher was engaged for the Brown school. The private German-English school which he had till then superintended was given up, the pupils following him to the public school, and resuming there their instruction under him. The study of German for the rest of the scholars was made optional, but the American children soon asked leave to join the class in which the language was taught, and did so without any urging from their parents. The examinations just passed showed a remarkable proficiency in grammar and in speaking, and it seems altogether likely that other New England cities will be led by this successful experiment to make similar provision in their schools for the study of German.

—In alluding again to the Seventeenth Annual Report of the Trustees of the Boston Public Library—the most valuable yet issued, and containing, besides statistics pertaining to the library itself, lists of the libraries in Massachusetts, in the rest of the United States and British America, and some of England and Continental Europe, with comparative tables—we wish to add a suggestion to one made by the Examining Committee, as follows:

"The Committee are inclined to think that it would be judicious to make the bulletins of new books, and the catalogues of the works of fiction, the vehicles of conveying some information regarding the relative value and interest of the different classes of novels, and of the position their authors occupy in the sliding scale of merit. This is a kind of knowledge which a great many of the applicants for books in the Lower Hall evidently need, and for which they would doubtless be thankful. As it is, they are often determined in their selection by mere accident; and whether they stumble on a work of tragic genius, or a bald recital of coarse horrors, the result is in either case due to chance or caprice."

The truth of this last remark will be generally conceded, nor could any one doubt the usefulness of an index expurgatorius such as is proposed. That, after all, is the proper name for an attempted discrimination between good and bad literature. In the present case it might lead to the enquiry why the bad was admitted to a library whose space is precious; but the answer to that is easy. Another mode of enlightening readers has been adopted by the new public library of Milan. The directors have arranged with public-spirited and learned men to make known in short lectures "the moral worth of the most important works of the human intellect," both new and old. On occasion of the first of these, an account was given of what was most notable in D'Adda's new version of Mignet's "Life of Franklin," and in one of Michelet's "Nos Fils." Of course not very much ground can be got over in speaking, even if the object were to present a classified summary of books of the day, or of works in certain branches of knowledge; but the instruction could be solid and lasting as far as it went, and the popular judgment educated in the best manner. We believe this sort of lecture to have in it greater capacity for good than all the lyceum talk we have had in the past fifteen years.

—There have been published during the last year in Great Britain and Ireland 4,164 volumes, of which number 1,319 were volumes that have been published before. That so large a proportion as nearly one-third of all the books published were books republished, speaks well for the sagacity of publishers, and may, perhaps, properly be taken as speaking to some extent in favor of the authors of our day, who of course supply the greater number of the reprints, although, too, there is just now a very intelligent interest in the good literature of earlier periods. As in previous years, theological and religious books make up a quarter of the publications of the year, numbering 1,047. Second come "juveniles," which reach the number of 500, the children being better—or worse—provided for each year. Fiction does not even come third in order, and the decay of the novel seems to be certain. Books classed under the head of educational and philological take the third place, there being 478 of them to 461 novels and romances. Fifth in the list is the class of books relating to the various fine arts. These number 341; and the believers in a millennium in the future rather than a millennium in the past will be glad to learn that works treating of political and social economy number 324, and are sixth in numerical importance. Poetry shows well with 274 volumes, and perhaps we may plead in its behalf what we no doubt must take into consideration in the case of novels, that each book gets many readers; but the ratio of readers to owners or purchasers is doubtless greater in the case of novels than of any other class of books.

—Forty-one hundred, more or less, being the number of books published in Great Britain during 1869, it is a little surprising to be told that Germany published 12,000, or nearly three times as many; that France published about 9,000, or more than twice as many; and that America published only some 2,000. But nothing lies like figures, if we put into their mouths our inferences; and anybody would make a mistake who should argue from these statistics that there is twice as much reading and writing in France as in England, and that there is twice as much reading and writing in England as there is in the United States. Other considerations must be taken into account. The surveillance of the police in France is strict; and then, too, the French talent for systematizing is like other talents, and works its proper evil as well as its proper good. Publications are well registered in France; but the registry includes every trivial broadside and pamphlet. In Germany, also, there is a formal registration of insignificant performances which in England would escape official notice. And in America we are not only so notoriously lax, and free, and easy-going in our management of such matters that our formal records of works published give no accurate indication of the amount of reading and writing done, but also an immense deal of our reading and writing we do as a nation of newspaper makers and newspaper consumers. Most Americans, we may say, do not read books and do read newspapers. It is to be noted, however, that the number of American works reprinted in England in 1869 is about one-fifth of the total number which we produced in that year. They reprinted four hundred, lacking three, of our books. So anybody who has been "kept awake nights" by that impudent question of the unprophetic Canon of Saint Paul's may now sleep in peace. We, for our part, please ourselves with the thought that the day is coming when the name of Sydney Smith shall be far better known as that of the man who actually made that singular enquiry, than as that of the most jovial of English wits and one of the very cleverest of English unprofessional authors.

—The Pall Mall Gazette lately gave some account of a little work on "The Theory and Practice of Creole Grammar," by J. J. Thomas (Port of Spain, Trinidad, 1869), and we have found it interesting to compare some of the examples cited with corresponding Creole idioms in Louisiana and Hayti—where, as well as in Trinidad, the French patois has been exposed to Spanish influence. The Creole of Trinidad, with the African repugnance to the sound of r, makes w of it, as in bouave (brave); or changes it into l, as in callefoû (carrefour); or drops it, as in the last instance, and in paler (parler), etc. In like manner, our Southern negroes generally say mo' for more, do' for door—

("O Deat', he is a little man,
And he goes from do' to do'")— and shorten brother into bro'; while the Louisiana creole says pou (pour) naig (nègre)—

("Li fait naig payé pou sauté inpé")—

maite (maître), etc. The Haytian, too, when asked how he is, replies—"as master pleases:" "à la volonté maite;" and uses conte (contre), frê (frère), agent (argent; Louis. arzan), jounée (journée), joudi (aujourd'hui), etc. "Ba nou joudi la nourriture"—"Give us this day our [daily] bread," is his prayer; and the form for give is matched in Trinidad; "Bâ (baille, Old French) moèn boèr"—"Give me to drink [spoken to the woman of Samaria]." In the latter island the indefinite article is yon (un); in Louisiana this article is much neglected, but we have aine (un, one), and inpê (un peu). In Trinidad, the definite article follows the noun, and is la (là) for all genders: mam'selle la, chouval la. We find a kindred form for horse in Louisiana, in a song describing a plantation ball in the stables:

"Dans lequirie la yavé gran gala,
Mo cré choual la yé té bien étonné"

Here, too, the article follows, but it may also precede. Both modes possibly occur in these lines:

"Mo pancor ouar [je n'ai pas encore vu] griffonne la Qua mo gout comme la belle Layotte."

La is likewise used for both genders, and so is li. In Trinidad, matante is simply aunt, lapôte (porte) simply door, nômme (yon ômme) simply man. From Louisiana we have already quoted inpê, pancor, lequirie (l'écurie); and may add ya, yavé (il y a, il y avait), as amalgamated words. Pronouns may be thus contrasted:

Tr. moen (je),	L. mo (je, me, mon), mouin (moi),	H. mon, m' (je), I;
ous (tu, vous),	ti (tu, toi?),	thou;
li (il, elle),	li (il, elle, lui),	he, she;
nous (nous),		nou (nous), we;
zôtes (vous autres)	vous (vous),	ou (vous), you;
yeaux (ils, elles, eux),	yê (ils, elles, leur),	yo (eux), they.

The Trinidad infinitive ends generally in er, but after a nasal letter, in en; and it plays the principal part in conjugation, as moèn aimèn, I love, ous aimèn, thou lovest, etc. So, in Louisiana,

"Michié (Monsieur) Préval li donnin gran bal," on which occasion

"So cocher Louis té maite cérémonie."

Té (était). And in Trinidad: moèn té aimèn, I was loving. Here the continued present is moèn ca manger, I am eating, ca being probably for the form "va." The Haytians have a different corruption: m' a pê fait, I am doing; m' t'a pê fait, I was doing; m' té fait, I did—t' and té being, of course, "était," or "été," and fait the infinitive, throughout. The following line in Louisiana Creole combines examples of article, pronoun, conjugation, and order:

"Cadeau la li té promi mouin."

That is to say: "Gift the to her had promised I."

MR. LEA'S "STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY."*

THE themes which Mr. Lea handles are not of a popular cast; they relate mostly to obscure parts of mediæval history. Yet his book, strange to say, is timely, being rendered so by the Latin Council and the widespread interest kindled by it in the dogmas and polity and policy of the Roman Catholic Church. The volume is made up of somewhat fragmentary but well-considered and learned essays on a variety of special topics, which, however, are grouped together under the general titles: "The Rise of the Imperial Power," "Benefit of Clergy," "Excommunication." As in the case of his former works, Mr. Lea has prosecuted his researches, in a truly scholarly spirit, among the documentary sources of church history, and he has thereby given a character of freshness and thoroughness to his discussions. But, as heretofore, he has purposely omitted to examine to any great extent the productions of other laborers in the same field. This course is attended with obvious disadvantages. The true method is that adopted by the Germans, of combining personal investigation of the sources of knowledge with careful attention to the other writers in the same province. The plain principle is that a party of explorers can bring to light more than any one individual. Hasty generalizations, as well as incorrect observations, are rectified, and imperfect studies are filled out by the concurrent exertions of many minds. At the same time, when there is so little thorough work in historical study done, we are little inclined to make a too exclusive reliance on isolated researches a ground of complaint. We are more disposed to be instructed by our author than to criticise him.

Mr. Lea adopts for the motto of his work the well-known lines of Dante in the "Inferno" (xix.):

"Ahi Costantin, di quanto mal fu matre,
Non la tua conversion, ma quella dote,
Che da te prese il primo ricco patre!"— which are thus rendered by Cary:

"Ah Constantine! to how much ill gave birth,
Not thy conversion, but that plenteous dower
Which the first wealthy father gain'd from thee."

As Mr. Lea dwells on the numerous forgeries of which the pretended gift of Constantine to Pope Sylvester was one of the most conspicuous, it is not quite clear with what intent he has placed these lines on his title-page. However, Dante himself elsewhere implies a doubt of the reality of the famous donation; and Mr. Lea's idea probably is to give prominence to the fact that the fictitious story of the gift, and especially the temporal power for the furtherance of which the story was invented, have been prolific of disasters. It is the text for the dissertations that follow.

As we are adverting to this subject, we may notice a statement of the author on a controverted point of much interest. When Pepin made the gift to the Pope which laid the foundation of the temporal kingdom, and when the Pope became Patricius of the Exarchate, while Pepin was made through the act of the Pope, representing the Roman people, Patricius of Rome, what was the real import of this transaction? "Two Italian expeditions," writes Mr. Lea, "brought Aistulph the Lombard to reason, restored to the Holy See—or rather to the Roman Republic—the territory of which it had been despoiled," etc. If we understand him aright, he agrees with Savigny that the Pope and Pepin had in mind the restored Western Empire, as an unrealized idea; and that to this empire—then, as it were, in a state of suspended animation—sovereignty was reserved or subordination acknowledged. This is probably the true view. Gieseler, one of the most accurate of historians, affirms that in the act of both the parties in that memorable transaction, there was a tacit recognition still of the supremacy of the Eastern Empire. This must be considered, to say the least, doubtful. The coronation of Charlemagne in the Basilica of St. Peter sealed and proclaimed the consummated revival of the Empire of the West.

Mr. Lea observes in the preface that in depicting the crimes and abuses of the Church, he is actuated by no want of appreciation of its merits and its services to civilization. But, he adds, "in summing up the benefits which man has derived through the church, we may also not unreasonably enquire how much greater would have been our advance in all that renders us worthy of the precepts of the Gospel had that church always been true to its momentous trust." No one can reasonably object to the author's line of discussion, although this explanation is a proper one to give. The Papacy in the Middle Ages conferred vast benefits on European society—indispensable benefits—which could have been obtained, as far as we can judge, in the condition of things that existed then, in no other way. It is enough for the Protestant to claim that mankind have outgrown the Papacy, and that the day when the paternal oversight and spiritual domination of the Roman bishop brought more good than evil to the nations of the European family, is past. It seems remarkable, we may add, that if Janus, the "Great Unknown," be really a Roman Catholic, he should wholly omit to set forth, even to save himself from misunderstanding, the unquestionable good that flowed from the Papacy, sometimes when the office was held by unworthy men. If the author of "The Pope and the Council" be a Roman Catholic, he is a "liberal" one indeed.

There are many subjects considered in this collection of essays by Mr. Lea which invite comment and, in some cases, challenge criticism; but we recommend the book, without further remark, as a highly instructive discussion of matters which are always of interest to scholars, and which are just now clothed with a special importance.

* "Studies in Church History. By Henry C. Lea." Philadelphia: Henry C. Lea. 1869.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES.*

THIS work has been in the hands of the public for twenty-eight years, passing through twelve English and a number of American editions. It is needless now to expatiate on its general usefulness. Planned on a comprehensive scale, but very poorly executed by its author, it has been gradually improved in its later editions by the correcting and completing hand of Mr. Vincent, who, in 1855, undertook its revision and continuation, "in order to render the book more worthy of its established reputation."

Unfortunately, however, the defects of the original publication, to be radically removed, required much more than the amount of labor and care which even conscientious revisers are inclined to bestow upon the work of others. And so the "Dictionary" remains highly imperfect, in spite of continued completing and correcting, and many articles will still have to be "rewritten, and new ones inserted, and much geographical, biographical, literary, and scientific information supplied," and numberless inaccuracies in dates and names eliminated, before it becomes, what it is intended to be made, "a digested summary of every department of human history brought down to the very eve of publication." To make it worse, Mr. Vincent's own additions are not always made and revised with the necessary care. Thus, for instance, in the "Table of Contemporary European Sovereigns," which he has placed at the head of the last (twelfth) English edition, we find a number of errors and omissions. The accession of Christina of Sweden is dated "1633," instead of 1632; that of Charles II. of England, "1650," instead of 1660; that of Czar Nicholas "1828," instead of 1825; that of King William of Prussia "1860," instead of 1861. Napoleon's second reign, in 1815, is forgotten. Ferdinand I. of Hungary (1526) and Ferdinand I. of Austria (1835) are both entered as Ferdinand II. The Empress Maria Theresa is to be found neither under "Germany," nor under "Hungary," nor under "Austria," being crowded out by her husband, Francis I., though he was only German Emperor, and never reigned in his wife's hereditary dominions.

The American edition before us is based upon the last English (of 1866). It professes to have brought down "this Dictionary of Dates, which is at the same time a chronicle and a chronology of the world's progress . . . to the present year;" even to the time when "the work has been passing through the press." This is, however, far from being an entirely correct statement, as a mere glance over the tables and chronologies will show. The "Population and Governments of the World," at the very opening of the book, are given "according to the Almanach de Gotha for 1866," though at least three later editions of the "Almanach," containing considerably modified tables, were at the American publishers' disposal. The history of the "United States" ends with "Dec. 29, 1865," where Mr. Vincent left it; and the trial of Andrew Johnson, for instance, is as little mentioned in it as the opening of the Pacific Railroad; the list of "Presidents," etc., alone receiving an additional line. The latest date in Russian chronology is "Sept. 13, 1865," such events as the two attempts at the life of Czar Alexander II., or the conquest of Samarkand, being ignored. The latest under "Cuba" is a Spanish ministerial declaration of

* "Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, relating to all Ages and Nations, for universal reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and revised for the use of American readers." New York: Harper and Brothers. 1869.

"Dec. 19, 1854," in reference to the Ostend manifesto of "Messrs. Buchanan, Mason, and Soulé." Nor is there an allusion to anything more recent concerning that island in the brief addition to the chronology of "Spain" about the "revolution in Madrid (sic), headed by Prim, Serrano, and Topete," which is one of the few and entirely exceptional insertions on which the American editor bases his pretence of having brought down the work to the date of publication. The assertion that "the events of the Revolution, of the war of 1812, of the Mexican and of the Indian wars, were incorporated into the work by Mr. Benson J. Lossing," seems to rest on a similarly slender foundation; for parts of the chronology of those wars are disfigured by inaccuracies of which that writer would hardly have made himself guilty.

No portion of the work, however, is more poorly done than the events of the Civil War, of which the American editor assures us that they were compiled "by a separate editor, who had made those events the study of several years," and "carefully arranged and revised." According to article "Battles" (sub-title, "American Civil War"), Fort Sumter was captured "April 14, 1861," not April 13, as correctly stated under "United States." The same article makes the battle of Wilson's Creek a "Confederate defeat," though, under the special head, we read that of the Union commanders Lyon was killed, Sigel was routed, and Sturgis retreated. Under "United States" we read of "severe conflicts at South Mountain Gap, Sept. 14–16," but the special notice on "South Mountain" justly knows only of fighting on "Sept. 14, 1862, three days before the drawn battle at Antietam." The latter is designated "a drawn battle" also under its own head, but under "Battles" we read: "Antietam . . . . Lee defeated by McClellan." "Antietam Creek" contains the correct statements that "on the 16th Lee was joined by Jackson," and that "on the night of the 18th he recrossed the Potomac," but according to "United States" both these events took place "Sept. 17." None of the three articles has an allusion to the opening of the conflict on the 16th. The second battle of Bull Run and the second battle of Corinth (Oct. 1862) are also entered under "Battles" as one day's conflicts. According to the last-named article, the battle of Stone River or Murfreesborough began Dec. 31, 1862, and ended Jan. 3, 1863, but according to "United States" it began on the 29th, and Bragg retreated on the 2d—neither of which statements is correct. "Chancellorsville" correctly speaks of "conflicts on May 2, 3, and 4," but the corresponding date under "Battles" is "May 1–4." The latter article calls the battle of Chancellorsville "indecisive," but declares Lee "defeated" at Gettysburg; "United States" declares Hooker "defeated" at Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg "indecisive." "Battles" adds the 4th of July to the three days of the last-named struggle. According to "United States," "Grant defeats Bragg at Chattanooga Nov. 23–24," while "Chattanooga" and "Battles" more correctly mention the 24th and 25th. "Battles" prolongs Longstreet's siege of Knoxville to so late a date as "Dec. 4, 1863," while "United States" justly makes him retreat on the 1st. According to the latter article, "Lee [and not Early] invades Maryland, . . defeats Wallace, . . threatens Baltimore and Washington, and retreats" in July, 1864. The battle of Five Forks is, under "Battles," twice given, once in its place, and once out of it. This list of blunders is far from embracing all we have discovered in the "special editor's" work.

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

The Atlantic for this month is better worth reading for its book notices than for anything else in it, though more than one of the articles in the body of the magazine are good. For instance, of all that has been written about the California Chinese, there is little that is so instructive and readable as Mr. Sidney Andrews's "Wo Lee, and his Kinsfolk;" and the sketch of the strange life in the Isles of Shoals is, like its predecessors, admirable in many respects. In fact, all things considered, there is not, we should say, any other American female writer who gives at once so much satisfaction, and so little dissatisfaction, as Mrs. Thaxter. Better than negative praise can be given her, for she is always interesting in her matter, and in manner she is superior to most. Perhaps the honesty and the absence of all pretension—barring a controlled tendency to word-painting—which the reader notes in her writing prejudices him in her favor, but it will be found that what she does bears examination. The reviews, however, are remarkably good—especially those of Jarves's "Art Thoughts," "The Holy Grail," Thackeray's "Miscellanies," and Konewka's "Midsummer-Night's Dream." The notice of Mr. Jarves's book is even a thing to be thankful for. Most of the art criticism helps nobody, being either so much mere brutal expression of the writer's feeling at sight of such and such a painting—or such and such a painter's painting—or else being so much mere technical talk, which may or may not be of service to the artist or artisan, but for which the world outside the studios cares nothing, and need care nothing. This writer in the Atlantic seems to be better fitted than almost any other critic in this country to stand as an interpreter between the public and the men who try to talk to it with brush and chisel; and it is to be hoped that he may be regularly heard from. Indeed, it is to be wished, in general, that the critical department of the Atlantic should have more space allowed it, for it is seldom that it is not the most profitable part of the magazine.

Mr. Parton, in his account of the "Pressure upon Congress," is more tolerable and more to be endured than is usual with him; Mr. Shanly's "Street Cries of New York" is padding certainly, but of a good quality; the same thing might be said of "The Value of Accident," if the subject had not such possibilities of vastness and mystery that any easy treatment of it seems impertinence; Mr. Wilson's "Edwin M. Stanton" has interest, if not merit; and "Life in the Brick Moon" and "Father Mériel's Bell" are fairly good magazine stories. The former is at an end, we believe. Mr. Taylor's "Joseph and his Friends" seems to us neither better nor worse than his other novels, none of which, we admit, do we know too well, for none of them have we found readable. The very carefulness with which they are done offends, abstractly praiseworthy as no doubt it is.

Of the Atlantic's verses, those by the best known author are those entitled "Rhyme Slayeth Shame," by Mr. William Morris; but the best are those entitled "Risk," which are by an anonymous author, who need not fear to put her name to her works. The Brownings, both of them, had a hand in giving form to the poem, but, evidently, the poem existed independently of them. "Rhyme Slayeth Shame" is a poem of a sort which it is permitted to our favorite poets to make, but which Mr. Morris would do best for himself, we should think, to indulge in sparingly. "The Way to Sing," by H. H., nobody will quarrel with.

The portion of Charles Reade's story that we get in this month's Galaxy is better as evidence that the best novels cannot be written for monthly magazines than it is as anything else. It would be hard to find a more manifest case of the dyer's hand subdued to what it works in than this descent of talent almost, if not quite, amounting to genius into the region where clap-trap is generally tyrant and always is almost supreme. But though admirers of Mr. Reade will feel regret that the writer of "Peg Woffington" should transform an architect into a stage-carpenter, they will not deny that "Put Yourself in his Place" is a story that commands attention and gives great pleasure. Rose Terry contributes a sketch of a New England tailoress, which is pleasanter by much than most of the New Englandism that gets into contemporary literature. It is straightforward portraiture, and the portrait given is that of an individual. Usually, the Yankee of the books is a patronized creature, put on the canvas for the purpose of showing how inferior the typical Puritan was to his "cultured" descendant. He, therefore, is generally offensive, as being a revelation of pretentious weakness. But for any one who chooses to look at the men and women who surround him in a Yankee community and who has skill to say what he sees, New England is as full of material useful to the portrayer of "characters" and character as ever Scotland was; and how prolific Scotland is in picturesque humanity everybody knows. The Scotch believe in their ancestors, though; and Lowell Institutes, and exhibitions of pictures, and organs of great size might be established in every town of North Britain without setting Scotch writers to patting their forebears on the back and stating that of course they were badly off as regards æsthetics, but still they were estimable people for persons who were ignorant of Williams and Everett. One of Miss Terry's personages, let us not forget to say, remarks that "it takes all kinds of people to make a world, and she's glad she ain't one of 'em."

We continue to praise the "Current French Literature" and "Current German Literature" departments of the Galaxy as containing information of value pleasantly conveyed. Good, too, is the "Drift-wood"—the article on "Byron as Man and Poet" being noticeably clever as an exhibition of "journalistic talent," and as criticism, also, it is sound. To say anything new about the Byron controversy was not an easy thing, but "Philip Quilibet" has contrived to do it acceptably. Has anybody yet noticed, by the way, what a strong family likeness there is between Byron and all of the heroes of Mrs. Stowe's novels? Aaron Burr, as he is conceived of in "The Minister's Wooing;" Ellery Davenport, in "Old Town Folk;" Saint Clair, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," are all Byrons, more or less embryonic, to be sure, but still Byronic in essence. This is something not merely curious, but really worth consideration by any one who cares to discuss exhaustively the remarkable chapter in literary history which Mrs. Stowe has offered us for perusal.

The other miscellaneous departments of the Galaxy will not be much praised. But as yet the series of articles on "Things of To-Day" is only in its beginning, and the probability is that it will gain in freshness and value, "Carl Benson" generally having something to say—more, a good deal, than almost any other writer of equal readiness to speak. Nobody, however, would call these four articles good ones. For the rest of its contents, the Galaxy has another of Mr. Anthony Trollope's wooden "Editor's Tales;" some sensible talk by Mr. Justin McCarthy on Salt Lake City and Brigham Young—which, however, has the irritating "spirit-of-fairness" tone that most of Mr. McCarthy's writing has; the first chapters of a clever story—as we suppose it to be—called "Letters from Havana;" a love story, perhaps by Mrs. Jane Austin, with the title of "The Over-soul of Manse Roseburgh;" and half-a-dozen other pieces in prose and verse. Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, Mr. Henry Abbey, and Miss M. J. Preston are among the poets—Miss Preston showing to great advantage beside the others.

The opening article in Hours at Home is some readable abuse of Sunday-school libraries, written by the Rev. George B. Bacon, who expresses, in his customary lively way, his opinion of the literature which the Sunday-schools give to the children. But the question which he discusses is really involved in another larger one. The libraries in the Sunday-schools are, like the schools themselves, means of inculcating certain dogmas, and as the results produced by schools are good or bad, so are the results which follow upon the reading of the libraries. The distinctively literary influences of the Sunday-school books it can hardly be worth while to estimate. At the last, is it not that we must make our choice not between Sunday-schools with good libraries and Sunday-schools with bad libraries, but between Sunday-schools and no Sunday-schools? Certainly, it would seem to be so in this country; for, whatever Sunday-schools may have been when they were first established, and whatever it is that they ought to be, the fact is that in the United States the Sunday-school is the servitor of the converting church, and is thought to do best when it makes children church members. It is among the Unitarians, then, who may be described as Christians without dogma, and with little of positive Christianity to teach, that we might reasonably expect to find Sunday-school books which secular readers would admit to be good, and that this expectation is answered by the fact, Mr. Bacon plainly says. He gives high praise to the "Ladies' Commission" of the Boston Unitarians, which has selected the libraries used by most of the schools of their denomination. That these ladies deserve at least some praise may be guessed from the fact which he states, that the six hundred titles which appear in their first catalogue represent all that were approved out of nineteen hundred books offered for acceptance.

Other papers in Hours at Home that will be found interesting are Professor Burt Wilder's "Something on Bats;" Dr. Gillette's "Yale," and Professor Porter's discourse on novel-reading. The attack on novels as mere collections of delusive lies was so loud and persistent, and so easily well answered, that the main objection to the habit of reading them gets little attention from anybody nowadays. But, undoubtedly, no novels have been written the reading of which was not, to anybody except writers of novels, mental relaxation, and novels are temptations to play, and consequently, as means of unfitting people for hard work, they no doubt deserve a good deal of the hostility that has been expended upon them.

Harper's has for the most important or most interesting article in its table of contents, Lord Lytton's rhymed comedy of "Walpole." It is as readable for once, and as little readable for more than once, as all of its author's later writings. His earlier and worse works one can read over with willingness and a sort of pleasure, for, at least, they help one to reproduce certain states of youthful opinion and feeling; but the books which resulted from our author's throwing himself on his brains and reading, bear one perusal a great deal better than two. The first books had feeling in them, if nothing else, but the later ones are no more than other books saturated with Bulwer to a greater or less degree, and surely they are none the better for that. Probably there is no writer who has been so widely read whose death would cause so little regret among the people whom he has attempted to benefit and please.

Mr. M. D. Conway's "South Coast Saunterings in England" lead him this month through a part of the Isle of Wight, and what he has to tell is very agreeable reading of the chatty, gossipy kind. Possibly it is some of the old leaven of the fighting, reforming spirit in him which leads Mr. Conway to speak so civilly as he does of John Wilkes. How any one is justified in speaking at any length of the "Essay on Woman"—even had it been the ex-officio works of all the presidents and secretaries of all the existing societies for the abolition of all existing evils—without saying that it is a piece of unadulterated, unredeemed dirtiness, we do not understand.

"Anteros" is by Mr. Lawrence, the author of "Guy Livingstone," and has much of that author's peculiar charms. We do not yet see much of the regular Lawrence hero, but already we have a heroine, who efficiently pleads with us not to attack the author for breach of the implied contract between him and us. She is going to be more indecent, too. And then, the author we have with us always. Every now and then he in "Anteros" takes us aside, and gives us of his worldly wisdom in a way of which we shall never tire. "How otherwise, now, do you suppose that Lady Hernscliffe had contrived to dispose of daughter after daughter, neither richly dowered nor passing fair, not only creditably, but so brilliantly as to move to hatred and malice all save the most charitable of her peers?" How, indeed? The question is one that but few would be equal to answering—or asking either, for that matter. Lawrence, though, can dispose of such problems—one down and another come on—by the hour together; and he does it so satisfyingly, that the greediest schoolgirl who ever pined for slate-pencil and chalk will contentedly wait as long as he chooses for the advent of Guy or Carryl.

The "Editor's Easy Chair," in this month's Harper's, is particularly good. Even the reference to Brook Farm, which Arcadia we are so unfortunate as to despise with a great contempt, does not, we find, hinder our enjoying the fine tribute to the power of Theodore Parker as a speaker which Mr. Curtis pays in his talk about the Boston Music Hall; and the little essay on Jenkins's Ear is very felicitously done. The length of Jenkins's ear, however, is almost precisely the length of the ears of the gentlemen and ladies who make use of him; and to hold them responsible for Jenkins's performances would be a better way of decreasing the great curse of the journalism of the moment than attacking Jenkins himself, who, for one thing, is not so very much to blame, and, for another, would not care a morsel if he were.

Putnam's is, on the whole, uninteresting, though "Sketches in Color" is pleasant; and "The Story of Crazy Martha," translated from the French of Jasmin, the barber-poet, is touching. This magazine seems to need editorial care. Much of what it has is passably good, and there appears to be independence in the management; at all events, many of the writers in it are unknown, and certainly were not admitted on the strength of their names, whether or not it was their merit that admitted them; but altogether Putnam's is dull.

The Catholic World for February will be found worth attention by the reader who takes any interest in the fight of the churches, and also by him who wishes to understand the intentions of the Romanists as regards our political system. This latter reader will need the gift of reading between the lines; for the Catholic World has some skill in preparing the way of its lord, and making his paths straighter than most Americans would think them if seen in the original plot. Still, there is a sufficiently plain assertion of extreme Ultramontanism in more than one of this month's essays, and throughout the magazine there is not only preaching, but preaching to presumed believers, in a creed which it is expressly said is above and beyond reason. Mere human beings will find the essay on "Church Music" instructive and pleasing; and the article about Mr. Ffoulkes's recent letter—in which a famous "pervert" from Anglicanism returns from Rome, and declares the Anglican a better church than the Roman—seems to put Mr. Ffoulkes in the wrong. However, inasmuch as the World—the questions involved being historical ones—is particular to wish for Mr. Ffoulkes "the grace of a genuine conversion," and is anxious that he may make large gains in "humility and obedience," we do not feel assured that there may not be something to be said on Mr. Ffoulkes's side. Meantime, happily, his book has been put upon the Index, and, whether it is wretchedly false or miserably true, nothing more is to be feared from it.

History of Athens County, Ohio, and incidentally of the Ohio Land Company and the First Settlement of the State at Marietta, etc., etc. By Charles M. Walker. (Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1869.)—Most of our readers have probably never heard of the region concerning which Mr. Walker has filled six hundred octavo pages, in a manner deserving hearty acknowledgment, not only from the people whose history he records with so much industry and research, but from less partial critics. Obscure as it is, however, in the transactions of the present day, the county of Athens has played a highly important part in the development of the country. To it belongs the distinction of having been the first white settlement northwest of the Ohio, under the first territorial government, and of having had the first university and the first public library in the same limits. It was, moreover, the scene of the first act of New England emigration, which was to transform the West, though not without altering the East. Its foremost surveyor, Gen. Rufus Putnam, of Massachusetts, suggested the six-mile township which has become the standard of national surveys; and he first recommended setting apart certain portions of townships for the benefit of schools. Dr. Manasseh Cutler, another of the fathers of the infant colony, obtained of Congress, in the Company's contract of purchase, an appropriation of land for the endowment of a university, which was subsequently established. He was a Yale man, and to him the county owes its name. Marietta he had dubbed Adelphia, its public squares Quadranion and Capitolium, its chief road Sacra via, and its fort Campus Martius. But before condemning this misapplied classicism, or concluding that New England is responsible for all that the West has since been saddled with, we should remember that Jefferson signed in 1784 a Congressional Committee report, for dividing the Northwestern Territory into ten States, whose names, "beginning at the northwest, and proceeding southwardly, were to be: Sylvania, Michigania, Chersonasus, Assonisipia, Metropotamia, Illinoia, Saratoga, Washington, Polypotamia, and Pelisipia."

MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY

Judge Ephraim Cutler, son of the divine, set up other landmarks worthy of his father's best. He was a member of the convention which framed the Ohio constitution, and he drafted the clauses relating to the judiciary, had a prominent share in carrying those which instituted a common-school system, and almost single-handed saved the State from slavery by resisting a proposed annulment of the ordinance of '87. Considering what effect this had upon the destiny of the entire West and of the Republic itself, it is difficult, merely upon this score, to estimate the weight which one small farming district has had in national affairs. The county has been far outstripped in productiveness by those for whose cultivation it opened the way; its university, bearing the name of the State, but reduced to four professors, three tutors, and fifty-two students, is behind all the State universities which were born of it; but its imprint on civilization, both west and east of the Alleghanies, remains, and will always remain. It has actually produced no great men, and has bred none so great as the founders. Mr. Stanbery, the late Attorney-General, and the Hon. Lewis Cass made here their professional début; and Thomas Ewing was the first A.B. of the State and of the university. The common stock, nevertheless, recalls its New England origin. Out of a population of but 21,364, the county furnished 2,610 men to the army; yet could send, when Morgan made his raid into Ohio, 1,967 minute-men to oppose him—a remarkable illustration of the power of the North to resist invasion, while sustaining enormous forces in the field.

Mr. Walker has interspersed his narrative of the county and its several townships with many interesting scraps of personal reminiscence, extracts from private journals, and the like, and offers agreeable reading to any one fond of studying character, and ready to contrast our nation's present with its past. The names and dates which occur, the biographies of leading men, and the statistics studiously collected and arranged, will enhance the worth of Mr. Walker's labors from year to year, and be indispensable to the genealogist. We do not know how common town-histories may be in the West, but the county may pride itself on this, even if not the first; and the Ohio Valley Historical Series is certainly well continued by it.

The Gabled House; or, Self-Sacrifice. By the author of "The Climbers," "Paul Fenner," "Purpose," etc. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—This is a badly written story, yet we suppose it could hardly be bettered without making it, in some respects, even worse than it is at present. Taking it from the reader's point of view that is; for, as it stands, if there is not much pleasure to be found in considering the thought of the work, nor its character-drawing, nor yet the way in which its story is told, there is undoubtedly a sort of melancholy amusement to be got from its highly ornamental word-painting, and from its frequent lapses into a semi-rhythmic construction of its sentences, as if the author had put great restraints upon herself in the matter of capital letters, but otherwise had hardly been prevented from blank-verse. Her theory of the essentials required by an author would probably be found to be a neat paraphrase of what she states with respect to those of a teacher: "Scholarship is needful, and should be sought in a teacher," she says; "but affable manners and a firm Christian principle should be the foundation." And if we may judge from reading this one book of an author who has written at least three others, we should say that she thinks that a knowledge of English grammar is needful, and should be sought for by a person proposing to write novels; but that an abundance of party-colored adjectives, and a facility in the construction of sentences without verbs, might after all prove to be her "best holt." But if she wishes to make books which, like the imaginary one written by the heroine of her present story, shall be more commended than blamed by "the critics," and "live after the foam and fermentation have passed away;" or even if that be, as we fear, somewhat too daring an ambition, to write such as shall commend themselves as well by the simplicity of their style as by the excellence of their moral, it would be well for her to revise her present opinions, and give herself to the serious study of better models than those on which she has apparently formed her present style. There is an affectation about it, and that ought to go far towards neutralizing any good sought to be conveyed by means of it.

The Elements of Tachygraphy. Illustrating the first principles of the Art, with their adaptation to the wants of literary, professional, and business men. By David Philip Lindsley. (Boston: Otis Clapp. 1869.)—We have before this spoken favorably of the improvements which Mr. Lindsley has sought to introduce in phonography. In this little book the common style of tachygraphy is explained and illustrated, the briefer styles, intended for the use of verbatim reporters only, being left for future publication. The main advantages claimed for tachygraphy over the systems of short-hand now in use are these: (1) The skilful arrangement of the consonantal signs, by which those sounds which occur most frequently are represented by oblique and horizontal characters, avoiding as far as possible those stiff, perpendicular strokes which delay and tire the hand so much in phonography. (2) In the vowel signs, which are small semi-circles, dashes, dots, and diamond points, written in connection with the consonants, and in their proper order, so that the whole word can be written out without taking the pen from the paper. By this means the writer not only saves time, but, what is perhaps more important, secures far greater legibility than in those systems where the value of the vowel signs depends upon the position in which they are written. (3) The rejection of arbitrary signs and contractions, whose multiplicity has so complicated phonography as to render its acquisition extremely difficult. For the use of clergymen, editors, lawyers, students, and, in fact, all except verbatim reporters, tachygraphy seems to be preferable to the systems of phonography now in use. Those who have learned it have in a very short time attained a speed of from eighty to ninety words a minute—about three times as fast as they would write the common long-hand. Professional reporters, however, need still greater speed, as the average rate of public speaking is about one hundred and twenty words a minute, some speakers occasionally reaching as high as one hundred and eighty. But for this class Munson's "Complete Phonographer," prepared expressly for reporters, has left little to be desired.

Mr. Lindsley indulges the extravagant hope that tachygraphy will soon entirely supersede the common writing of the English speaking peoples; but men have grown old listening to similar anticipations from the phonetic reformers. It would have been better if the pages which are used in the introduction, in expressing a rather lofty conception of the influence which short-hand has exercised upon the progress of Christianity and civilization, had been devoted to still further illustrating and explaining the subject-matter of the book.

A Compendious Manual of Qualitative Chemical Analysis. By Charles W. Eliot, Professor of Analytical Chemistry in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Frank H. Storer, Professor of General and Industrial Chemistry in the same institution. (New York: Van Nostrand. 1869.)—Chemistry is not one of the sciences which most exercises the powers of observation; but qualitative analysis cannot be mastered unless the necessity for a strictly systematic and analytical method in the pursuit of any enquiry is learned at the same time. It is therefore probable that this branch of chemistry is the most useful as part of a general curriculum. In a class somewhat indiscriminately gathered there will naturally be found some who have a decided inaptitude for the subject, but it will not be found beyond the powers of any sound mind, provided the explanations in reference to manipulations are made so minute as to bring the subject to the level of the meanest capacity. This Messrs. Storer and Eliot seem to have succeeded in doing; and consequently their book will probably be found the best for students without a teacher, as well as for all classes which are to pursue a very elementary course. All mention of the spectroscope is omitted. This demonstrates that nothing has been inserted for the mere purpose of making the book sell. But in this instance we should incline to think that the principle of giving the pupil not what he wishes but what he wants had been carried a little too far. It is certainly less against the interests of intellectual life to err upon the side of letting students follow their own bent too much than to err upon the side of too minute control.

A Treatise on the Law of Negligence. By Thomas G. Shearman and Amasa A. Redfield. (New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1869.)—This treatise, as its preface claims, may fairly be considered a pioneer in its peculiar field. Its purpose was single and fixed. It intended to include all the law relating to negligence considered as a wrong, independent of contract, and nothing else, but, like many another pioneer, it found that it must here and there change its direction to include this or that object, which, though not in the direct line aimed at, was still in such close and parallel relation, or heretofore so neglected by other treatises, that it must be examined and reported on.

Here and there, in treatises devoted to master and servant, to bills and notes, to common carriers, a few chapters have been written to show what negligence, in the exercise of the particular acts therein treated of, would entail liability for injuries caused thereby; but these chapters were not complete in themselves, and by no means, even when taken together, mapped out the whole subject, which now Messrs. Shearman and Redfield have given us in this volume of seven hundred pages. The authors, then, have labored with no guide, the digests have been their mine, and the nearly four thousand cases which they have cited show how thoroughly they have worked it and how richly it has yielded.

In their preface, they modestly state that they could have done better if they had had several preceding works upon the same subject as a foundation; but we doubt it. As to certain subjects, such preceding works might be of great value to suggest order and arrangement, and especially would it have saved work in hunting authorities; but with regard to the subject of this treatise such precedents were not necessary, and they have adopted the arrangement which is natural and simple. To define the various degrees of care and negligence was the authors' first work, and this has been well done in the first two chapters on "The General Subject of Negligence" and "The Degrees of Negligence." Then follows a chapter on "Contributory Negligence" and another on "Parties to Action for Negligence."

Their next task was to relate clearly and concisely and accurately what care relieved from liability, and what negligence rendered liable, in certain entirely distinct relations. They have finished their definitions, and the table of contents hereafter shows everywhere the words "liability of," as of masters to servants, of servants to third parties, and so on.

The book is clearly and concisely written, and all the more so because the authors have been obliged to go over the ground for themselves. In the text, we have the law as decided by the courts, with no particular discussion of the cases, but with references to the notes where a discussion of the particular authority is frequently given—which method we consider preferable to that which discusses the cases at length in the text. A very useful and convenient index is added, and no law-book has been printed in better style.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Ante-Nicene Christian Library: Writings of Methodius, Alexander of Lycopolis, Peter of Alexandria, etc.	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)	$3 50
Writings of Cyprian, Vol. II. " " "		3 50
Cox (S. S.), Search for Winter Sunbeams in the Riviera, Corsica, Algiers, and Spain	(D. Appleton & Co.)	3 00
Lenormant (F.) and Chevallier (E.), Students' Manual of Oriental History, Vol. I.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
L'Estrange (Rev. A. G. K.), Life of Mary Russell Mitford, 2 vols.	(Harper & Bros.)
Philpotts (M. C.), The Manor Farm: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Thomas (Annie), Only Herself: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50
The Bible in the Public Schools: Legal Arguments, swd	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)
Trowbridge (Mrs. L.), Excelsior Cook-book	(Oakley, Mason & Co.)
The Army Reunion, Dec. 15-16, 1868	(S. C. Griggs & Co.)

Fine Arts.

THE THOMPSON COLLECTION OF PAINTINGS.

AN immense collection of pictures, of which much has been said and written, in and out of the daily papers, is to be sold in a few days at a Broadway salesroom. This gathering was made during the years 1845 to 1860 by a late citizen of Boston. It seems that the pictures have never been exhibited, nor even hung in any permanent place, private or public, and that, since 1860, they have been stored in Boston, almost wholly out of sight and out of reach. Many stories, not now to our purpose, are in circulation regarding the eccentricities of the collector and the reasons for this seclusion of his pictures.

Now that they are brought to light, offered for public examination and sale, and catalogued, the collection is found to be enormous in size, and exceedingly poor in quality; containing eighteen hundred works or thereabouts, but very few of any peculiar merit. There are, first, thirteen hundred numbers of miscellaneous oil paintings, some very large, of all sorts of mythological, historical, and ideal subjects. After this, and although many portraits appear in the above-named list, comes a new list of portraits only, containing three hundred and thirty numbers. About a hundred and fifty drawings of one kind and another, and a separate lot of studies of the nude, make up this enormous pile of "works of art;" the largest gathering of pictures, we think, that has ever been shown in New York. There are more than twice as many numbers in the catalogue as in the fullest catalogue ever issued by the Academy of Design.

The pictures fill three galleries; and all three have been well filled by the curious who have visited the collection. The sale of catalogues, alone, must have been remunerative.

Pictures "attributed to" great painters may be very poor, in almost every way, while one can see in them, at the same time, some ground, or at least some excuse, for their having been so attributed. Thus, a picture may be a copy by a painstaking pupil, and may show some hints and echoes of the master, while hopelessly inferior in all important qualities. This is a rather favorable case. Such pictures are set down as the work of the master so commonly, that hardly a gallery in Europe has a catalogue above suspicion. If such a picture is uninjured and unrestored, it may have a certain historical value. A worse case is that of the repainted picture, which may be by a pupil or an imitator; or may be even by the master himself, in the first place, but is now the work of no one so much as of the skill-less and remorseless "restorer." Pictures once completely repainted are destroyed—there is no other word for it—and can only be renewed, as if from the dead, by removing carefully every vestige of newly applied paint, and getting back the old work. This, which is a slow and expensive process, can only be resorted to for the purpose of saving pictures of considerable original value. The Thompson Collection contains very many pictures which are thus repainted to their ruin.

There are pictures among those attributed to distinguished painters, long ago dead, which seem to have had merit—which belong to the latter class mentioned above, and have lost whatever claim they may have had to be attributed as they are, since the brush of some irresponsible "restorer" has had its way with them. These pictures may be somewhat striking in treatment of the subject, in disposition of the masses, and the like, while they are otherwise valueless. After these come the herd of pictures, which are either "unknown"—and there are four or five hundred of these—or ascribed to this painter or to that, in reckless fashion, regardless of internal evidence. And in one or other of these two classes, nearly every canvas will find a place. The number of paintings worth any one's attention, even for a moment, is exceedingly small.

One mischief that such exhibitions as this one do is in the prejudice they excite, among those who have little knowledge of the history of painting, against every and all pictures that seem archaic or antiquated in subject, or treatment, or technical qualities. A really fine old picture, even if painted four hundred years ago, on a gold background, by an unknown workman, ought to please every one—has that in it which is capable of giving pleasure to all men—will give pleasure to every one who will give a little pains to the necessary preliminary study of the manner of treatment—the language, so to speak. Ancient styles of painting are to us like bygone states of our English tongue—we must become familiar with these before we can enjoy the poetry or the prose written in them. But such a collection as this one, recommended in advance to the admiration of the public as containing many fine works by old masters, and proving on examination very uninteresting to all beholders and very poor in the opinion of students of art, helps to discourage people from looking further into the matter of old painting.

This is the more to be regretted now that much talk and some preliminary action are going on about a Museum of Art. The difficulty of getting proper attention for the schools of art of the past, not made artificially popular by the imitation of them by modern schools, will be increased by every such discouragement. The first impediment in the way of our Art Museum here is, as we have said in former articles, the ignorance of most people in this country of what a Museum of Art may be and can be. To talk to these people about old pictures, and of the Demidoff sale which begins in February, while the Thompson Collection on exhibition here is also of "old pictures," is to talk in vain, and, more than that, to ensure yourself against being listened to at another time.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1870.

The Week.

On Wednesday week there was reported from the Senate Judiciary Committee a bill amendatory of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, and specially designed for the protection of the Chinese. Though not yet acted upon, we refer to it in order to point out that the prohibition—"No tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any State upon any person emigrating thereto"—would seem to cut off the fund which now sustains our admirable Board of Commissioners of Emigration, and not only sustains them, but is the safeguard and insurance of the emigrants who contribute to it according to law. The point should at least be looked to. On Thursday, the Senate passed the Currency Bill of Mr. Sherman, on which we comment elsewhere, by a vote of 39 to 23. On Friday, the same senator introduced a Funding Bill, which provides for the issue of three series of bonds—ten-twenties, fifteen-thirties, and twenty-forties, at five, four and a half, and four per cent. respectively—to the amount of twelve hundred millions altogether, coupons payable abroad, in London and on the Continent; and after October 1, the national banks must make their deposits of these issues in the National Treasury. The same day, in the House, Mississippi was admitted, and a bill was reported back by Mr. Cullom to make Mormon polygamy a penal offence. The House on Monday voted by 89 to 77, and again, on reconsideration, by 91 to 80, that it was not yet ready to declare the tariff an instrument of revenue simply, and not also of protection.

Mr. Hoar has been finally rejected. Anybody who cherishes the belief that this action was taken from any very lofty motives would do well to look at the vote before putting this impression away as a settled thing. It is, we believe, certain, however, that Mr. Hoar will still remain in the Cabinet—General Grant, at least, being confident of his worth to the country. We trust, too, he will sharpen his tongue—sharp though it be already—and furbish up all his honest prejudices, and give the politicians the benefit of whatever bitterness there may be in him every time they "wait upon him" with "views." The lash of such a man on their sorry hides is what they need of all things, and what the country loves to see. We are informed that it was in contemplation to urge Mr. Durant, of New Orleans, for the judgeship which Mr. Hoar did not get. Mr. Durant is, and was before the war, a leading member of the Louisiana bar, was a staunch Union man during the war, and a man of the highest character, both professional and personal. His appointment would supply what is greatly needed, a Civilian on the Supreme bench. The want of any judge versed in Civil Law is often severely felt in appeals from Louisiana, Texas, and California. The President's nominees are Judge William Strong, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Joseph P. Bradley, of New Jersey, and both are good.

Mr. Sumner, it is said, is making very remarkable discoveries about General Sickles's ability, and as that person's nomination will shortly come up for confirmation, he is preparing himself to back him up through thick and thin. It used to be said that adversity made men acquainted with strange bed-fellows, but in Mr. Sumner's case it seems as if the richer he grew in years and honors, the less particular he grew about the company he kept. He canvassed stoutly in the Senate to secure the appointment of righteous Ashley; he procured the defeat of General Gordon, a brave and honorable soldier, under the inspiration of the worthy Butler; and during the late Virginia debates he seems to have been surrounded and inspired by some very queer fishes. We shall be curious now to see by what arguments he will exalt the distinguished Sickles. Thus far he relies, we are told, on the ability of his despatches. If it makes no difference who writes the despatches of a great nation, we can find Mr. Sumner disreputable persons in this city who will fill Sickles's place for half the money, and indite State papers that will make his hair stand on end with envy—or, if he be not capable of that passion, with admiration. Is it not time to stop treating the war, full as it is of ennobling memories, as a general jail delivery? Is it pleasant to think of posterity asking whether the men of untarnished fame and great ability who bled in it were so scarce that, when it was all over, we had to look among the moral dregs of the army for candidates for the few honors we had to bestow?

The new tariff has been brought to light since our last issue. On reading it, one feels more than ever impressed with the ability, energy, and resources of the American people. If they were not a wonderful people, they could not stand a new tariff every year, for a new tariff means the depreciation of some kinds of property, the appreciation of others, the plunging of all contracts and plans for the future into uncertainty, and a sort of semi-paralysis of business between the first rumors of the impression the lobby is making on the Committee of Ways and Means and the last disagreement between the Senate and House over the matured bill. The embryo of the bill is hatched in the committee, under the superintendence of persons who ought never to get access to it except when summoned as witnesses—that is, the representatives of the various "interests" which the tariff is likely to affect. In fact, a new tariff once a year is an instrument of speculation, just like a gold combination. When a man has a large stock on hand that does not go off easily, or has had a bad year in business, there is no so ready way of recovering himself as going to Washington, or teasing the Committee into raising the duty on the article he produces. This peculiarity of all protectionist tariffs has made them in every country one of the disgraces of civilization. Free trade, whatever faults it may have, offers absolutely no field to jobbers.

There are some humorous features in the tariff, as proposed, which show that some members of the Committee are wags in their way. The duty on anthracite coal is completely taken off, and the country would now be flooded with foreign anthracite if there was any in existence. The market has also been thrown open to foreign flour—consumers will be delighted to hear—and the duty on tea and coffee is reduced from twenty-five to twenty cents on the one, and from five to four cents on the other; but the duty on refined sugar is raised for the benefit of the refiners (last year the duty on copper ore was raised, to the ruin of the native smelters, whose position was almost exactly analogous, showing the utter absence of principle in the matter). The duties on women's and children's clothing are nearly doubled. The duty on pig-iron goes down from nine to seven dollars, and that on brandy from three to two dollars a gallon, and on cigars from three dollars a pound and fifty per cent. ad valorem, to two dollars a pound and twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, which will undoubtedly increase the revenue from this source. These are the most important changes, but there is little use in discussing them now at much length, as the report of the Committee is generally but a slight indication of the shape in which the bill will pass.

The Supreme Court has at last pronounced judgment in the legal tender case, the Chief-Justice rendering an opinion for himself and the majority of the Court, confirming the decision of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, that the Legal Tender Act was unconstitutional, in so far as it applied to contracts in existence at the time of its passage and made payment in greenbacks a valid satisfaction of debts, of which the parties to the contract, at the time of making it, plainly contemplated the payment in coin. The result was foreshadowed more than a year ago in the Nation, and though it called forth angry denunciation from some of our contemporaries at the time, they seem to have gradually reconciled themselves to the idea, and are now taking it quite calmly. Nevertheless, it is not so unimportant as it may seem at first sight. Even supposing that persons who have accepted payment in depreciated greenbacks of debts contracted in gold before the war are now debarred from questioning the sufficiency of such payment, it is certain that railroad companies and States which have got into the bad habit of paying in paper the interest on their bonds made before the war, will now have to come back to the ancient ways. Some other interesting points are suggested by the decision which we have not time to discuss now. There is little question, whatever be the objections to the decision on general grounds, that it will accelerate the return of specie payments, and give a useful fillip to the moral sense of the country, and especially of the knavish portion of the public.

The Chief-Justice holds, for the majority of the Court, that, although it is quite certain that Congress intended the Legal Tender Act to be applicable to the satisfaction of debts contracted before their issue, nevertheless it was unconstitutional in so far as regarded such debts, because the power to make anything but coin a legal tender is a different power from that expressly granted by the Constitution, to "coin money," etc., and is not in any reasonable or satisfactory sense necessary to the exercise of that power. The power to issue bills, in short, is one thing; the power to make them a legal tender, another; and the latter is not necessary to the proper exercise of the control of Congress over the currency. But is it necessary to the proper exercise of the war-power, or incidental to it? The Chief-Justice holds not; that, though Congress has a certain latitude in the choice of the means necessary to the performance of its constitutional duties, it must choose amongst means "appropriate, plainly adapted, and really calculated," and no others; and whether any particular means employed answer to this description, the Supreme Court, he holds, must judge. As to the legal tenders, they were not in the prescribed category, as the war might have been carried on without them, though, perhaps, at greater cost and inconvenience. This is, undoubtedly, the weakest point in the judgment, and the one which will excite most dissatisfaction. The other objections to the act are, that it is opposed to the general principles of justice on which the Government is based, and the firm establishment of which was the great object of its foundation; and that the sacredness of contracts occupied one of the highest places in the minds of the founders, he infers from the insertion in the famous ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, of a solemn and perpetual prohibition "of the passage of any law in that territory which should in any manner interfere with or affect private contracts or engagements bonâ fide and without fraud previously formed." He holds, moreover, that the act, in touching contracts in existence, took away private property out due process of law, and this not incidentally and contingently, as when a corporation, by undertaking new works or liabilities, lowers the value of its stock in the markets, but "directly and inevitably;" and that it was as plainly conducive to fraud as if it had authorized a man who had agreed to convey an acre of land to convey only two-thirds of an acre.

Judge Miller, for himself and Judges Swayne and Davis, dissenting, held that the Constitution, in prohibiting the States from making anything but coin a legal tender in payment of debts, and not prohibiting Congress, left it by implication in the power of Congress to make securities of the United States a lawful tender in the payment of debts, if necessary to the proper exercise of its other powers; that this view is strengthened if not confirmed by the fact that Congress has been expressly empowered to abrogate contracts in passing bankruptcy laws, and by the decision of the Court on the power of Congress to charter the United States Bank; that the power of the legislature in the choice of means must be construed in a large and liberal way; in other words, it must be "left free to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to adapt itself to circumstances;" that the improvements in the science of war, the magnitude of the forces engaged and of the interests involved in the late struggle, made it expensive beyond example, and its conduct by the aid of ordinary financial expedients impossible; that, when the legal tenders were issued, the credit of the Government was exhausted; that its paper would speedily have become worthless, if not endowed with the property of discharging existing debts; and that the issue of the legal tenders was therefore a necessary and proper means of exercising the war power; that it was no doubt an interference with the obligation of contracts, but so is the bankrupt act; that no doubt it involved a lowering of the value of property without direct compensation to the owners, but so do many other great public measures, such as a change in the tariff or a declaration of war, for both of which nobody doubts the competency of Congress. Finally, he declared that the effect of the decision of the Court, in lowering the value of debts contracted in greenbacks, and undoubtedly payable in greenbacks, would be as mischievous in its effects on the business of the community, as the original passage of the Legal Tender Act.

The strong point of Judge Miller's argument is, as might be expected, what is the Chief-Justice's weakest — the impropriety of taking from Congress and committing to a court of justice a task so plainly legislative in its nature as the decision what means are and what are not necessary and proper to the performance of a duty so complex, so delicate, and so full of unforeseen contingencies and puzzling situations as the government of a great nation, during a great war, even within the limited sphere prescribed by our written Constitution. To bring fairly into play all the tremendous moral and physical forces which lie sleeping under the peaceful exterior of a modern commercial community, is a work of increasing difficulty, in which no statesman of our time can be said to be skilled; and to take out of the statesman's hands all power of trying experiments, and leave to judges the power of tracing the limits within which he ought to act, might, undoubtedly, paralyze the state at a most critical moment. And yet, if the interpretation of a written constitution is not committed to judges, what is the use of it? If the majority can do whatever they choose to declare constitutional, what better is it than the revocable charters which absolute sovereigns in Europe amused themselves by granting for some years after 1815? The question seems, like so many other questions of government, to be one of those insoluble problems which wise nations shirk, and on which the foolish ones break themselves to pieces.

The week's news from the South is of more interest than usual, there being a good deal of strictly party activity, and there being, also, in more than one Southern State, some political movement of a kind not strictly partisan, and very well worth watching. Those economizing people, whom Mr. Dawes so happily characterized the other day as economists who went about seeking for a dollar that hadn't any cents in it on which to make savings, and neglecting the dollar with a hundred important pennies, have, for five or six years past, had numerous counterparts in the world of politics; and under the great principle of "soundness on the main question," we have made strenuous attempts to take bad and stupid men and make stable, honest communities and political organizations out of them. Perhaps we could do no better; but, at least, we can remember this, that all our action in this reconstruction business has been abnormal—a necessary evil—and is not to be made the rule. We need not begin to cry, with the "advanced thinkers," "manhood suffrage," and disregard education and character because, as fate would have it, we were at a certain juncture compelled to use the ignorant black and the adventuring white as the materials for making States. In Louisiana, things are as bad as they can be. The Legislature is notoriously corrupt. The State Auditor, the Governor says in a published speech, has robbed the treasury of half a million; one of the judges is to be tried for incompetency and for illegal decisions; the Governor admits that he has, on several occasions, been approached by persons who proposed that he should sell his official signature, and he adds that one of these persons was the Mayor of New Orleans. We do not discover, we may remark, that the Governor has instituted proceedings against these gentlemen. Matters have come to such a pass that a mass-meeting has been held in New Orleans to protest against legislative rascality.

In Georgia, Captain J. E. Bryant has been beaten by Bullock—who has had the advantage of having behind him, in the person of General Terry, not only a soldier but a lawyer—and Bryant has transferred himself to Washington, where he is going to fight against the admission of the State; and it would not be wonderful if he should have some success. Meantime, he writes to somebody in Boston to "assure our Republican friends that I shall remain true to the teachings of my boyhood;" and he adds, "My object is to save the Republican party of Georgia from ruin." As we have said before, in substance, what the teachings of Mr. Bryant's boyhood were is a matter doubtless of importance to himself, but it is not of importance to the country at large, unless his teachings are going to help him to induce Congressmen to keep Georgia in her present condition. We hope the House may choose to listen to General Terry, who is neither uneducated, unintelligent, nor untrustworthy. The State Legislature has ratified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments; proposes to elect senators, and will doubtless provide for a new delegation of representatives. The trifling inconsistency of declaring that the present representatives from Georgia have never really been members of the Congress they have been voting in will not trouble the logical minds of the majority. It has not been troubled by any of the possible inferences from its doctrine that the old Georgia Legislature was not a legislature at all after it had decided some of its own members ineligible. People married, divorced, inheriting, working, owing, paying, doing anything, under enactments made by this imaginary body, must look out for their own peace of mind.

In South Carolina, as we mentioned last week, a negro, a Pennsylvanian by birth, goes into the Supreme Court of the State as Associate Judge. We do not see it denied that he is a man of some ability, and we hear nothing against his character. Nor, on the other hand, do we see it seriously claimed for him that he has the requisite knowledge of law, or that his abilities are sufficient for his place. A noticeable thing is that Democrats elected him. But this has been too much insisted on, the fact being that the only other candidate, with any chance of success was also a negro—and not so good a one as some others, either, unless he has enemies of extraordinary unscrupulousness.

Florida, ever since it was fastened upon by the little swarm of greedy politicians who are always engaged in unseemly wrangling, has afforded almost the worst imaginable spectacle that could afflict the eyes of anybody who wants the Southern wing of the Republican party to be respectable. Mr. Harrison Reed, the Governor, is a Northwestern politician of no weight at home, whom Judge Chase—we think it was—sent out to the old Department of the South as a commissioner to sell confiscated lands. The lands were sold, and the commissioner stayed and went into politics, which, in Florida in that time, consisted in being loyal to the Republican party, "manipulating" a handful of negro voters, and giving just as small a share of spoils as possible to Mr. Billings, Mr. Gleason, Mr. Potter, Mr. Dickey, and the other gentlemen who also were being loyal, in that region, to the Republican party, and were "manipulating" certain numbers of negro voters. So we have had attempts at revolutionizing the State Government; many public charges that the Governor had misappropriated the State money and sold offices; counter-charges of the Lieutenant-Governor's corruption; a former effort to impeach Reed, and now, again, news comes of another. It will be a good day for Florida when the driftwood that the war washed thither shall leave her for good.

The Fifteenth Amendment—which provides that "the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and that "Congress shall have power to enforce this prohibition by appropriate legislation"—has received the ratification of the requisite number of States, and its adoption will, doubtless, shortly be proclaimed. We have given elsewhere some reasons for considering the theory that any State can recall its ratification before the proclamation of adoption to be without foundation. The reconstruction process may now be considered closed for all practical purposes, all excuses for inserting fresh "conditions" in the Constitutions of the two States still remaining "out in the cold" being removed. Moreover, the agitation against slavery has reached an appropriate and triumphant conclusion, and the negro, from being the subject of the strangest struggle in the history of civilization, sinks into the rank of an ordinary and somewhat heavily weighted wayfarer on the dusty and rugged highway of competition. We can understand a thoughtful Southerner feeling awe-stricken as he looks at what has come to pass. The very feelings which he most carefully fostered, and made his boast and glory, have been converted into instruments of torture, under which he daily writhes. His pride of race, for instance, makes black equality tenfold the humiliation it would be to any other men. His contempt for the North, which he taught his children in their cradle, has made his subjugation bitter beyond the bitterness of any other recorded conquest. Every reproach he has ever heaped on the Yankee has given the Yankee sword a keener point, and the Yankee order-book a deadlier sting. Even his hostility to "isms" has given the people who love "isms," and live by them, an influence and weight in politics and society which, but for his hatred, they would never have had. He has the consolation of knowing that free love, communism, rationalism, woman's rights, "agrarianism," free schools, and everything else of the kind that he most hated, owe a great deal of whatever success they have achieved to his dislike of them. We class them together, simply because this was a way he had himself. Now that it is all over, and he sees the negro on the bench (and the South Carolina bench, too) and in the Senate Chamber, he may sit down with the comfortable reflection that, considered from his own point of view, he has shown himself the greatest blunderer of the modern world. He ought to have the Fifteenth Amendment engraved on his tomb. No other epitaph would do him justice.

We commented last week on the singularity of the New York Tribune's suggesting the execution of murderers before the burial of their victims, beginning with the murderer of Townsend, as a good mode of striking terror, seeing that this paper is one of the most energetic opponents of capital punishment. A correspondent, writing to it on the 5th inst., expressed some of the surprise which we too felt, and received for answer that "it called for the extreme penalty of their acts," and "should consistently express the same hope when capital punishment had gone the way of other barbarisms." Now, the only substitute for capital punishment, in murder cases, we have ever heard of in late days is imprisonment for life or for a long term. The question, therefore, arises, In what way would the Tribune inflict on a murderer "the extreme penalty of his act" (supposing capital punishment abolished) "before the burial of his victim"? There is only one way that would not render the punishment a mere farce, and that is, embalming and preserving the body of the victim above ground till the criminal himself died, or was pardoned, or had got his due. We need, however, hardly call the Tribune's attention to the objections to this plan on the score of decency, and public health, and expense. If our lucid contemporary ever seriously entertained it, however, it speedily abandoned it, for five days after it had called for summary execution without trial, it came out as strongly as ever against all hanging, and called the persons who advocated any hanging at all, a "frantic chorus," "alarmed and excited thousands," and other bad names, and began to display the old inflammatory symptoms which the discussion of the gallows invariably produces on its brain. A good many of its trusting subscribers must be by this time in a nice clear state of mind on the subject of repressing crime.

The only foreign news of importance is the news from France, which, but for the singular good sense which the Ministry continues to display, would have been serious news. The arrest of Rochefort led to a riot, with the usual Parisian accompaniment of barricades; but the police alone seem to have been used for its suppression, troops being present in force, but, if used at all, only used to make a moral impression on the mob. The latter characteristically enough was led by M. Gustave Flourens, an excitable young man, who served in the Cretan revolt as a volunteer, and, after his return, fought a duel with Paul de Cassagnac, whom he dragged from a sick-bed by jeering imputations on his courage, but who, in return, ran him through the body, and left him at death's door. The Government owes much of its strength, doubtless, to the paltry character of the leader of the Reds, the community not being quite ready for a provisional government composed of the Rocheforts and Flourens; and it appears to us hardly doubtful that the prosecution of Rochefort is a mistake. But, under all the circumstances, Ollivier is doing better than any of his predecessors has ever done.

MR. DAWES—PRESIDENT GRANT—GENERAL BUTLER.

Some remarks of ours, in the number of January 27, where Mr. Dawes's attack on the Administration was incidentally mentioned as an example of the old passion which Congressmen feel for nagging the executive, have seemed to run counter to the popular current, as indicated by the press, and have caused some unfavorable comment. It would be pleasanter not to touch the subject again, since Mr. Dawes is a person whom every one esteems and would like to follow. But, unluckily, the question is of vital importance. It involves the future fate and usefulness of the Administration; it involves, what is more, a point of simple justice. As the matter stands, the public has a right to the truth, whatever it may be; and, if we were wrong in our point of view, we are bound to confess the mistake. But we think we were not wrong, and that we did not speak without due knowledge and caution.

There is no healthier or more encouraging symptom in politics than when honest public men denounce party corruption or extravagance. For any and all such rebellions we have always felt a sympathetic weakness, even when the rebellious leaders were less wise than one might have wished. But it is one thing to support a tendency which in the main is excellent, and quite another thing to allow one's self to be drawn into every attack upon everything, without a clear understanding of what one is aiming at. The reason why we for once are obliged to decline Mr. Dawes's lead is simple enough. Mr. Dawes stated his reasons for attacking the Administration, and his reasons were based on a mistake in figures. The whole case rested on a single question of fact: was Mr. Dawes right or wrong in asserting that last year's estimates were $303,000,000, and that this year's estimates are $331,000,000? He was certainly wrong. The corresponding estimates of this year are $291,000,000. As the premise was incorrect, all the conclusions drawn from it were more or less affected by the error. We have no intention of showing how exaggeration or misunderstanding swelled the list of errors. To bore others as we ourselves have been bored by these disputed accounts, would be unkind to our conscientious readers, and little profitable to any one. We hope it will be enough if we state the result of many hours employed in the peculiarly tedious occupation of reading or hearing both sides of the controversy, a result which, in very few words, may be given as a conviction that Mr. Dawes for once was misled; that the Administration has not been extravagant at all to the extent he alleged; that it has not even proposed the extravagances he alleged; that it seems, on the whole, to be very nearly what the public expected—honest, economical, and fairly efficient; and that though, as our readers are aware, the President's ideas on many great subjects have neither been large nor liberal enough to suit us, yet, so far as candle-ends are concerned, these seem to have been collected with reasonable care and safely laid aside.

There were, however, two elements in the attack made by Mr. Dawes. Even if the figures he read had been more correct than they were, the temper in which Mr. Dawes spoke would still have justified the comment of the Nation. Speakers are so often—one might almost say, so regularly—led on by their topic or their audience to say more than they actually meant to say at the outset, that a wide latitude is usually allowed them, and in this instance Mr. Dawes has repeatedly denied any intention of treating the President with disrespect. This is probably the most curious evidence yet given of the Congressional mania for worrying the executive. Mr. Dawes did not mean to treat General Grant with disrespect, and yet his tone was to the last degree contemptuous and patronizing, both towards the President and towards his Cabinet. Is it possible that a President should not feel personally hurt when his friend, the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, tells the country that no aid is to be expected from the executive in the direction of economy; that two members of the Cabinet talk absurdities, and another seems to be a bit of a knave? Even "the poor, unpopular Attorney-General" may not be quite so poor or so unpopular as to enjoy such contemptuous patronage as was offered him by Mr. Dawes. To dissemble one's love is proper enough, but members of Congress should learn also to dissemble a little their kicks. The President, with all his regard for Mr. Dawes, may think it hard that Congress should not only steal and appropriate the credit of all his efforts at economy and honesty of administration, but should openly call him a fool into the bargain. Whether the President and his Cabinet are so incompetent as Congress seems to think, is a point we will not now discuss. Like Horace Walpole, we wonder whether, after all, there may not be a vast deal of cleverness in getting along at all without brains. But, whatever may be the capacity of the present executive officers, it is quite certain that the House of Representatives is not so overstocked with genius as to be able to look down from any lofty height upon them.

As the matter thus stood, there were two points involved: one a question of fact and figures, the other a question of confidence in the Administration. But, as ill-luck would have it, a third issue was destined to be raised: General Butler, having an old grudge against his colleague and a peculiar genius for gratifying his love for revenge, saw an occasion for his interference. There were other members, even in the Massachusetts delegation—members among the most honest and true in the whole House—who would have gladly defended the President and his Cabinet, but, as usual, they were too slow, and Mr. Butler, who has the eye of a vulture for a victim, lighted upon his colleague with a scream of gratified revenge, and proceeded to tear and rend him as a carrion-bird would do. Fortunately or unfortunately, as the spectator happens to think, there is one thing more formidable than General Butler's enmity, and this is his friendship. The Administration, knocked down as it had been by an unexpected blow from its friend Mr. Dawes, was dragged through the mire by General Butler, and it was obliged to accept this worst wrong of all in silence. Against Mr. Dawes the President had some chance of obtaining redress, if only from his own sense of justice, but against the touch of General Butler there was no means of protection whatever. Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts, in a very sensible speech easily showed where Mr. Dawes had been unjust to the Administration, but he could not wipe away the marks left on it by General Butler's embrace. Even the public, which might have doubted so long as the question of personal weight lay between Mr. Dawes and General Grant, would not hesitate a moment when it saw Mr. Dawes threatened by the beak and claw of General Butler. In place of a very simple question of fact which involved the entire confidence of the country in President Grant, was substituted a still simpler issue of personal respect for Mr. Dawes as against his colleague. In sustaining Mr. Dawes on the latter point, it ought, however, to be understood that no one is obliged to join in undeserved censure on the President. All that is beyond doubt is the fact that the machinery of government works clumsily when no responsibility, or subordination, or harmonious action can be enforced between executive and legislature.

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—REVOCATION OF RATIFICATIONS.

The action of two States in relation to the Fourteenth Amendment, and the action of one or more in regard to the Fifteenth, present the very important question: Can a State withdraw or repeal a ratification, once duly made, of any pending amendment of the National Constitution? For the following reasons, it is believed and submitted that it cannot. The Constitution of the United States, in providing for its own amendment, declares that, when a proposed amendment is ratified by three-fourths of the States, it shall be a part of the Constitution. In ascertaining the fact of ratification by three-fourths, only ratifications are at all noticed; States that remain silent remain unnoticed; and States that reject are not counted as adverse, for rejection is no more than non-action. Neither is an attempted repeal or withdrawal of a ratification any more than rejection, and therefore is no more than silence.

If States may withdraw their ratifications, once ordained, when may they do it? If before proclamation of full ratification, made by the Secretary of State, as provided by law, why not afterwards? Is it the Secretary's proclamation that binds the State, or is it the action of the State itself? And if it is the action of the State, can it bind and loose itself at pleasure? Does not the proposition resolve itself into, and rest upon, the same theory and reasoning by which secession was sustained? The seceding States simply repealed and rescinded their acts of ratification of the original Constitution, ranging from 1787 to 1789. The Constitution does not say, "Whenever there may be valid, subsisting, and continuing ratifications, by three-fourths of the States at the date of proclamation," but simply, "When ratified by three-fourths;" that is, when three-fourths have ratified; that is, acted in the affirmative.

The original instrument provided that, when nine States had ratified, it should be valid and binding between the States so ratifying. It is well known that the question of a conditional ratification was raised, and decided in the negative. It was suggested by Mr. Madison, in relation to Virginia; thoroughly considered by Mr. Hamilton, and finally rejected or abandoned by all parties. If an original ratification could not have been conditional, could it have been repealed or withdrawn? The power to repeal is a power, a condition, reserved, and, if such a course was not competent in relation to the original, neither is it in relation to any subsequent amendment.

It is said to be an engagement which the State may enter into or not, at its pleasure. So may a man promise or guarantee a debt or not, as he pleases; but having done so, he cannot withdraw the promise or revoke the obligation at his pleasure. But it is said there is no engagement, no enactment, no amendment, or additional article of constitutional law, until a certain number have acted; that until then it is a mere pending proposition, and prior to that time any State may act as it will. But who is appointed to determine when a sufficient number have acted? And who decides upon the sufficiency of given ratifications? Evidently not the State governments or officials. The analogies to be drawn from partnerships, contracts, and commercial paper, some of which might be in favor of the power claimed, and some against it, may be dismissed with the observation that this is not a legal question of that sort. It is partly a question of constitutional law, and partly a question of paramount political law—the rules that must guide the sovereign power of the people in the exercise of the faculty of constitutional, as distinguished from statutory, legislation.

The power claimed would be unjust, impracticable, and dangerous. Unjust, because certain of the States may well and reasonably be influenced in such a political question by the previous action of other States, owing to the interests affected. Yet a State having been thus influenced, and acting on such faith, finds the very States which had thus given the influence of their ratification withdrawing at the last moment. It is impracticable, because it does not at all comport with the nature of the transaction. It is dangerous, because it might involve the whole country in frightful uncertainty and strife. Suppose exactly the required number of ratifications have reached the State Department, and then proclamation is made of full ratification; but before it is made, some of the States had withdrawn their ordinances of ratification, the proclamation not having reached them before withdrawal, nor the withdrawals having reached the Department before proclamation made—does, or does not, the amendment go into effect? Such a question might well lead to civil war.

May a State which has rejected afterwards ratify? Certainly it may, though some opponents of recent amendments have said not. It may, because its previous rejection was legally no more than silence and non-action; but if rejection may be followed by adoption, why may not adoption be followed by rejection? Because rejection, or non-action, which is the same thing, is a negative voice, not provided for in the process of constitutional amendment; a negative, of which no notice is taken in the Constitution, or by the political department of the government, in ascertaining the fact of ratification. Only affirmations are empowered and provided for, and only affirmations are counted. Such an amendment may be pending for years. A State which has rejected or not acted may undergo a change of public opinion, and then ratify. A State which has solemnly ratified may also undergo a similar change of public opinion, and then attempt to reject. But its ratification had already become not a mere statutory enactment, but a vital political fact; a fact officially noted; an additional letter stamped on a new leaf or page; a fact that vitally attaches to the amendment and clings to it until it is ascertained if three-fourths ratify—if enough new letters have been stamped to spell the proposed amendment. It is a fact that gives a vested political and constitutional interest to the nation at large, and to every other State which has either ratified or concerns itself to consider the matter.

The advocates of the right or power of withdrawal and repeal generally belong to the League, Treaty, Power of Attorney, State Sovereignty, and Voluntary Compact school of lawyers and statesmen. Viewing it in this light, when a treaty is pending between two or more sovereign powers, can one of them, which has ratified, withdraw its ratification, within the term prescribed for exchange of ratifications, before the other has acted, any more than it can after the other has ratified, without provision in the treaty to that effect? In the case of the amendment there is no term prescribed. The term is WHEN, and therefore the ratification is a continuing and subsisting obligation until the result is finally ascertained and announced.

The right is placed upon the ground that whatever the Legislature, the Convention, or the people of a State can do, the same power can undo or repeal. Ordinarily this is true. But there are cases in which the rule does not apply, outside the domain of mere brute force, or the forces of revolution. A State may contract a debt or vest an interest, but cannot at pleasure revoke or impair the obligation, or divest the interest or estate vested. But we still see that, however clearly a State may repeal any law which it can enact, acting in the exercise of original and underived political power, yet the rule does not apply to the execution of a specific power conferred. In ratifying, the States do not act or initiate upon their own motion. A clause or amendment would not become a part of the Constitution when only proposed, put forward, ordained, and ratified as such by the States of original motion. It must go through the forms prescribed by the national Constitution: proposal and submission by Congress, or the call of a Convention on the demand of a sufficient number of States. Then the power of the States to ratify is not exercised in any right of free and original sovereignty. The power, as well as the form and manner of proceeding, is distinctly derived from the national Constitution and from that only. In this respect it is an enabling act to Congress and the States. What is the power thus conferred? Specific. Congress may propose; and the States may ratify, but they cannot rescind, because the power is not conferred. But, it may be said, the power to do a thing, where it is left at discretion and is not a command, implies the power not to do it or to refuse to do it. Certainly; but not to annul it after it has been done. If Congress enable a Territorial Legislature to call a convention to form a State Constitution, can the Legislature first call the Convention, then repeal the law and disperse the Convention? Can a State Legislature, acting under its own Constitution, call a Constitutional Convention, and in the midst of its proceedings, or even after it has submitted its work to the people, repeal the law and wholly defeat the work of the Convention? No. Because the only power conferred is to call together a convention after a prescribed mode. This done, the power is exhausted in the execution. There is no power to repeal, and the sovereignty of the people attaches to and moves with the Convention, either unconditionally or subject to a popular vote. So is the power over ratification of an amendment exhausted in the act of ratification; and so does the sovereignty, or the voice and the will of that section of the whole people, attach and continuously adhere to the ratification.

If a State can withdraw its ratification, who is to ascertain the fact of withdrawal or determine the disputed right? The several States? Then we go straight back to 1798–9, 1832–3, and 1860–1. Shall the President and Secretary determine? Suppose they differ with Congress, which has proposed. Shall Congress determine? Suppose they differ with the Executive Department, which has proclaimed or refused to proclaim. Shall the Courts determine? They must take judicial notice of what is the form of the Constitution, as ascertained by the political department of the Government, interpreting the instrument as cases come before them. But can they go behind the official proclamation, and enquire into the truth, legality, or sufficiency of the facts stated, upon which full ratification has been proclaimed? And if so, must they take judicial notice of withdrawals, or have proof of the facts? Are we to have the spectacle of courts swearing and listening to witnesses, reading formally attested certificates of legislative proceedings, and quoting State statutes to prove that a given clause is no part of the Constitution of the United States? An amendment may readily be such as most materially to affect our foreign relations, and the rights of other governments; as in the treaty-making power, in acquiring or disposing of domain, regulating commerce, etc. Foreign governments may very properly consult usage, commentators, and judicial exposition to arrive at the construction and meaning of the Constitution, but they can only look to the political department of the national Government for an authoritative expression or statement of the form and language of the instrument.

Is there, then, no way by which a State can avoid the force of its ratification once given? If the required number of States do not ratify, nothing is accomplished, and there is no need of repeal. If they do, the amendment can be vacated just as it was adopted, by another amendment, proposed and adopted in the same way. If there is any other regular mode, we are unable to discover it.

We have omitted from this discussion the resolution of Congress declaring such withdrawals incompetent; deeming that to be doubtful, if not dangerous, ground to occupy. Congress can do in this matter precisely what they are empowered by the Constitution to do—that is, formulate, propose, and submit the amendment. If Congress can go further and prohibit States from withdrawing, could they not, on the other hand, permit States to withdraw?

THE CURRENCY BILL AND THE THREE PER CENT. CERTIFICATES.

The Senate of the United States has provided a financial scheme consisting, in reality, of four different measures, the first of which would be wise and proper, if any means were ever so remotely suggested for carrying it into execution; the second of which would not be objectionable, if it were capable of contributing the smallest possible aid towards accomplishing the object for which it is designed; while the third is an incoherent attempt to crowd the essential measure of specie-payment resumption into a few lines; and the fourth is simply a piece of pandering to ignorance and sectional prejudice. In order to show that the foregoing characterization of the most important financial measure of the session is not too severe, we propose to examine some of its features in detail.

The first measure proposed is the withdrawal of the three per cent. certificates, a measure which, for non-professional readers, may require some explanation. One of the means of raising money, adopted during the war pressure, was the issue of a large amount of what were called compound-interest notes, or legal-tender greenbacks bearing interest. When, a year or two after the peace, these compound-interest notes were, with many other similar make-shift contrivances, gradually redeemed by the Treasury or funded into long bonds, it was found that a large amount of them were in the hands of the national banks, as part of the amount which the law compels them to hold as a greenback reserve. It was the time when Mr. McCulloch's contraction policy was exciting much opposition, and was thought to endanger the position of the national banks and of the whole business interests of the country. The withdrawal of these compound-interest notes was contraction of the worst kind, and yet was necessary for the healthy reorganization of the finances. In order to counteract this contraction, it was decided, in the summer of 1867, to allow the Secretary to issue, for the use of the national banks only, certain certificates bearing three per cent. interest, and hence called three per cent. certificates, which the banks might hold instead of the compound-interest notes, as part of their reserve. These certificates, in reality, simply represent money borrowed by the Government of the banks, on call, that is, money that the Treasury might be called upon to repay at a moment's notice. The amount of these certificates, at one time much larger, has, by various changes, been reduced to forty-five millions. But even this amount is altogether too large for any prudent Government to owe, subject to sudden call, especially as the Treasury has not, for a long time past, had even one-fourth part of this amount on hand, in currency, to meet a sudden call for its repayment. It is, therefore, evidently desirable and necessary that so dangerous an element should be promptly eliminated from our financial position. It is very true that this grave danger seems, for the moment, remote, and that by prudent management it may even be averted for a sufficient length of time to enable the Treasury to meet it successfully, or to evade it entirely. But it is also true that the danger might, at almost any moment, be precipitated upon us by events entirely beyond our control, and that the Treasury would then find itself in a position where its only escape from bankruptcy would be found in a forced and disastrous expansion of the currency. It is this danger that the new Currency Bill was designed to remove, and it is on this account that it was everywhere hailed with the utmost satisfaction. What, then, must be the surprise of all thinking men to find that, instead of removing the threatened complication, the bill actually proposes to precipitate it upon us, unnecessarily, suddenly, forcibly, and without remedy or escape?

The main features of the bill are ostensibly based upon the urgent necessity of providing circulating notes, or currency, for those States and Territories which have less than they are supposed to be entitled to. The whole discussion of the bill hinged upon the urgent need in the Southern and South-western and North-western States of more currency and banking facilities to transact the growing business of that section. Pathetic pictures were drawn by senators of the ruin inflicted upon their constituents by the enforced absence of banks and currency, and the consequent scarcity of money accommodation. It is one of the principal objects of the bill to furnish these banks and this currency. Its most important section, that from which it derives its name, provides that, by complying with certain simple and equitable conditions, persons in those States and Territories may at once establish new national banks, and issue fresh national bank currency, to the full extent of forty-five millions of dollars and more. Now, it must be evident to every one that, if the need of these States and Territories be as urgent as represented, they will rush with breathless haste to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the bill, and will at once issue every dollar of the forty-five millions that the law allows. Suppose they do, what then?

Section 2 of this well-digested bill provides that, as soon as these new banks issue any part of their new currency, the Secretary of the Treasury shall at once pay off an equal amount of the outstanding three per cent. certificates; that is to say, he shall, in addition to his ordinary monthly expenses, provide the means of suddenly paying off ten, twenty, thirty, or forty millions of the national debt. Of course, the bill tells him clearly and distinctly how to obtain this money? Not a bit of it. There is not so much as a reference to it, not even a remote hint that any money is required to pay the nation's debts! Do the senators suppose that the Secretary can shake ten or twenty millions a month out of his sleeve? Or do they suppose that the banks will give up their certificates from sheer love of Mr. Boutwell, or without other reward than the approval of their consciences or of the United States Senate? Or do they imagine that, when a bank issues new currency, it necessarily presents the whole of it to the Government Treasury as a free gift? Either the States referred to do not want the currency or they do want it. If they do not want it, the whole bill is a farce. If they do want it, they want it at once, and will get it just as quickly as the practical difficulties of execution can be overcome. If they, in accordance with the law, demand and obtain these forty-five millions of new currency within two, three, or four months—a long time, if they really need it—the Secretary will be obliged to furnish, during the same time, forty-five millions of surplus funds to redeem the certificates with. It is entirely needless to say that nobody expects the Secretary to have any such surplus. He will be obliged either to disobey the law in its most essential particular, or else declare the Treasury bankrupt.

We repeat, however, that not only is the object of this measure laudable, but that such a measure is most imperatively required to prevent serious financial disaster. To the minds of all thoughtful financiers, this enormous call-loan, these forty-five millions of three per cent. certificates, are an avalanche suspended by a thread that will some fine day come down upon Mr. Boutwell, and crush him and his sinking-fund and funding schemes into impalpable powder. It may, nevertheless, be well to call the attention of both Secretary and Senate to one or two facts. The weekly statements of the New York banks show a most satisfactory condition of their reserves—on the surface. In reality, their position is absolutely precarious. They are transacting business on a basis of 250 millions of indebtedness, with certainly not much over 25 millions of greenbacks in reserve. Of all the 356 millions of greenbacks in circulation, our banks hold only about 25 millions. It is well known to well-informed persons in Wall Street that there is scarcely a sufficient supply of greenbacks for the practical convenience of the banks; and to such an extent is this the case that banks will frequently lend their own notes, free of interest, for a week or ten days, on condition of receiving greenbacks in exchange. The great proportion of the greenbacks—at least 300 millions—are held by the people, and a large part of them by the people of the South. Should any pressing demand for money arise in any section of the country; should the South require only a very slight additional amount of greenbacks to pay for the remaining portion of its cotton crop, a greenback panic might be witnessed that would cause the three per cent. certificates to be presented to Mr. Boutwell for payment in a manner that he little dreams of. Nothing is more likely to occur than this very thing, even without the aid of the new currency bill, and, when it does happen, is Mr. Boutwell prepared to choose between the two alternatives: Treasury suspension or compulsory inflation? Is there anything "inside politics" that can suggest any other alternative?

To talk of sinking-funds and funding-bills, while such a call-loan as this hangs over our heads, is mere folly or wilful blindness. Innocent people may naturally ask, Why has not the whole or a portion of the yearly surplus been employed in paying off these certificates, this call-loan, instead of buying up bonds long before they are due and paying a premium on them? There are three reasons: one good, and two bad. The first of the bad reasons is that Mr. Boutwell has the ambition to fund the whole of our debt at a lower rate of interest, and needed all his surplus funds to buy bonds in the open market, hoping to put the price above par in gold, and thus induce funding at a lower rate. He has exhausted his surplus, and has not as yet succeeded. The second bad reason is that the banks do not want the certificates paid off if they can possibly get along without the money, and, therefore, very readily chimed in with Mr. Boutwell, and rather encouraged him to use his surplus as he did. The banks are obliged, both by law and by prudence, to hold a certain amount of greenbacks as reserve. On the amount of money thus held unemployed, of course they cannot earn interest. In the very nature of things it has to lie idle. But by the law of 1867, intended to facilitate the funding of the compound-interest notes, the banks are allowed to hold the certificates as a reserve, and are thus enabled, at the public expense, to earn interest on a fictitious reserve, which they are, indeed, obliged to hold by law, but which their own safety would compel them to hold with even greater force. If the certificates were paid off, the banks could no longer draw interest from the public treasury on the very money which they hold in their vaults for their own safety. The banks have made money enough out of the people, and it is high time that their interests should be subordinated to the public welfare. The only good reason for not sooner redeeming the certificates is, that in the hands of the banks they were equivalent to greenbacks, and that their withdrawal would compel the banks to substitute real greenbacks in their place. These latter could only be obtained by drawing them out of the pockets of the people; in other words, by a process of contraction to which the whole country is opposed.

From the foregoing it is evident that the most important, indeed the only important, measure for Senate and Secretary to consider is: How to redeem the three per cent. certificates without contraction or expansion? There is only one method possible. The banks must substitute specie for the three per cent. certificates in their reserve. They are, indeed, allowed to do so now, but as long as the certificates exist they will not avail themselves of the privilege. On the contrary, even if the certificates are withdrawn, they will use every effort in their power to extract the greenbacks from the pockets of the people and substitute them for the certificates. It is a simple question whether the people will allow the banks to force this contraction upon them, or whether they will require from the banks, as a simple act of justice, that they should hold a portion of their reserve in coin. It is impossible to devise a law more just and equitable than this would be, or one more directly and practically preparing the way to resumption. Let it be made imperative on all national banks to hold a certain and regularly increasing proportion of their reserve in coin, and let this proportion of reserve approximate as nearly as possible to the amount of three per cent. certificates that the Secretary may be able to redeem from his surplus funds. The redemption of the certificates can then be proceeded with without seriously affecting the circulating medium in the hands of the people, unless the banks should nevertheless determine to increase their greenback reserve, which they cannot under any circumstances be prevented from doing if they choose.

If the people of the United States propose ever to resume specie payments, they have got first of all to decide who is to be entrusted with the task. It has to be done either by the Government or the national banks. Whoever does it will necessarily have to hold a certain amount of coin to do it with. It seems to be settled by common consent that the banks are to be charged with the duty; for, otherwise, how could the Secretary's course in dispersing his hoards of coin meet with such general approval? But this decision, if once taken, should be recognized and established by law, and not merely accepted in silence as the valid verdict of one man. It is doubly and trebly necessary to have it fully understood, so as to settle upon whom is to fall the responsibility of making the necessary provision. As matters are now conducted, the one struggle between the banks and the Treasury seems to be, not who shall do most towards resumption, but who shall succeed in throwing upon the other the burden of taking care of the coin with which resumption is to be accomplished. This care of the coin is burdensome and costly, and may some day become an inducement to the export of coin when coin export would be least desirable. It must be made a duty for some one to hold and keep it. Practically, it is decided that it is to be done by the national banks. This decision must, however, be invested with the force of law, and now is the time to do it. The three per cent. certificates furnish the best opportunity. It is absolutely necessary that the three per cent. certificates should be redeemed. It is highly desirable that their redemption should not be attended with a contraction of the currency. The only way to avoid contraction is to compel the national banks to hold a portion of their reserve in specie.

If the correctness of this position is acknowledged—and we do not well see how it can be controverted—the next step is to establish the precise relations of the Treasury to the banks in regard to the redemption of the certificates. The present position of the Treasury coin reserve is as follows: The Secretary holds enough to pay at once every dollar of interest on the public debt, accrued up to date. He also holds dollar for dollar of all coin certificates issued by the Government and of all overdue debt payable in coin and not yet presented. Over and above these items, he holds eighteen millions against which there are no claims or obligations, and his receipts, judging by last year's experience, exceed his requirements at the rate of about four millions a month. Now the proper course for the Secretary to pursue is obvious, and should at once be established by law. He should at all times hold, as he does now, coin enough to pay all interest as it accrues, to pay all overdue debts, and the whole amount of his coin deposits. Then, out of his monthly receipts he must continue to set aside the interest accruing during each month, and the amount which he is required by law to invest in the purchase of bonds for the sinking-fund. Every dollar of his receipts over and above these requirements he should be instructed by law to sell month by month. He has now a surplus of eighteen millions. Let him spread the sale of these eighteen millions over six months, selling three millions a month in addition to each previous month's surplus. This will, at a very low estimate, and calculating on a large decline in imports, give four millions a month of Treasury coin sales during the next ten months, or very nearly (in currency) the amount of the outstanding certificates. Taking the average liabilities of all the national banks at eight hundred millions of dollars, the sales of four millions a month would furnish one-half of one per cent. per month of reserve to the national banks. Surely it is not too much to require of these institutions, which have so largely benefited by the operations of the Government, that they should henceforth be required to substitute coin for greenbacks in their reserve to the very, very small extent of one-half of one per cent. a month. If the banks are required to do this, the Treasury can, within ten months, redeem the whole of the three per cent. certificates with the proceeds of its gold sales, without the forced contraction of one dollar, without interfering to any material extent with the natural course of the money market, and can, in addition, take the first substantial practical step towards that resumption of specie payments which every one pretends to be so anxious to bring about, but towards which no one seems willing or able to take the first step. One thing ought, above all, to be clearly understood by every one, and that is that every day's delay in redeeming the three per cent. certificates increases the danger of worse Treasury complications than any we have witnessed since the war.

NOTES ON THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS AGITATION.

NO. II.

BY A LOOKER-ON.

WE cannot believe there is any woman who does not hold Mr. John Stuart Mill in a very grateful place in her heart. It is such a relief to be taken out of the floral world; from the first to the last leaf of his book, to be nowhere imaged as a blossom, or even as the inevitable vine; to be spared all those vegetable comparisons which have made us come out of most men's books about women with a shuddering fear lest we should some day be boiled for greens by mistake. Actually to be likened not unto flutes or viols, to wind or stringed instruments of high or low degree, to be bidden neither up nor down in the attuned orchestra, which, we are assured, this globe of land and water is—it is more than could have been hoped for. We don't care—(be it understood, we like Mr. James)—we don't much care whether we are "the female man, or a term of the great creative allegory," we are in such a flow of spirits at being reckoned neither as nymphs or seraphs, nor any other goblinry, but as solid pieces of the dear old human nature, and fit to be dealt with accordingly in solid fashion.

This reasonable champion, to be sure, is of the chivalric order. From childhood up we have shut our eyes, and tried to see that fascinating figure of the knight, spurring on with his lady's favor flying, to pound to atoms whosoever should not acknowledge her unknown face to be the fairest below the sun; we have dreamed that old-time hero, but we don't think we ever saw him clear till this Englishman of the nineteenth century set lance in rest to rout the depreciators of woman. In one especial portion of his book, where he takes up the charge brought against women of having yet failed to produce any great original work in the fields of creative thought already open to them—our champion makes defence on this point to all admiration. He clearly showeth that, on that blessed old vantage-ground of the past, where Homer, for instance, stood, when genius alone sufficed without culture, women made no attempts in poetic or artistic fields, while, now that they have begun to enter these, originality is no longer possible to any genius without that profound training which no woman gets; that is, we were kept out of doing great things, when the world was fresh, by being kept out of the field entirely; and now, in the present used-up world, we again miss our chance by missing the education which can alone grind the brightest genius of to-day into sufficient sharpness to discover anything new under the old, old sun. We folded this comfortable doctrine to our souls in much peace, and when, reading on to some comments on the special department of Music, we found a beautiful arrangement of averages, demonstrating that only one great female composer could be looked for to fifty among men, and that the fifty men were not yet made up—we began at that moment, and do still continue, to dote on the very name of John Stuart Mill—(the shade of the adored and departed Mrs. Mill permitting).

But as, alas! the general world is prone to lag somewhat behind the chevaliers, it may consider the case as not quite proved yet. There is ample evidence, indeed, that such is the fact, in the frequent remarks of the Anti-Woman Suffrage press to the effect that among men many of the greatest never had a day of collegiate education, have often won their successes in spite of every external obstacle—that the whole world of achievement in books, and the works of masters in music and art, is as open to women as to men—that, in short, women have been denied nothing which a sufficient male genius has not always been able to dispense with. In which declaration we may acknowledge a rather depressing weight of truth, and feel, surely, that after Mr. Mill there remains not much for us to say in answer thereto; nevertheless, as even that writer inclines to the theory that women are mysterious beings, about whom not much can with certainty be known, except what they tell themselves, we determine to divulge our sentiments on this subject.

It seems to us that there have been some influences, subtle but most real, to prevent women from achieving first-class work in any realm of creative art—influences far more potent than those external obstacles on which the chief stress is usually laid, and whose parallel existence in the career of many great men is cited with at least a show of reason in proof of the lack of ability of the sex. Human beings, both men and women, tend to develop according to the manly or womanly ideal of their time. Especially is this true of the gifted; "with all the passion of youth toward greatness in its elder" do natures of the finest strain seek to mould themselves in life's formative period after the master spirits of whatever art or profession their own tastes incline them to. It is not necessarily implying that all women are typified in Fielding's pet heroine, who held in such respectful awe "the understandings of men," to say that gifted women would naturally be profoundly loyal to the opinions of eminent men. This sentiment, as we have suggested, belongs to the neophyte of either sex, and it certainly would not lose in strength in the case of female genius. Now, all literature, from the novelist quoted above to purer and nobler writers, abounds in ideals of womanhood more or less resembling that same pattern young lady of Mr. Allworthy's panegyric, "who never made the least pretence to wit, much less to that kind of wisdom which is the result only of learning or experience, the affectation of which in a young woman is as absurd as any of the affectations of an ape."

And if, in the slow discoveries of the race, it has been discovered that a bright mind is rather a good thing even in women—that (Mr. Allworthy to the contrary) a witty young lady, other things being equal, is a more charming companion than a silly one; nevertheless, even this progressive recognition has inclined to value intellectual gifts in women for their social, suggestive, tributary (to man) worth, rather than as the promise and foundation for original achievement. To be the bellows to blow up the coal of the masculine intelligence—this do poet, philosopher, and essayist perpetually hint to be the office and limit of whatever inspired breath may be in female souls, and seriously this doctrine is not without much effect on the order of women that we are at present discussing.

For the service of the Muses is so baffling a service, self-distrust can never be far from any of its votaries. Mysteries of our mortal and immortal existence, infinite depths of Nature and of Man—who with his best endeavor so sounds the least of these secrets as not to feel in many and many an hour that his vision is blindness, and all his interpretation vanity? And to this misgiving, inseparable from the artist, is there not some added depression for women? The new poet, masculine, may be written down by the critics as an exceeding ass, but at least he is not informed that there is any fatality in his sex to make his untuneful braying for ever hopeless. To look no longer upon life with the delineator's passion, to breathe whatever suggestions it has for them in the mirth and sadness of daily speech, to illumine, perchance, the little circle of personal acquaintance, therein perchance, alas! to be only isolated by keener experiences than others knew—what manifold influences tend to bring swiftly to this renunciation women, in whose gifts of nature may have been the best young promise!

The simple truth is, that the seeing faculty is only the first requisite for any work of ideal creation. Power of will must supplement all the gift of vision with persistent effort for any high accomplishment. This power may be inherently inferior in women, but with the conditions of the past we think it can by no means be yet settled to what extent this is so. We conceive on this point a large application of Mr. Mill's remark, that "only an analytic study of the laws of the influence of circumstances on character can give even a partial insight into the question of what are the natural differences between the two sexes." And this power of will strikes us as being a faculty eminently susceptible of cultivation, while that of poetic insight is emphatically a born gift. So that, if appearances went to show that the latter was radically deficient in women, here indeed would be a fatal doubt; whereas, if the weakness were in the former, altered influences might be relied on to work almost unlimited improvement. Now, it is the spontaneous, the untaught felicity, the gift of nature, in short, which notably abounds in women's writings. Mrs. Browning, we can see, is far enough from being a great artist, but what affluence of poetic thought and suggestion; from what cloudy page of hers is the angel of vision ever so far distant that we do not hear the strong beating of his wings?

Women's books, in general, supremely need bracing up. Solid education is a help to this, the sense of being welcomed to try thorough work, the overfaint heart steadied by the promise of what good hope may be, and not shaken by too much reminding of the hindrances that must be. The things that must be, human beings who are not fools are usually even too well aware of. The things that may be are for courage. And courage, in women, for these pursuits has, as we think in ages past, waited on seasons too unfavorable for its possible strength to be yet fairly judged, while in the broader opportunity and recognition which, in the present day, are given to female intellect, and which have surely been followed by a very genuine growth in its productions, is there not still much wanting?

We recall, just here, a remark in an old number of the Nation, which we read with an almost personal feeling of gratitude for the truth therein uttered. We have no accurate memory of the words, but its substance was, that, "in judging the authoress of a work like 'Romola,' there should be taken into account not only the energy that went to the creation of the book, but that expended in struggling against the depressing feeling that, being a woman, nothing very good was expected of her."

We have spoken chiefly of literature, as in that field women's efforts have been most numerous, but in the other arts would not the same causes be found equally at work? Mendelssohn can write to his most beloved and gifted sister Fanny such blessedly solid praise as this: "So far as your music and composition are concerned, they quite suit my taste; the young lady's cloven foot nowhere peeps forth; and if I knew any Kapellmeister capable of writing such music, I would give him a place at my court;" and yet to this same sister of his soul, he too must elsewhere make his little speech on woman's sphere, in praise rather arrogant for the gentle Mendelssohn.

There is another point which we hope is not too weak to be glanced at here, viz., that the unhappy private life which has so proverbially often been the doom of genius, must needs weigh more fatally upon localized, home-keeping women than upon men, freer to escape the accidents of place and birth. And by the way, concerning this so frequent alliance of genius with strange grief, instead of explaining it alone by the peculiar temperament of the gifted, or as a direct ordering of Providence that those who are to teach humanity must first suffer all things—still less by the notion that sorrows create the poet—might not a truer explanation than all these be found in tracing how often the strong inherited traits which culminate in genius in one member of a family are present in broken, abnormal confusion in others, to rule like a ghastly fate the shuddering, sensitive, artistic spirit? The near approach, the convertibility even of the qualities which make the angel or the demon in human character, is one of the most awful mysteries that hide with God, and women, in such bonds, are more darkly held than any man can be, not only by the conditions of their lives, but by their very bias of nature. There is a profound sense in which one must escape out of the personal, before the personal insight, for the world, can be truly spoken. The experience must not rule, but be ruled. Under the waters no voice cries save with the soul's inarticulate sobbing, breaking only on the ear of God.

It has been the fashion to speak of Charlotte Brontë's novels as if their power was due to the calamities of her life. The power was in the woman, and not in her griefs. The excess of these disordered her strength. We should like to have seen Charlotte Brontë out of her endless life of school teaching, out of her other life in that graveyard parsonage, with the father stuffing the hearth-rugs up the chimney, and sitting in the burning stench to evaporate his flaming tempers—away from the life with the dying sisters; with the sinful, drunken, ruined brother, dying too—we should like to have seen her neck out of the yoke to which it was bowed to earn her daily bread, and her heart healed of some of its draining sorrows, and her studies in life and in books widened, and her days, alas! lengthened out; and better creations than Rochester would have lived in her pages.

No, there is no great soul that has not been developed through a measure of suffering, but we believe it possible to place a strained emphasis on the worth of pain. Only one form has walked this earth, crowned as the Man of Sorrows, and even for His agony the angel appeared, strengthening Him. Frail mortals, frail women, surely have no less need.

Woes must be, and the daughters of Time must walk their appointed paths, but there is a staff in books and acquirements, and in the habit of looking away, and not always into the sky either, but out upon the wide struggling world, losing in the sense of its large movements the dizzying pain of the heart circling for ever round its own personal enigmas—bringing back to the private life and duties the clearer vision, the deeper faith that comes from knowing the things beyond them.

Wisdom is justified of her children, be they sons or daughters. The daughters would like to have more of the maternal attention. Not to rival the sons—we have talked away here about those personages, because they are a convenient standard to refer to, but we don't care a straw whether we can write or paint, or compose like men; on the contrary, we have a profound conviction (opposed to Mr. Mill) that we shall do those things, and all other things, when we do them best, in a distinctive manner. We don't care where that manner comes in the scale, only that it be a true manner of its own—of the gods themselves we would ask no more. We read in Comte with unshaken serenity, that "women, as intellectually compared with men, are in a state of perpetual infancy." Even so, O Philosopher! who metest infinity with a span? We should like, then, to study the tops of our cradles with a little more method than heretofore. Might it please you, these perpetual babies would still wish to be rocked to the tune of the nineteenth century, that so they may come to what best pattern babies may.

Correspondence.

WHAT IS SOCIAL SCIENCE?

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I have seen a good deal in the papers lately about "Social Science," but nothing as yet which has been, to my mind, entirely satisfactory; so I take the liberty of asking from you a little information.

What is social science? What are its specific ends? How does it propose to accomplish them? And what success, if any, has thus far attended its operation?

There is something in the name that rather takes my fancy. Science, in these days of abounding empiricism, has a pleasant sound; but names are easily assumed and are often deceitful.

As I understand it, social science proposes to treat, remedially, certain maladies of our body public. Some of these maladies are deep-seated, and most of them chronic. How, exactly, it proposes to deal with them is what I—and others as well—want to know.

If its plan of cure is anything like that of giving political power to a new party, or of changing State and Municipal Executives, please say so at once, and don't trouble yourself to go any further. I have seen that sort of remedy tried too often to have any faith in it.

Or if it is to make large use of popular agitation, or platform eloquence, or "star" speakers, it will be sufficient to merely indicate the fact without going into detail. These are medicines which, from excessive use, have lost their efficacy, and just now do not lie well on the public stomach.

I belong to a profession which has suffered greatly from humbug. I am a practitioner of medicine of the Old School; but I believe in progress. I despise with equal contempt the routine remedies of old fogyism and the new-fangled specifics of modern charlatanry. I believe in treating the diseases of the human system on principles of common sense, guided by the light of experience and the teachings of science. My reading and observation forbid any trust in short methods with chronic complaints, or in palliatives with any.

Now, there is sufficient analogy between the political body corporate and the individual physical body to make it probable that the diseases which afflict both should be treated on essentially the same principles; and as we know that alcoholic stimulation and anodyne palliation are not to be relied upon in dealing with the one, it is fair to infer that popular agitation, newspaper sensation, and political demonstration are not to be trusted in treating the other. These resorts may, at times, have been of use, but, as remedies, they are at present utterly valueless. The cures, so called, which such treatment effects are cures which, in their turn, need themselves be cured.

This much I know. But what I do not know, and what I desire to be informed upon, is, what the remedies are which science would prescribe for the evils afflicting our social and political systems?

I am aware that you published an article on this subject some time ago, but as the question was not then a practical one, outside of a comparatively small circle, it was not read with the interest which it would now command. At any rate, some of your most intelligent readers are as ignorant as myself on the subject, and I am quite sure that a little iteration would oblige others as well as, yours truly,

A Pennsylvania Doctor.

February 5.

[Social science is the knowledge of the laws which regulate the condition of men as members of human society. For instance, one of those laws is that, if people live together in dense masses in a filthy manner or a small area, the result will be a predisposition to take cholera. The existence of this law has been discovered partly by observation and partly by experiment; the use of knowing it is to induce the community to pass acts and provide funds and employ experts to prevent people living together in dense masses on small areas; or, if they do, to see that they keep their premises clean. One of the consequences of our knowledge of it is that cholera is now a comparatively harmless disease. Before we knew of it we thought cholera was contagious and irresistible, and abandoned the sick to their fate, and roasted or hanged a few Jews as the only prophylactic we could think of. We might multiply indefinitely similar examples drawn from other fields. In general terms, the object of social science may be stated to be (1) the discovery of the tendencies towards evil of any kind, moral or physical, which are the result or accompaniment of that conglomeration of men in large bodies known as civilized society, and the consideration of the artificial means, if any, by which these tendencies may be checked—whether, for instance, they can be checked directly by legislation or only indirectly by culture or education, and, if the latter, what kind of education is likely to be most effective; and (2) the discovery of the hindrances opposed by custom or positive law to that tendency to improvement which is found in most human societies, and to which, by whatever name we call it, all social progress has been due. For instance, intemperance and prostitution are the two great blots on civilization; are they removable or diminishable by legislation, or only by increased moral culture? Anybody who is engaged in this enquiry is occupying himself with one of the problems of social science. Or (to illustrate the second branch of the work) it has been proved—though at one time it was not believed—that the more education is diffused through a community, the happier, more prosperous, and more easily governed it is. But how should education be diffused? Should the State do it, or the family, or the church? In trying to answer this question, we are considering the best means of removing the hindrances which stand in the way of the good tendencies of society. Or again, the interest on money has in all countries and all ages been an object of serious human concern. Laws have nearly everywhere been passed to keep it down. One school of social philosophers says that these laws, instead of keeping it down, raised it, and were thus injurious to civilization. Are they right or are they wrong? Anybody who, by observation or experiment, is endeavoring to answer this question is working at social science.

Of course, as everybody knows, in talking of social science we do not mean to say that it is an exact science—that is, that its problems are capable of mathematical solution; that we ever have before us all the data in a given case, or can depend with absolute certainty on any of its conclusions, or ever make anything which a chemist would call an experiment. But this reproach it shares with physiology, medicine, geology, political economy, and history and metaphysics. By its aid we have got very near the truth in a vast number of cases—sufficiently near for the regulation of our conduct in practical affairs—and the more we observe, collect, and compare, the greater the number of truths to which we approximate. The belief that there is a science of society, in short, is based on the theory that society is not an artificial arrangement regulated by contract like a business partnership, but an organism which grows in accordance with certain laws, the nature and operation of which are obscured by the difficulty of finding out what part human will and what part circumstances play in this growth. Some people ascribe nearly all to will, others nearly all to fate; when we have found out which is right, or in what proportion each is right, we shall have solved the last great social problem, and life will no longer have any secrets for us. We shall probably never solve it; but there is an immense deal for us to do on this side of its solution.

It will probably seem to the "Pennsylvania Doctor," on reading this statement, that social science is almost, if not quite, the same thing as politics; or, in other words, that it is simply a new name for an old and well-known thing. There is a distinction, however. Politics may be called the art by which the teachings of social science are put into practice. By the one we do what the other tells we ought to do. To recur to the cholera illustration: the gentlemen interested in the public health were cultivating social science when finding out what caused so much disease in Cherry Street; and, when they went up to Albany to persuade the sages of the Legislature to pass a good health law, they engaged in politics. So, also, those who showed that slavery was "a moral, social, and political evil" were, while so doing, students of social science; when they engaged in the organization of a party and the conduct of an agitation to prevent its spread to the Territories, they were politicians. The provision of machinery for the execution of the sovereign will is, in fact, the business of the politician; the enlightening of the will, that of the social philosopher.

As regards the cultivation of the science, there is of course the usual reason, with which everybody is familiar, for pursuing it through organizations. There is still another, however, and more powerful one in the difficulty which "the average man" experiences in believing that, by means of observations extended over a large field, light, of which he has little idea, may be thrown on the very problems of his own condition or calling with which he is every day occupied—the education of his children, the care of his health, the tightness of the money market, or the price of goods; that, in other words, there is a philosophy of society, and that the man who has cultivated it by the collection, classification, or comparison of facts, and by making inductions from them, is better worth listening to than the man who has not done so; that there is in the conduct of life, as well as in the arts, a theory as well as a practice, and that one is as necessary as the other to social well-being. Social science does not support the accession of any particular party to power; but it seeks to convince people of the wrong of giving power to ignorant men of any party, by showing from human experience what woes the ignorance of legislators has wrought. It does not recommend any particular plan as sure to put an end to human misery, but seeks to convince people that in sociology, as in medicine, all vendors of panaceas are quacks; that anybody who goes about saying that either equality, or freedom, or female suffrage, or prohibition, or common schools, or the ballot will make the world what it ought to be, should no more be listened to than the patent pill-man who, with one and the same bolus, cures rheumatism, consumption, and cancer, reduces fractures, extract balls, removes cataracts, and stimulates the appetite and raises the spirits. Nor, on the other hand, is there in sociology, any more than in medicine, a "Doctrine of Signatures." The fox's lungs won't cure asthma, nor turmeric jaundice, nor eye-bright ophthalmia, nor bloodstone stop bleeding, in the one any more than in the other. The influences which improve human society are as numerous and various as those which form character or preserve or restore health. Each one does something—precisely how much only Omniscience knows. But still, in the case of any one of them, we ourselves can discover whether it does a great deal or only a little; and to enable us to find out this—to settle the usefulness of any one of them for our purposes—we have been endowed with an instrument, the human understanding, the right use of which, in this particular work, it is the object of social science to teach.—Ed. Nation.]

OUR PUBLIC CREDIT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of the 27th inst. there is an article entitled "The Public Credit," in which it appears to me that you have omitted to notice one of the principal causes which depreciate the public credit.

However true it may be "that every Northern State is rapidly reducing its indebtedness," it is not less true that the State of New York has paid and does pay its interest on debt contracted before the war, on a gold basis, in depreciated paper. This dishonest action cost the foreign holder of the bonds of New York at one time half his income, and to-day cheats him of one-fifth. Why should the foreigner expect greater honesty from American lawmakers at Washington than has been shown by American lawmakers at Albany? Is it supposed that the combined action of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Mississippi, and New York will be more honest than the action of each State separately has proved?

In brief, sir, the credit of the United States is low, because the States composing the Union have in so many instances defrauded their creditors.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

Devon.

Savannah, Ga., Jan. 31, 1870.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF GERMAN-AMERICANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Some time since you asked for information respecting the state of religious thought among the Germans in this country. Not having seen any answer in your columns, I venture to contribute something that has fallen in my way which throws some light upon the subject. In Steiger's Literarischer Monatsschrift, published in your city, have appeared several very interesting letters on the Germans of the West; and in the December number I find this given as the result of the writer's investigations. After giving an account of a conversation held with a number of Germans in Minneapolis, and the novelty, to their minds, of the proposition that the best way to enlighten the people was to give them positive knowledge rather than to unsettle them as to the belief they already held, he adds: "Und das waren nicht die einzigen Orte, in denen gewisse mehr oder weniger maassgebende Leute es für eine ausgemachte Thatsache zu halten schienen, dass 'Freie Gemeinde' und 'Aufklärung,' 'Vernichtung jeglicher religiös-dogmatischer Ueberzeugung' und 'Fortschritt' identische Begriffe seien." ("Nor was that the only place where certain more or less moderate people seemed to regard it as a settled fact that 'Free Congregation' and 'enlightenment' and 'annihilation of every dogmatic religious conviction' were ideas synonymous with 'progress.'") And, later, he more than intimates that the general notion of religious teaching was to convince the people "dass Dasjenige, was es zu wissen meine, nur Phantasie, resp. Trug sei" ("that what they think they know is only an illusion, or lie.") Another letter in the same number informs us that "der Deutsche in jedem Pfaffen einen Feind, und im Sonntag eine schändliche Erfindung zur Unterdruckung der Gewissensfreiheit erblickt" ("the German sees in every priest an enemy, and in Sunday an infamous invention for suppressing freedom of conscience.")

R. Francis Colton.

Philadelphia, Feb. 1, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce a number of novels: "Ralph the Heir," by Anthony Trollope; "Red as a Rose," by the author of "Cometh up as a Flower;" "The Woman of Business," by M. Savage; "The Three Brothers," by Mrs. Oliphant; and "Queen Hortense," by Louisa Mühlbach. Also, a new edition of Grace Aguilar's "Home Influence," and Dr. Smith's "Smaller Specimens of English Literature," and "Smaller History of English Literature."——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press the third series of reprints from their magazine, called "Short Stories for Spare Moments," and, by itself, Mr. Robert Dale Owen's "Beyond the Breakers;" "The Christian Rule of Marriage," by Dr. Howard Malcom, which the Oneida communists will doubtless be pleased to confute as soon as it is laid down in the forthcoming book; "A Handbook of Medical Microscopy," by Joseph G. Richardson, M.D., Microscopist to the Pennsylvania Hospital, Philadelphia; and "The Student's Hand-book of Logic," an abstract of John Stuart Mill's system, by Rev. Alfred H. Killick, M.A., Fellow of the University of Durham.——It is announced that Putnam's Magazine is hereafter to be edited by Mr. Parke Godwin, for many years a principal editor of the New York Evening Post, and long ago, when Putnam's Monthly was first begun, a valued contributor to the magazine. Hitherto, as we now learn, Mr. George P. Putnam, the publisher, has himself been the editor; but, as might have been expected, the pressure of other work has prevented his doing all that he could have wished in the way of editorial labor.——Mr. Carleton is to publish immediately "a polished and powerful weapon for the hand of the fighting believer in the righteousness of the woman's suffrage cause." "Up Broadway, and its Sequel," is the title of the work, and Mrs. Eleanor Kirk is its author. The same house will issue the fifth and last volume of Mr. Walter Barrett's "Old Merchants of New York City;" a book of poems by Mr. Irving Van Wart, Jr.; and a sort of a record of civilian appointments in the United States Army during the rebellion, by Colonel Guy V. Henry. It is to be hoped that he may have given us his views as to the relative efficiency of regular and army officers—a mooted question. Even if he were to be illiberal, volunteers, remembering General Butler's and General Logan's attacks on the regulars, need hardly grumble. But we hope for better things, Colonel Henry being a man of ability and character, though it would not be strange if he had West Point prejudices. This volume is to be "the largest record of military names ever printed," unless Mr. Carleton is mistaken.

—It was but the other day that we announced the appointment of a State Board of Health in Massachusetts, and already there comes from it a "First Annual Report," in conformity with the law under which it was created. The limited term which it has had for action has been well improved, and for immediate results we have two admirable reports on the subject of slaughtering and on the sale of poisons; while by circular the Board has given the widest possible information of sanitary powers and penalties already prescribed by statute, and has inaugurated a weekly public report from twenty cities and towns, containing about half the population of the State, of the number of deaths which have proceeded from preventable, including epidemic, diseases, with a specification of the causes. The economy of abattoirs is discussed with great clearness and from accurate knowledge, and the incidental account of the sources of the albumen so much in request for numerous branches of manufacture should be read by all persons interested. It is really an essay on protection—the protection which comes by exchanging wastefulness for thrift, and excludes the foreign product simply by increasing the native. How much saving may result from co-operation is well illustrated in the case of an abattoir in this city, cited by the Board, which has twenty-nine compartments leased to as many butchering firms, in return for just the feet and legs of the cattle from the knee down, with the skins on—a royalty equal to forty-four cents per set of four. In regard to the sale of poisons the report says:

"People do not take as many drugs as formerly. Physicians do not prescribe such variously compounded mixtures. Twenty years ago a druggist was more exclusively devoted to his legitimate business, while now, in our large towns, he is rather a dealer in soda-water, cigars, perfumery, and fancy goods."

Hence the tendency to employ incompetent assistants, and the consequent fatal mistakes; a remedy for which the Board seeks not in additional penal legislation, but in stringent requirements of capacity and training from all who are admitted to deal out drugs. A paper by the secretary, Dr. George Derby, on the prevention of disease, completes the Report, and, like what precedes, is to be strongly commended to everybody's perusal, and especially to all legislative bodies.

—Some of the things which are done by the collective body of "gentlemen connected with the press" would seem to be explicable only on the supposition that at times there is an epidemic of fatuity among them, once in so often they seem to become, all with one accord, imbecile. It is, of course, constantly happening that one or another of them is suffering under vacuity of mind; but what we speak of is that now and again they all in a mass become a prey to temporary idiocy in respect to some particular matter. They rage, and imagine a vain thing, and do so by the thousand at a time. For example, everybody will remember how, when the late President was "swinging round the circle," Mr. Seward enquired of the electors of some Northern city whether "they would have Andrew Johnson for President or for King;" and everybody may easily recollect how for more than two months the entire Republican press told the people, with damnable iteration, that in putting this question "Seward had betrayed his master's guilty secret;" while the Democratic papers kept silence, and not one of them came to the rescue or ventured to explain that Mr. Seward meant no more than to say that Congress, in the vetoed Civil Rights Bill, had attempted to clothe the Executive with such powers as would have made the President an absolute king—powers which the patriot President would not accept, though all the Radicals in the world were determined that he should, and that the States should be utterly swallowed up in him. We have no doubt—judging from what was at that time said in scores of papers which we were in the way of seeing, that Mr. Seward's careless question did more than a little to carry the elections of 1866 in favor of Congress. Many a farmer, moved by the able editors, cast a ballot against "the monarchical system which Andy Johnson was scheming to introduce;" and we saw no reason to doubt that the able editors themselves were much of the farmer's mind, and really believed what they said. This winter has given us another proof that almost all the brains of the newspaper world may suddenly be given over to an all but incredible superfluity of foolishness. We are reminded of it by an explanation which Mr. Dickens recently, when he was distributing prizes at some school examination or commencement in Birmingham, thought it necessary to make. In the same city, on a similar occasion last year, confessing his political faith, he said that "he had but very little confidence in the people governing, but that he had all confidence in the people governed." How anybody should misunderstand this language, in the mouth of this speaker, is a question completely puzzling; yet there is the fact: for some weeks the press of England, the United States, and the Colonies made the remark the subject of enquiring comment; and, indeed, enquiry was not all; some of those newspaper friends of freedom by whom we all profit so much—who have so keen a scent for rascality, who unearth the "traitor to liberty," and unmask him in advance of any of their contemporaries—told us that Dickens had always been more or less of a snob, and that now he had come out in his true colors, and shown himself to the world as being all that the discerning had long since perceived him to be. Some of the less stern and uncompromising friends of the people—old Whigs, perhaps—thought that while some excuse for Mr. Dickens suggested itself when we took into consideration the condition of the majority of his own countrymen, still, the character of "the masses" which he had seen over here should have made him a believer in "the people governing." Still others were more grieved than angry; and there were a few who clung to the belief that Dickens's heart was all right, but that he had carelessly used language capable of receiving two interpretations. To all these classes of persons, and to the malignant class who wilfully misunderstood him, Mr. Dickens has made the explanation above referred to; and to anybody who cares to know, we may report that, all the time, if he is to be believed, the meaning of the words on which so much discussion has been expended was—just their natural meaning.

—Just now there are going the rounds of the papers two or three paragraphs which perhaps may safely be said to relate to the earliest and the latest history of scientific advertising. In the last week of last year died Mr. Doudney, a Lombard Street tailor and woollen-draper, who was among the very earliest men of our time to advertise systematically and on a very large and costly scale—to advertise, not so as to direct the man already anxious to purchase to a place where he might find what he had decided on purchasing; but to advertise so as to induce the purchasing frame of mind in the indifferent man, and so as to print it on the memory of every person who, in the future, might probably become a purchaser, that such and such a place was the place where such and such things should be bought. Mr. Doudney began to use the magazines and papers in 1830, or thereabouts, and taking advantage of the old Reform Bill excitement, he invariably headed his advertisements with the words, "Reform Your Tailor's Bills." By this stroke of invention, and by the expenditure of great sums of money in calling people's attention to himself and his shop, he rapidly acquired a fortune and early retired from active business. Of the other paragraphs of which we speak, one was to the effect that "a certain very clever American lady"—who is, however, as American as Queen Victoria, and no more so—had for a partner of hers in the management of one of the London theatres the late Mr. George Peabody. The other of them, which has made its appearance since Mr. Peabody's death, stated that the lady in question would be found to be down in Mr. Peabody's will for a legacy of ten thousand pounds. Neither story had the least foundation in fact, and both may be put to the credit of the "very clever" lady herself or her business agent. She has got herself mentioned in all the papers, even the most dignified. Had it not been for that, though, a certain Parisian actor would have fairly beaten her at the very moment of her success. The middle-aged Frenchman who used to play one of the two gendarmes in "Geneviève de Brabant" jumped into the Seine the other day for the alleged reason that his name in the bills was not printed in letters large enough to please him, since when much of Paris goes nightly to witness the performances of this exquisitely sensitive spirit—a fact in which may be discovered the unalleged reason for the "rash act" of our artist.

—We laugh more or less at the child of freedom, with his home in the setting sun, who so freely belabors dusty monarchies; but it is as well to remind ourselves now and then that as often as not he had the right on his side in his statement of facts, and that however much he may want sweetness and light, and however deficient he may be in the grace of modesty, there are very solid reasons for satisfaction with his lot at the bottom of the most screaming of the Fourth-of-July glorifications in which the American citizen indulges. Perhaps we should say, in which he used to indulge; for latterly he talks more soberly than to give unalloyed pleasure to his friends of the London Quarterly and the Saturday Review. He will doubtless get some solid comfort from a report which has just been made by a Parisian society called the "Société des Gens de Lettres," a report asked for by a Government commission appointed to examine into the laws regulating the relations of printers and publishers with the outside world. The writer of the society's answer is understood to be M. Henri Cellier, an influential member of the sort of literary trades-union whose title we have just mentioned. Senator Chandler himself, or Mr. John A. Logan, would admit that there is a presumption that M. Cellier "comprehends American institutions," for he certainly speaks with sufficient plainness of the burdens imposed upon men of letters and publishers by the Imperial Government. We may remark that the weight of what he says is not in the least diminished by the comparatively quiet way in which he says it, for he has learned the lesson—not so well known in Illinois and Michigan as in France—that plain facts have as much weight by themselves as when a heated gentleman flings his own weight on top of them in the wish to make them weigh more. We have only space to mention some of the evils which M. Cellier desires to see abolished. He asks that licenses for exercising the trade of printer or that of publisher be no longer demanded; that, while publishers' names be declared, there shall no longer be required a deposit of caution-money or the recognizance of sureties; that a trader in any other wares be permitted to sell books if so minded; that hawkers of books—who practically are the sole sources of supply to the rural districts—be left unrestricted; that, in short, the police be called off, and publishing and bookselling be entirely free—or at least as free as other branches of industry. For, says M. Cellier, the man of letters is in this century neither an eccentric being beyond the pale of ordinary life, nor the dependant of a Mæcenas; he is not the property of a Cæsar, nor a beggar at the doors of a patron, nor an unhuman, supernatural, or subternatural, being who lives in mystery. He is fashioned like the rest of us; he lives as we do, requiring so many meals in the course of the year; he wears raiment as the rest of us do, and must pay for it like the rest of us; and he is not ill pleased to have a balance in his favor at the bank. He is, in fact, a trader, as we all are in this age; and wants an open market, with leave to buy and sell as a grocer or a tailor does.

—Did the Emperor of China, in framing the Burlingame credentials, purposely insert an offensive assumption of China's superiority over all other nations? This question, as late as November last, was considered worthy of discussion in the Anglo-Chinese newspapers. It turned upon the proper meaning to be assigned the word Pang (Yu-pang) in the phrase: "We regard with affection friendly States, and the promotion of lasting amity therewith." A learned correspondent of the North China Herald successfully discredits the rendering of Pang as a "tributary state," and proves that it is synonymous with Kuo, each being at times used for a smaller state or province, but also frequently for the empire, and again as a neutral word for country, kingdom, etc. Its use in the credentials he attributes to its occurrence in the Shukung, in the speeches of King Wu, which has caused it to become a stock expression among lettered Chinamen. The Herald, while yielding to this explanation, says that at least Mr. Burlingame's office is not ranked in terms above that of the two Chinese ambassadors, Chih-kiang and Sun-chia-ku; and as their position among the Chinese officials "must be regarded as insignificant," Mr. Burlingame's is inferentially not otherwise.

—When, in December last, after a year and a half's summons, the Œcumenical Council assembled at Rome, half a century had just elapsed since Joseph de Maistre, in his work arguing for Papal infallibility—"Du Pape"—published the following opinion:

"In the first centuries of Christianity, Councils were much more easy to convene, because the Church was much less numerous; and, nevertheless, what trouble and embarrassment it caused to bring them together! But in modern times, when the civilized world is cut up into so many sovereignties, and has been so enlarged by our bold discoverers, an Œcumenical Council has become a chimera. Merely to bring all the bishops together, and take formal cognizance of their presence, five or six years would not suffice."

Such wonders, however, have steam and electricity wrought since 1819, that the time is near at hand when a Council might be gathered from the most distant parts of the earth in a space of from three to four months from the date of convocation—or no more than is now allowed for political conventions in a country like ours, and far less than the Council will now require for mere discussion. And if the Pope's authority abroad were in direct proportion to the ease with which he communicates with the extremities of his spiritual domain, we should all be disposed to lay restrictions upon Cable messages, or even to prohibit Cables altogether. Happily, there is no more harmless article than damnation dealt out by telegraph.

ENGLISH LIVES OF ALBERT DÜRER.*

In the English language there was no book treating of Albert Dürer's life and works until last autumn, when there appeared, nearly together,

* "History of the Life of Albert Dürer. By Mrs. C. Heaton." New York: Macmillan & Co.
"Albert Dürer, his Life and Works. By William Bell Scott." London: Longmans, Green & Co.

the two whose names we give below. Each of these has value, and the two taken together are capable of giving a very nearly complete idea of that great designer's peculiar work. The publication of such books is about the best thing that is done for art nowadays, and is one thing at least that never could have been done before. If the age is incapable of producing original works of art of great merit, as is often asserted and not satisfactorily denied, it is at least capable of other artistic achievements never even seriously attempted at any former time. Thus it can produce approximately complete criticism of the Fine Arts, considered historically, and criticism that at least aims at completeness and perfection. That is, the best criticism of the day (need it be said that by criticism we do not mean merely finding fault with pictures on exhibition?)—the best criticism of the day is based upon an absolutely boundless curiosity about the facts and an entire willingness to take them as they prove to be, or seem to be, and account for them afterwards; and, going on from this, it seeks to place the fine arts aright in their relation to the whole of human life and knowledge, and to conceive of their proper influence over the world of the future. The material for the true history of art increases rapidly through researches conducted in this spirit, and, at the same time, it is being put into shape and catalogued nearly as fast as it accumulates. The result is seen in the almost complete rewriting of the whole library of books on art.

The newly acquired sense of the value of accuracy in copying works of art is one of the most striking signs of the times. Never before the present quarter-century was there any serious attempt to copy old works of art exactly as they are, that they might be studied by those who cannot see the originals. In the seventeenth century a classical statue, found mutilated, was at once restored and the missing limbs replaced by new ones, the attitude and gesture of the lost parts being conjecturally arrived at by some process of manufacturing artistic inspiration; a drawing then made of a building or a gem, an engraving from a fresco or a mosaic, would give, not the original, but some modification of it suggested by the copyist's consciousness of superior knowledge. The recognition of the fact that a work of art can only be rightly estimated and enjoyed when seen as it was left by its author, though seemingly simple, was very slow to come. We do not always observe how far down toward our own time this sort of thing extended. Do not our architects still possess and, perhaps, study Gally Knight's "Churches of Italy," and Chapuy's "Moyen Age Monumentale," and Cicognara's "Venice"? It is true that there is sometimes excessive difficulty in copying truthfully an old work of art. In all attempts at copying somewhat archaic art, "when once the true forms of nature are departed from, it is by no means easy to express exactly the error, and no more than the error, of the original. . . . It requires the utmost courage and skill in a copyist to trace faithfully the failures of an imperfect master. And let him do the best he can, he will still find that the grace and life of his original are continually flying off like a vapor, while the faults he has diligently copied sit staring him in the face."* And it is on this account that such work as is sometimes done nowadays becomes wonderful to those who see how new, how unexampled it is. As a good instance, we may consider the etchings of Jules Jacquemart, of the rarities of the Louvre collection, and, still more, those in the "History of Porcelain." Jules Jacquemart's own work is not remarkable; working independently, he appears an average Parisian aquafortiste, and no more. But in copying a Chinese porcelain plate he gives with perfect accuracy the exact character of the human figures and the flowers and landscapes upon it; they are represented just as conventional, just as unscientifically drawn as they really are, and no more so. And with this new gift of insight into a thing hitherto shut from man's vision—the arts of other times than his—are given also new mechanical means of copying works of art never before approached in the power of accurate representation and reproduction. Chromo-lithography has been invented and improved, and great things are possible to it in its limited sphere. Sculptures can be copied in a diminished scale with mathematical accuracy of proportion, and both in this way and of full size the copies are wonderfully cheap; photography goes on to daily greater triumphs, and of it have come photo-lithography, not very efficient so far, but promising much, and the last and greatest of our mechanical achievements, autotypy, or "the carbon process."

Mrs. Heaton's book upon Albert Dürer is adorned by thirty illustrations, of which ten are carbon photographs (autotypes), and nearly all are of the full size of the page. Among these are given some of the most important of Dürer's immortal designs—the "Saint Eustache," the "Knight and Death," the "Melencholia," the "St. Jerome in his Study;" these, reproduced in autotype, and about two-thirds as high and as wide as the originals, are really excellent pictures. There is a certain slight blurring of the lines, and a certain tendency of the shadows to lose themselves in blackness—shortcomings which alone prevent these pictures from being very perfect as copies on a smaller scale; these shortcomings, moreover, are slight, and with a little willingness to disregard them one may fully enjoy the sincerity and strength of design, the subtle significance, and the unerring workmanship of these masterpieces of the greatest of original engravers. Besides these, a number of the designs from the Greater Passion, the Life of the Virgin, etc., are copied, either in woodcut or in photo-lithography, with fair success. There are differences of merit among them, however, and some of them have all the look of late and poor impressions from wood-blocks, so rough and broken are the lines—a fault never yet avoided, so far as we know, in photo-lithographic copies of line work.

The illustrations to the other book are very different. Mr. Scott, a painter of eminence, a student of natural form, and a practical etcher, has given us six etchings on steel—one from the beautiful drawing of himself made by Dürer in his boyhood, and now in the Museum of Vienna; one from the lower part of the "Greater Fortune," in which is a village asserted to be the home of Dürer's father; one of Dürer's head from the well-known painting at Munich; one from the later portrait at Antwerp, and two from scenes in Nürnberg. These are exceedingly brilliant, and have a certain advantage in their freshness and spirit over the mechanical reproductions of the other book, which are, however, in many respects more important. It is fortunate that these books do not repeat each other at all in the way of illustrations. The two together offer to the student a great deal of practical information about Dürer, such as he could not have hoped to get before in this country except at the cost of many hundred dollars. Indeed, the value to Americans of accurate reproduction of such works of art can hardly be overestimated. We have no British Museum Print Room to which we may resort for study.

A large part of the value of such books as these must always be found in illustration, because the greatest merit possible to such monographs is that they shall give a thorough idea of the subject. The only standard of comparison and judgment which one would set up for such works is simply the requirement that each shall tell us as much as possible about the subject. Apart from the pictures, then, what we want of these books is that they shall report that is known about Dürer's way of working, about his life, about the dates of his different works, his failures and successes, his travels, his own opinions and feelings on all subjects. Dürer, fortunately, has left some writings behind him as well as works of graphic art. The translating of some of this is an obvious duty of the book makers. Accordingly we find in each of the Lives the letters from Venice and the journal of his travels in the Netherlands, translated, in Mrs. Heaton's case, with great liberalness, and every now and then a phrase or word left untranslated because not rightly understood in the obsolete German—in Mr. Scott's case with what seems more freedom, but with the sense found in most of Mrs. Heaton's difficulties. The lady has interspersed the letters with rather long comments, which after all teach nothing and suggest little. Her book is rather too large, or at least too much space in it is given to the mere analysis of pictures, and to a chatty, letter-writing sort of talk about them and their author. Mr. Scott's book, on the other hand, is very brief. Less than two hundred pages, not large and in large type, contain the whole life, including the journal and letters. This is followed by a catalogue—of the pictures, copper prints, wood-cuts, and doubtful pieces—which is founded on and refers to both Bartsch and Heller, and seemingly is very complete.

It is not our object to compare, point by point, the two books, or either with the ideal book on the Life and Works of Dürer. In general terms, Mr. Scott's book is the more critical, more certain to be just in its views, more thorough. On the other hand, Mrs. Heaton's has the valuable reproductions of which we have spoken. The catalogue in Mr. Scott's book is of the greatest value, and is, we think, the first one of any completeness in the English language. To possess both will be easy to any book-buyer, so low are the prices, and both are of great importance to any student of art.

* Mr. Ruskin, in the Arundel Society's pamphlet to accompany the woodcuts of the Giotto Frescoes at Padua.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JANUARY.

THE last North American is certainly wanting in strictly literary interest, none of the six long articles relating to literature pure and simple, and the short articles being but two in number, and they being notices of semi-literary works. Mr. Pumpelly's "Across America and Asia," and Prof.

J. D. Whitney's "Geological Survey of California," both get "a good notice," if hardly a good review. But the fifty-odd pages of Mr. Goldwin Smith's "Ecclesiastical Crisis in England" contain a good deal of matter possessing literary interest. There is, for example, an elaborate criticism upon John Henry Newman, which both the friends and the enemies of that remarkable man will find worth attention; there are some remarks upon the character of Dr. Pusey, which we confess to having read with satisfaction; and there are incidental remarks on Mr. Liddon, Mr. Ffoulkes, Colenso, Mr. Maurice, Clough, Dean Stanley, Mr. Mansel, Mr. Jowett, Mr. Emmanuel Deutsch's famous Quarterly articles, Mr. Keble, Mr. Ward, Dr. Temple, Faber, the tracts of the Tractarians, and other men and works which have made great noise in the semi-literary, semi-religious England of the last half-century. Some of his remarks on Newman, however, seem to us to bear harder on that celebrated theologian than the facts of the case will quite warrant, and show some heat. The same thing may be said of many of his comments on the Ritualistic movement in general. The fact is, we should say, that, in his contempt for the Ritualists, Mr. Smith is always not overwisely willing to "free his mind" about them; whenever they appear in presence, they are as safe to get a rap as even the French emperor or the country clergymen in convocation.

There is no denying, however, that Mr. Smith has made a brilliant, instructive article; and one, so far as we know the facts, that is in the main and in all the essential particulars true. A reader will not need blind faith in Mr. Smith's infallibility as a guide, nor a share in his strong liking for the English reformers—or the English Reformation makers—nor his dislike of Anglicanism, in order to enjoy his epigrams; his characterizations of distinguished Englishmen of to-day and of the past; his tracing of the stream of history down which the English Church has come to us, and his forecasting of her future.

It is not to be denied, certainly, that Mr. Smith, if he is a fighting writer, hits hard, and perhaps none the less hard that he seems to enjoy his exhibition of skill and force. There may be two opinions as to that, however. Here is how he pays his respects to the Bishop of Jamaica: "When Governor Eyre was discharged by the squires who acted as ministers of justice at Market Drayton, the cheering was led by a clergyman; a Queen's chaplain carried away the palm of indecency at the Southampton banquet in honor of the same hero; and the Bishop of Jamaica himself came forward as an admiring supporter of the butcher of his helpless flock, in extenuation of which it may perhaps be said that the bishop had not himself witnessed the massacre, being a non-resident chief shepherd, and drawing his salary in England." And here he says something of the clergy and the Establishment in general: "It is needless to say that all this proves nothing against religion, nothing against Christianity, nothing against clergymen; it proves only that the union of Church and State makes the Church political without making the State religious."

Mr. Simon Newcomb writes an article entitled "The Let Alone Principle," which deals with the rudiments of the question, but which is not too rudimentary when we consider that, of all the hundreds of dollars in the country—a country, too, that is just entered on a term of study of the currency, the tariff, protection, free trade, usury, and prohibition—there are hardly a dozen who know the beginnings of the subject. Mr. Newcomb's article has a little of the doctrinaire stiffness and dryness in the first part of it, but much of the latter part is admirable for its clearness and its happiness of illustration.

"Indian Migrations," by Mr. Lewis H. Morgan, is for the student, and is not tempting to the general reader, unless he is willing to wade for a long time in deep sand before coming to the writer's conclusions. Such, of course, are important and interesting, for Mr. Morgan knows his subject, and the plausible solution of the problem of the origin of the Indians attracts the attention even of the more careless reader. As he indicated in his last article on the subject, Mr. Morgan seeks to prove that our red men came from Asia by way of the Pacific Gulf Stream—so to call it—and the Alaskan chain of islands; that, increasing and multiplying in the mild climate of the Columbian valleys, abounding and superabounding in fish, they moved South and East by way of the water-courses, till they over spread all the continent except the plains and prairies, and that these latter they occupied after the white man had come and brought with him the horse. Much evidence—not all of it, as we have hinted, of the most succulent kind, but some of it very readable—Mr. Morgan brings forward in support of this theory of his, and to us he seems to make out a case. All the various facts known of the Indian seem to range themselves easily and harmoniously under it.

The same thing cannot be said of Mr. James Fergusson's work on "Tree and Serpent Worship," which Mr. Karl Blind reviews at length in this number of the North American. The subject is very curious, however, and, despite the impression one gets that his journey with Mr. Fergusson is walking into the dark and into a world of uncertainties, one goes on with some pleasure.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Junior, who will by-and-by have to betake himself to pedestrian travel or the use of the horse, makes another onslaught on the railroads, and shows how they threaten the State and are rapidly becoming too powerful for anything but the national Government to cope with. He gives, also, an interesting chapter on the history of express companies—gigantic growths that, in the memory of men now living, and not old, were contained in the small germ of the one-horse wagon and the row-boat.

Mr. Gamaliel Bradford, in a well-written essay, reviews the last reports of Mr. Boutwell and Mr. Hulburd, the Comptroller of the Currency, and Mr. Boutwell will not be much pleased with Mr. Bradford's opinion of his financial policy. The writer remarks justly that we shall never see the financial business of the country carried on as it should be till the financial minister has ex officio a place in Congress, where he may propose and defend the measures which he deems necessary for the good of the Treasury.

In Both Worlds. By Wm. H. Holcombe, M.D., author of "Our Children in Heaven," "The Sexes, Here and Hereafter," etc. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870.)—We have nothing in the way of praise to say about Dr. Holcombe's new book. The two which preceded it we have not read, but their titles sufficiently indicate the line of speculation which they follow, and which is also pursued in the present volume. To our thinking, it is an utterly futile one, which tends only to produce and foster an unhealthy state of mind in those who are attracted by it; and in other people, to engender one which varies between amusement and pity. Nothing seems more certain than that between us and the future state an impenetrable veil is drawn, and that the efforts to pierce it are simply, so far as their results are concerned, an idle diversion of force from its proper channels. They give comfort to the bereaved, we are told, and we are not going to deny it; but their principal object appears to be the throwing of sops to a morbid and illegitimate curiosity. A profounder faith in the wisdom of the Creator, and a purer conception of the needs of the human soul, one would imagine to be good helps in aiding the sorrowing to dispense with spurious consolations; genuine sorrow seeming to be an emotion which brings those who feel it close to the realities of things, and makes it not easy for them to cheat themselves with illusions. But there is always likely to remain that hungry crowd of inquisitive and credulous readers who make the production of books like this, and the "Gates Ajar," and others of the same class, a profitable occupation.

As for Dr. Holcombe's present volume, though, we confess our doubts of its ability to edify greatly any class of readers. It is a story whose scene is laid in the dawn of the Christian era, and its hero is Lazarus of Bethany, who relates his own experiences in this world and the other. It is prefaced by a poorly invented account of the way in which the manuscript autobiography, which formed the basis of Dr. Holcombe's work, was discovered some years ago on the wonderfully preserved corpse of Lazarus himself, who, having been accidentally entombed in a cave, by a land-slide, had remained undiscovered for eighteen hundred years, when an old navy surgeon accidentally happened on him. Of course Dr. Holcombe never expected any sort of credence to be given to such a tale; but, since he saw fit to invent it, it is a sort of pity that his literary resources did not permit him to give a coloring of possible truth to the story which follows it. Instead of that, his workmanship is even conventionally modern, and his Lazarus has a much better acquaintance with Swedenborg's theories and those of the Spiritualism of to-day than with the modes of life and thought and speech of his own time, or with the doctrines of the Master whom he followed. The extracts we give seem to us to show an amusing degree of ignorance on Dr. Holcombe's part of the delicate position in which an author places himself, who chooses known characters and incidents as material with which he desires to bring that which is purely his own work into harmonious accordance:

"Ethopus accompanied me as my body-servant. We had taught the dumb African to read and write after he was released from the bondage of Magistus and Simon. He acquired these accomplishments in a moderate degree with great celerity, so that our anticipations of rapid mental progress were sadly disappointed by the result. When he reached the intellectual development of a white child at twelve years, his onward march was arrested. No study, no assiduity could advance him a step farther. He was organically a child. . . . Such is the general result of my observations and study of the African species. Susceptible as they are of a beautiful and indefinite moral culture, the development of their intellectual faculties is limited by the thick skull, the small brain, the black skin, which they have inherited as a national curse."

This was Lazarus's experience in this world, and on visiting the next he received an entirely satisfactory explanation of why it should be so. Emerging from the domain of the magicians in hell, he sees an immense dome of iron, which fills the sky, and casts a great gloom on all below it. He is informed that it is "the tomb of the antediluvian world, which none can open or shut but Christ." Furthermore, he hears that, "unless the Messiah had come in the flesh, this antediluvian sphere would have broken forth and deluged the world of spirits and the world of men;" the result being "the total suffocation of the spiritual life, as the natural life is suffocated by drowning; a complete torpor of the moral sense; a paralysis of the intellectual faculties. . . . The physical system would degenerate. The skin would become black and fetid; the hair woolly, the nose flat, the forehead low and debased. . . . This process of degeneration had already made sad havoc with a large portion of the human race, when the closure of the antediluvian hells and the institution of a new order of things arrested its march. So the African now stands torpid, unprogressive, sensual, barbaric, bearing on his very body the typical shadows of hell."

Lazarus tells us that, when he related this and other experiences of a like nature to Paul, and on the strength of them warned him of the errors which would arise from his preaching the Trinity, and inculcating such doctrines as that the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin, the saint shook his head and pronounced him insane—which, so far as Paul is concerned, is getting rather nearer to possible truth of representation than Dr. Holcombe often comes.

Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean; or, The Riviera, Mentone, Italy, Corsica, Sicily, Algeria, Spain, and Biarritz, as Winter Climates. By J. Henry Bennet, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Physicians, London. Fourth edition. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.)—After twenty-five years of medical practice, Dr. Bennet, exhausted with labor and the cares of his profession, felt himself succumbing to consumption, and in the autumn of 1859 repaired to Mentone, on the Genoese Riviera, there to spend his last days in quiet retirement. To his pleasant surprise, however, freedom, rest, and a most genial climate restored him to new life. In the following year, he sought for a still more favored locality among the cities of Central and Southern Italy, but was soon frightened back by their terribly unhygienic state into retired and healthy Mentone, which, annexed with Nice to France, had lately changed rule and slightly, even, its name. Gradually recovering, he adopted this place as a permanent winter professional residence, continuing his London consulting practice during the summer months. Every year, however, between the Riviera and London seasons, he employed a few weeks, in April and May, in excursions to other shores of the Western Mediterranean, with the view of discovering the best winter climate in that part of the world, for himself and other sufferers from pulmonary affections. The results of his experiences he first embodied in an essay, published in 1861, on the climate and vegetation of Mentone and its surroundings, which, by successive additions, eventually expanded into the volume before us, embracing, besides the original elaboration, sketches of parts of Italy, Spain, Southern France, Corsica, Sicily, and Algeria, sketches interesting not only to those meditating an excursion to the shores of the Mediterranean in search of health, but to all desirous of information concerning those lands. The sketch of Mentone and the Riviera is the most exhaustive, and that of Corsica the most interesting to the general reader; the chapters on Algeria and Spain give accounts of the journeys executed as late as the spring of 1869. The book is embellished by a number of fine illustrations, and by maps very neatly, though not quite as correctly, executed.

All these peregrinations have not impaired Dr. Bennet's original predilection for Mentone. He finds its dry, bracing atmosphere particularly beneficial "to those who require invigorating and vitalizing, to those who are suffering, like the phthisical, from defective nutrition and lowered vitality." In the earlier, still curable stages of phthisis, some spots in Eastern Spain alone might be found similarly beneficent. Only to those "highly nervous, excitable, impressionable constitutions that are too much braced and stimulated by the dry tonic atmosphere of the Riviera, and with whom the bracing, stimulating atmosphere of Cannes, Nice, Mentone, or of the east coast of Spain does not agree," he would recommend the temperate, sunny, and rather moist climate of some parts of Sicily, Corsica, or Algeria. As regards protection from cold winds, he, of course, finds no places of shelter preferable to those on the Riviera, and of all on the Riviera he considers Mentone the most excellent. His preference is founded on the following reasons:

"On no part of the coast do the mountains in the immediate vicinity rise in a chain to the same height—namely, from 3,500 to 4,000 feet. Nowhere do they recede in the same manner from the shore in an unbroken amphitheatre as it were, so as to completely shelter from the north, east, and west a hilly district such as the one which constitutes the centre of the Mentone amphitheatre. Nowhere, also, is there such a background of still higher mountains lying due north, so as to protect in its turn the semi-circular shore chain. This background of mountain-land extends fifty miles to the north into Savoy, and is limited only in that direction by the Tenda, a chain which rises from 7,000 to 9,000 feet. These higher mountains extend towards the shore in a south-easterly direction, and reach it at Finale, more than half way between Nice and Genoa. Thus between Genoa and Finale the mountains which skirt the shore are neither very deep nor very high, but between Finale and Nice the depth and height of back mountain-land constantly increase. Consequently, the amount of protection offered from the north increases in the same ratio, until at Mentone the greatest amount of shelter and undoubtedly the warmest climate of the entire Riviera is reached."

The above stated are the principal sanitary conclusions reached by our author on his investigating tours, and we trust he has reached them without any bias pro domo suâ on the Riviera. His non-medical descriptions and remarks—and these form a very considerable portion of the book—show him a man of general scientific culture and of liberal sympathies, not devoid of humor, poetic imagination, or learning. Modern history, however, is a rather slippery ground to him, as is shown by various chronological and other blunders contained in his allusions to Napoleon I., to King Emanuel of Italy, and to the last two Bourbons of Naples, the tyranny and fall of both of whom he himself witnessed, and whom—strangely enough—he calls "Ferdinand the First" and "Ferdinand the Second," instead of Ferdinand the Second and Francis the Second.

Dream Numbers. A Domestic Novel. By T. Adolphus Trollope. Author of "Gemma: A Tale of Love and Jealousy," "Nanetta; or, Life in Tuscany," etc. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers. 1869.)—"Dream Numbers" we have found more agreeable and better written than such others of its author's novels of Italian life as have fallen under our notice. Mr. Trollope is always careful and painstaking about his work, and his readers are apt to put confidence in the accuracy with which he delineates such scenes and characters as he selects. But he is often dull, and prosaic to the verge of commonplaceness, and, which seems to be a family trait, too apt to fall into a quite unnecessary fulness of detail and description, which add to the length of his books as much as they diminish from their interest. "Dream Numbers" is, however, freer from this fault than its predecessors, and, although it is not a novel which needs to be read, readers who are moderate in their requirements might do worse than undertake it.

Hints for Six Months in Europe. By John H. B. Latrobe. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—This duodecimo certainly possesses the merits claimed for it by the author, of being simply a programme for a summer tour through Europe, without any pretensions to the dignity of a book of travels. An American totally inexperienced in European travel may base on it some reasonable estimate as to what he may do in six months, and how much he can see in that time of parts of France, Italy, Austria, Saxony, Prussia, the Tyrol, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, England, and Scotland. Notwithstanding the author's protests, we incline to the belief that he entertained the idea of showing what he might do in the way of writing a book of travels, if he once set seriously about it.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Bungay (G. W.), Temperance Anecdotes	(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, Part 20, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Cowan (Dr. J.), The Use of Tobacco	(Cowan & Co.)	0 75
The Science of a New Life	" "	3 00
Deering (Dr. T. W.), Intemperance	" "	0 75
Dupuy (Miss E. A.), Why did he Marry her?	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
De Leon (E.), Askaros Kassis, the Copt: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 75
Di Beauclerk (Lady), True Love: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	1 25
Essex Institute Historical Collections, Vol. X. Part I., swd	(Salem)
Grote (G.), History of Greece, Vols. III., IV	(Little, Brown & Co.)	4 00
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), The Planter's Northern Bride: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Hopkins (J.), Second Collection of Church Music, swd	(Pott & Amery)
Jeffries (J. P.), Natural History of the Human Races	(S. R. Wells)	4 00
Leaves from a Trooper's Diary	(Philadelphia)
Morse (J. T., jr.), The Law relating to Banks and Banking	(Little, Brown & Co.)	6 00
Reynolds (L. E.), The Mysteries of Masonry	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	2 00
Scott (Sir W.), Guy Mannering	(Little, Brown & Co.)	1 75
Stiles (H. R.), History of the City of Brooklyn, Vols. I., II.	(Brooklyn)	10 00
Thomas (J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, Part 2, swd	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 50
The Workshop, No. 1, swd	(E. Steiger)	0 50
Walker (A. F.), The Vermont Brigade in the Shenandoah Valley	(Burlington)	1 50

Fine Arts.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETIES IN PHILADELPHIA.

It is now some thirty-five years since the Maennerchor, the oldest German singing society in the United States, was founded in Philadelphia, by Philip Wolsieffer. The germ then planted has borne rich fruit. The little chorus consisted of about a dozen gentlemen. There are now some twenty societies with 750 members, without including the passive members, who far outnumber the singers.

With the growth of the German population, and its constant craving for social enjoyment, such a result was inevitable. In the Quaker City, as elsewhere, the meeting-places of these societies are, in effect, club-rooms. The larger and more wealthy organizations give an annual ball, the preparations for which absorb much of their energy. They do but little singing outside of their club-rooms; rarely give a concert, unless in aid of some charity, and are never very much in earnest, in a musical sense, except when preparing for the prize concert at some Saengerfest. Festive gatherings at which jollity is always the chief aim, whether the music be excellent or otherwise, may contribute to the pleasures of those who participate in them, but it is not so clear that they accomplish much in the service of art. It is, perhaps, owing to the frequent sacrifice of Orpheus to Gambrinus that the German singers of Philadelphia have achieved less than they might have done. With a few honorable exceptions, the societies show but little evidence of a desire to improve. Another circumstance unfavorable to their progress is that most of them possess no female members, and are thus debarred from attempting the larger compositions which are written for a mixed chorus. In spite of these drawbacks, the Junger-Maennerchor (an offshoot of the Maennerchor) and the Saengerbund have been so well trained as to prove very formidable competitors of the New York Liederkranz, as the prize concert during the Baltimore Saengerfest fully proved.

Of the American societies, the first in order, as regards age or numbers, is the Handel and Haydn. It is under the leadership of Mr. L. Engelke, and gives some three or four concerts during the season. Whether it be owing to a lack of interest on the part of the public, or carelessness on the part of its members, it seems to have lost prestige. Even in its best days it never did anything very creditable, except in affording its audiences an opportunity to hear Parepa, and various other artists of acknowledged ability, in oratorio. Their concerts might have been made more interesting if Philadelphia only had a good, or even a tolerable, orchestra. With numerous clever instrumental performers, there is no permanent orchestral organization capable of giving a satisfactory recital of a symphony. The Philharmonic of New York has attained a degree of proficiency which it were unreasonable to seek here, and the playing of Theodore Thomas's orchestra came as a revelation, since which Philadelphians are painfully alive to their want of a good band.

The Mendelssohn Society, of which Mr. Jean Louis is conductor, is a younger organization, and, at one time, enjoyed great esteem. Why it has failed of success can be best answered by its own members. Even a good leader can accomplish but little when singers neglect rehearsals. Mr. Ritter's wail has been heard throughout the land, and there are many chorus-directors who sympathize with him.

Perhaps the most successful of all is the West Philadelphia Choral Society. It numbers about 120 ladies and gentlemen, and is directed by Mr. Peirson, an amateur of decided ability. It has given but one concert, to an invited audience, and, for its numbers, is acknowledged to be the best chorus in the city.

The Abt Society, of which Mr. A. R. Taylor is leader, numbers twenty-six gentlemen, who, it is presumed, are in earnest, since they resolutely enforce the rule that all who neglect rehearsals must be dropped. As a result, this little society offers the best male chorus in Philadelphia. It gives monthly concerts to its subscribers and invited guests.

The youngest of the sisterhood is the Beethoven Society, with Mr. Carl Wolfsohn as its conductor. It is a mixed chorus, numbering some eighty members. Aside from the study of chorus singing, the society aims at the creation of a Beethoven Stipendium, with the object of defraying the expense of a musical education for students who have talent and yet cannot afford to pay for instruction—a noble aim, truly, and one in which it deserves to succeed. Whether it is intended to give concerts we are as yet unable to say.

The Vocal Union, led by Mr. Wolsieffer, is a male chorus, numbering about as many members as the Abt Society.

Finally, there is the Amphion Club, which, although a social organization, devotes one or two evenings of every week to music. It also gives concerts with light, pleasing programmes. At these performances, which are always delightful reunions, there are very considerable re-enforcements of outsiders, without whose aid the concerts would be noticeable rather as social than artistic successes.

Among Philadelphia amateurs, there are many of great proficiency who cheerfully contribute to the success of the societies already established. Musical life is active enough, and musical circles are, in this country at least, nowhere more charming. The great need, however, is the presence of some one possessing the musical knowledge and the administrative ability required to combine forces, which are, at present, too much divided to accomplish anything very remarkable.

New Law Books.

Morse on Banks and Banking.

A Treatise on the Law of Banks and Banking; with an Appendix, containing the National Banking Act, with Decisions, etc. By John T. Morse, Jr. 8vo, $6.

Redfield's Leading American Railway Cases.

Leading Cases and Opinions upon most of the important questions involved in the Law of Railways, arranged according to subjects, with extensive Notes and References to the late Decisions. By Isaac F. Redfield, LL.D. 8vo, $7 50.

Redfield on Railways.

FOURTH EDITION.

The Law of Railways; embracing Corporations, Eminent Domain, Contracts, Common Carriers of Goods and Passengers, Constitutional Law, Investments, Telegraph Companies, etc., etc. By Isaac F. Redfield, LL.D., Chief-Justice of Vermont. Fourth Edition, greatly enlarged. 2 vols. 8vo, $15.

In this edition the topics of Common Carriers and Telegraph Companies form complete Treatises. In addition to these the work contains Compact Treatises on Corporations, Eminent Domain, Mandamus, Contracts for Construction, Certiorari, Quo Warranto, Equity Jurisdiction, Constitutional Questions affecting Legislative Grants; Investments, Stocks, Mortgages, Police, Amalgamation, etc., as well as all other matters in the law more exclusively affecting Railways.

PUBLISHED BY

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY,

110 Washington Street, Boston.

Valuable Publications.

MAN

IN GENESIS AND GEOLOGY;

Or, The Biblical Account of Man's Creation, tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., LL.D., of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. 12mo, 150 pages, $1.

Among the subjects treated are the following: Outline of Creation—Origin of the Universe—Meaning of the Word Day—Ancient Cosmogonies: The Creation of Man—Man the Image of God—The Head of the Creation: The Origin of Man—Progressive Order—Successive Creations of Species—Characteristics of Man—Man Distinguished by the Brain—The Dignity of Man: Man's Dominion over Nature—Serial Progression not Evolution—Links of Development—Laws of Nature—Instinct not a Reasoning Intelligence—A Typical Man—Owen on Species: The Antiquity of Man—Did the Human Race begin in Barbarism?—Antiquity of the Negro Race—Man the Latest and Highest Work—Some Recent Works on Man: The Sabbath Made for Man—The Glory of the Heavenly Host—Rest, the Suspension of Creative Energy—The Sabbath a Sanitary Provision: Woman and the Family—Marriage a Primeval Institution—Sex Fundamental in Human Society—The Family Founded in Love—Mutual Adaptation of the Sexes.

The Emphatic Diaglott;

Or, The New Testament in Greek, with a Literal Interlinear Translation, and a New Version in English. Muslin.....$4 00
The same work in fine binding..... 5 00

New Physiognomy;

Or, Signs of Character—as Manifested through Temperament and External Forms, and especially in the Human Face Divine. With more than 1,000 illustrations. By S. R. Wells. One large volume, handsomely bound. Muslin.... 5 00
Heavy calf, with marble edges, very fine..... 8 00
Turkey morocco, full gilt, an elegant present.. 10 00

Oratory, Sacred and Secular;

Or, The Extemporaneous Speaker. With a Chairman's Guide..... 1 50

Wedlock;

Or, The Right Relation of the Sexes—Disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection—Showing Who Should and Who Should Not Marry. Plain Muslin..... 1 50
The same, in fancy gilt binding, fine..... 2 00

For sale by all Booksellers, and sent by mail post-paid by the Publisher,

S. R. WELLS,

389 Broadway, New York.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1870.

The Week.

THE Census Bill, fruitof much study and labor, and designed to bring American statistics to something like the European standard of accuracy and comprehensiveness, received its quietus in the Senate on Wednesday week—forty-five of his colleagues joining Mr. Conkling in laying it on the table, and only nine opposing. The Act of 1850, therefore, remains in force; but it is reported that the Secretary of the Interior and General Walker, the new Superintendent of the Census, would like the President to recommend certain modifications, so as to get, if possible, the population returns before the fall elections. On Thursday, the Senate reached the Mississippi question, in a report from the Judiciary Committee proposing admission of the State without conditions. In the debate which ensued, Mr. Sumner again became a target for other Senators, and was assailed at once both by Messrs. Stewart and Trumbull. The debate has led to no action, though continued during the week. On Friday, Senator Sherman introduced resolutions urging recognition of Cuban belligerency, and a proclamation and observance of strict neutrality. Mr. Logan introduced similar resolutions in the House on Monday, and both have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The House had its personalities the same day with the Senate, Mr. Butler alighting upon Mr. Cox in a manner peculiar to himself. On Monday Mr. Loughbridge, of Iowa, offered a resolution to the effect that the business of the country demanded an increase in the volume of the circulating currency, and instructing the Committee on Banking and Currency to report a bill providing for such increase, in the sum of fifty millions of dollars. An attempt to lay this on the table was defeated by 93 to 73; but as the House was not prepared for a division, the vote can scarcely be taken to signify much.

There has been a good deal of Cuban excitement during the week, owing to the reported defeat of the Spaniards under General Puello, and to consequent speeches in Congress in denunciation of the Neutrality Laws. Whether Puello was defeated, and, if so, how much of a defeat he suffered, we confess we do not know, and have not yet heard of or read any testimony on the subject worthy of the smallest confidence. Indeed, we know of no reason for believing the Cuban cause to be any better off than it was a month ago. But the news roused the Cuban partisans into a good deal of activity, and led to the perpetration of an interview on Senator Sumner by the World reporter, with the result of extracting from him an opinion that Cuba was not a belligerent, that the Cabinet would not say she was, and that, if it did, Spain would declare war, and do us great damage.

In the Senate, Messrs. Carpenter and Howe, of Wisconsin, have made fierce assaults on the Neutrality Law, both being apparently under the amazing delusion that it is the Act of 1818 which prevents the Cubans from buying ships and arms in the United States, and that if it was repealed the rebels could get gunboats here as well as the Spaniards. The speeches in which this extraordinary doctrine was maintained were in the highest degree curious, as illustrations of the style of mental equipment with which some Senators nowadays go into debate. The Act of 1818 prevents the Cubans from doing nothing except fitting out hostile expeditions on American soil. They can buy in a commercial manner as many ships and as much munitions as they please, with or without the Act. The reason why they do not buy gunboats, as the Spaniards have done, is, first, that they have no money to pay for them, and, secondly, that they have no ports to take them to. The repeal of the Act would not help them in the least as far as this goes. That their case is one of peculiar hardship, as Senator Carpenter maintains, is quite true; that they are in a peculiar degree entitled to our sympathy is also true; and that it is open to the American people to go to war for their deliverance, and that this would be a generous thing to do, there is no denying. But the question of belligerency is a question of fact, and has nothing to do with sympathy. If we say we see an organized Government in Cuba, engaged in a regular war with the Spaniards, for the purpose of helping and encouraging it, when we don't see it, we simply tell a lie; and who are the Cubans that our Government should lie for them? Enough of that is done already by private gentlemen.

Mr. Buckingham, of Connecticut, did a good thing in his speech on Mr. Sherman's Currency Bill, by pointing out the errors which, he truly says, "have surrounded every measure which has been presented for the consideration of the Senate," and which we cannot do better than describe in his own words:

> "The first error consists in the idea that the country requires an amount of currency that can be determined by the wisdom of senators.
>
> "The second error is found in the opinion that each section of the country is entitled to a definite proportion of currency which can be determined and apportioned by statute law.
>
> "The third error consists in the belief that we can make an equitable distribution of currency based upon population and upon the resources and business of the country, as ascertained by the census."

At the bottom of these three is another—the belief that currency is capital; and that, therefore, if you put currency into a place you put capital, the fact being that currency is simply an instrument for moving capital about, and which a neighborhood that has no capital will not and cannot keep.

The vote on the admission of Mississippi in the Senate, or, rather, on the proposition to postpone the consideration of it to something else, indicates a desire to keep it out, on the part of the same portion of that body which tried to keep Virginia out, though for what purpose it would be hard to say. That Mississippians, any more than Virginians, who do not think well of common schools now, will ever be brought to do so by keeping the State out of the Union, nobody seriously believes; or that true and hearty allegiance to the United States can be had in this way, nobody believes either. The rival Georgian factions have their deputies in Washington, blackening each other's characters furiously. The Bryants accuse Bullock of theft, while the Bullocks accuse Bryant of a corrupt leaning to the Democrats; but General Terry believes in Bullock and doubts Bryant, and, in the meantime, the State makes some progress towards Reconstruction, by the calling up, once more, of the senators' credentials.

A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that we have not done what we ought to have done, and have intended doing, and only failed to do a fortnight ago through an oversight, viz., mention that Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, has formally denied the charge which various papers, the Nation included, made against him, of being personally interested in coal and iron works. His own testimony on such a point would of course be sufficient to set the charge at rest, even if it were not corroborated by that of his friends. But it would greatly add to the pleasure with which we make this atonement if his own experience of these injurious suspicions made him more careful—indeed, made him in the least careful or scrupulous in making far worse charges against others. There is nothing dreadfully bad in a Pennsylvania member of Congress owning iron-works or coal-mines; the fact that he does, simply weakens the force of his arguments as a protectionist, and therefore ought to be known; but there would be something unutterably base in Mr. D. A. Wells's taking "British gold" to make his reports favorable to English interests—a charge for which Mr. Kelley has not, and does not pretend to have, a particle of proof, and yet which he has had no hesitation in maki[illegible] again and again, in a place, too, where his victim could not reply to him. But, of course, even a man who does this is entitled to justice at everybody's hands; for justice is for sinners as well as for the righteous. He is, we are informed, going to decline a renomination, or, if re-elected, is going to devote himself to the reform of the Civil Service. He owes a good deal to the Civil Service, for he has done much to degrade it, by showing that neither character, nor ability, nor knowledge can secure anybody who enters it from scurrilous defamation. It will be some time, we suspect, before another man of Mr. Wells's standing will undertake any such duty as that with which he has been charged during the last four years.

In Pennsylvania politics the most notable event is the defeat of a Metropolitan Police bill for Philadelphia, which would have given over the control of the city to a commission named by the Republican members of the Legislature; and, while it might have subserved good government, would probably have been still more favorable to partisan ends. The Governor's message conveying his veto takes lofty ground—not very far removed in some places from clap-trap—against usurpation, and autocracy, and the wrong proposed to a "brave and generous people;" and it seems unlikely that any new bill can be framed which will not in principle fall under Gov. Geary's objections. The Legislature was imprudent enough to deprive him of any share in appointing the commission; and as it had already irritated him by refusing to increase his salary or to print his message, he was in the mood for a veto, and the veto came. A better argument than any he advanced against the bill would have been the experience of this city, which has shown that though a metropolitan police, as wisely organized and directed as ours, will, while it lasts, preserve better order and do more for local self-government than any municipal police can do, it is still but a make-shift, and bears the same relation to permanent reform that an act of Congress does to a constitutional amendment. Let there come an election at which the party triumphs which would never share places on a police board or a registry board, and the metropolitan system is either abolished, as our new city charter proposes, or becomes another instrument of misrule and terror.

The Illinois Staats-Zeitung disputes, in an article which we were unable to notice last week, the accuracy of our conclusions with regard to the condition of the United States credit in Europe. It alleges that anybody who says what we said (January 27), with regard to the standing of the United States credit on the European exchanges, must either be greatly wanting in scrupulousness and love of truth, or unable to calculate the rate of interest. We can assure the Staats-Zeitung that the case does not call for any such harrowing alternative. The list it gives of the various Government securities, by which it shows that the credit of the United States stands fifth in order, and above that of Austria, Italy, Portugal, and Spain, not to speak of Turkey and Egypt, proves nothing whatever for the purposes of this discussion. In fact, it would be hard to produce a better illustration of the way in which figures may be made to support a fallacy. The United States have never repudiated; have never, except during the war, had a deficit; nay, have a constant surplus; have a population which doubles in twenty-five years, almost limitless extent of fertile soil, and no standing army, and are rapidly reducing their debt. No state in the world can make such an exhibit. Their credit should stand first on the list; it stands fifth. Why so? Austrian securities bring nine per cent.—that is, only two and a half more than American securities, though Austria has had a deficit regularly for about forty years, is a conglomerate of discordant nationalities, and is in yearly danger of total dissolution, and has, within three years, forcibly reduced the interest on her bonds. This difference in the material facts ought to be represented by a difference of six per cent. in the interest. We might apply the same argument with still greater force to the case of Italy, Spain, and Portugal. The mere fact that the United States can borrow at lower rates than these powers tells us little. The question is, can they borrow as much lower as their material condition and their financial history appear to warrant? They cannot, nor anything like it. In short, the rate of interest alone is a very defective indication of the comparative credit of a government. We have to take into account also the facts on which the rate of interest is based to get at the real state of the case. If it appeared that A. T. Stewart could only borrow money one or two per cent. lower than a firm of Wall Street speculators, who had failed about a dozen times, and were daily engaged in "shinning" in order to meet their engagements, people would laugh a good deal if Mr. Stewart went about boasting that his credit was better than that of Burst, Up & Co.; and the fact that his was so poor would, in view of his known wealth, be taken as a proof that he was popularly believed to be a knave, and this is just the impression that some Congressmen have succeeded in diffusing in the European markets about the United States.

That their credit has improved we do not deny. If the close of the war and the yearly surplus did not bring it a long way from where it stood in 1864, it would show that the world was out of joint. We venture to say it could be put alongside that of France and England in three years, by the exclusion of certain persons from Congress, and the restriction to a responsible Minister or Committee of Finance of the privilege of bringing in currency, funding, loan, and taxation bills. The very multiplicity of these bills, brought in as they are by all sorts of men, and the amount of attention they receive in Congress and from the press, shakes the confidence of the moneyed men of the world in American finance, and leads them to expect anything or everything in the way of folly or absurdity and violent change. They cannot perceive any thread of policy, principle, or responsibility running through this mass of confusion. The mere plan of "diffusing the currency," by getting people to set up banks in the West and South with their own money, which has just been enacted, and of which Mr. Sherman is the proud and happy father, is enough to muddle the brains of the shrewdest London or Amsterdam banker, and make him put his money into Turkish eleven and a half per cents. sooner than United States sevens, much less fours or fives. "The Turk and Spaniard," he will say, "are lazy, shiftless rascals; but I know pretty well what they will do next. What Sherman, Butler & Co. will do next, the Lord only knows."

The Superior Court of Cincinnati have given judgment in the "Bible in the Schools" case, making perpetual the temporary injunction heretofore granted, restraining the School Board of Cincinnati from carrying into effect its recent resolutions, prohibiting the reading of the Bible or any religious exercises in the schools. The majority of the Court held that the Christian religion was recognized by the Constitution as the basis of the social system of the State, and the Bible as the revelation of that religion; that on no other ground can blasphemy be held to be criminal; that the reading of the Bible is, nevertheless, not worship; that without its teachings, however, we have "no unvarying code of morals or of human duty;" and without it "there would be no standard, and each man would be a law unto himself," and that the resolutions of the Board "were a sweeping edict, leaving the pupils not only without a hope, but without a God." The theological discursus of the Court cannot but be regarded as unfortunate in every respect for the settlement of the question, as there is hardly one of its propositions which will bear examination, or which a Catholic, Jew, or Rationalist will not vehemently dispute. The very authority and value it claims for the Bible, and the influence it ascribes to it in morals, will add fresh fuel to the flame of Catholic zeal—for everything the Judges ascribe to the Bible, Catholics ascribe to the Church only; and if the Bible does for the pupils all the Court says it does, the more reason there is why a good Catholic should not allow his children to hear it read. Sound policy, if not duty, prescribed to the Court as close an adherence to the law of the case, and as steady avoidance of theological speculation, as possible. We have never yet heard or read of a discourse on matters pertaining to religion from the judicial bench that was not calculated to make the judicious grieve and the scoffer laugh. We are now fairly in for one of the most exciting questions the country has ever had to deal with. The case, of course, goes up on appeal.

Judge Tafft read a dissenting opinion, maintaining that, while the Constitution, holding religion, morality, and knowledge to be essential to good government, left the means of promoting them to the Legislature, and the Legislature left the kind of instruction to be given in the common schools to the Board of Education, and while it does not appear that either the Constitution or Legislature contemplated special religious instruction in schools as necessary to secure religion, and may be presumed to have regarded "all sound knowledge as promoting morals and religion," it cannot be said that the Bill of Rights had specially the Protestant religion in view; and that any prescription of religious instruction in the schools to which Jews and Catholics have conscientious objections is in the nature of a penalty inflicted on those sects; that it was not a constitutional idea, in Ohio, that the scruples of a rationalist, spiritualist, or even atheist were not conscientious, and that exclusion even of him from the benefit of the school funds was an exercise over those funds of that "sectarian control" which the Constitution expressly forbids.

One of the most promising signs in the Reconstruction process is an interchange of amenities which lately took place in the United States District Court at Richmond between Judge Underwood and Mr. Henry A. Wise, some time Governor and more recently rebel general, who appeared as counsel at the bar in an action for damages for injuries sustained on board a steamer. The Court opened the proceedings by a short sketch of the learned Judge's own life, beginning with his appearance in Virginia, as a teacher, thirty-seven years previously, and then describing with some minuteness the delights of the intercourse he had enjoyed with Governor Wise in a political canvass. After mentioning his own marriage, and his anti-slavery troubles, and other incidents in his checquered career, his Honor gradually came down to Mr. Wise's general character and acquirements, of which he gave the audience a glowing description, excusing his unsoundness on the slavery question by ascribing it to his unfortunate education, by which the Court, had it received it, would doubtless have been led into the same errors. Here Mr. Wise arose, and after enquiring in an unfeeling way what slavery had to do with the law of common carriers, entered into an animated discussion with his Honor on the question of Reconstruction, about which they appeared to hold opposing views, and, after appealing to the Judge to help him to take the "manacles" off the white men of the South, protested violently against the motion for a new trial, which was the original cause of this touching scene, and, after expressing in strong terms his personal affection for the Court, sat down. The exact order of the proceedings does not appear in the report, so that we are unable to say whether Judge Underwood gave judgment before Mr. Wise's argument, or after, or whether the whole thing was not simply an obiter dictum. The lawyers were somewhat astonished by it, and no wonder, considering the cold, heartless character which legal proceedings have hitherto had. We look forward to see the day when the tedium of every trial will be lightened by instrumental music, an occasional song or anecdote from the bench, and perhaps readings or recitations now and then from female members of the bar, and the introduction of a baby or two to be passed round towards lunch-time.

The news from Rome, after a period of some dulness, grows more interesting. The long-talked-of petition from the bishops in favor of the declaration of the Pope's infallibility has at last been signed by about 500 bishops. There are said to be three petitions in all, of different degrees of faith: one asking that "the authority of the Supreme Pontiff" be pronounced "not liable to error;" another asking that he be declared "infallible in all matters of faith and morals;" and the third asking that he be declared infallible, and absolute judge of all things whatsoever—the Spanish bishops being the supporters of this last-named demand. As to what is meant by "infallibility," the heretics, and newspaper writers, and rationalists have been showing their ignorance abominably. It ought to be understood, it appears, by these ignoramuses, that nobody considers the Pope infallible or impeccable as a man, or even as a bishop, or even as Pope. His liability to error continues until he begins to speak to the whole Church "ex cathedrâ;" but then he can by no possibility make a mistake. But when does he speak "ex cathedrâ," or, rather, how is the world to know when he is speaking "ex cathedrâ?" What are the marks of this particular relation to the church and the world? Here the fog by which the subject is surrounded grows deeper than ever; for at this point the remorseless Dr. Döllinger, one of the most learned, if not the most learned, Catholic theologians, who is more than suspected of being "Janus," appears on the scene, and, taking hold of the bishops' petition, deals cruelly with it.

He says, in the first place, that the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility has not been taught or believed by the Church in any age, and, therefore, is no part of Catholic truth (quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus) which always, everywhere, and by all has been believed; that if the Pope is only infallible when he addresses the whole Catholic Church, then his teachings for thirteen hundred years are probably erroneous, and will have to be abrogated, as they have none of them been delivered ex cathedrâ, in the sense now attached to that phrase, but were addressed to particular persons, or bishops. Moreover, the Pope never heard of his being infallible till 1562, the first rumors of it only reaching him in that year, so that he could not have complied with the various conditions required to give his utterances the character of pure truth. Worse still, the Councils have always examined the Pope's teachings, and adopted them or not as they pleased. Finally, Dr. Döllinger boldly declares that the movement for the adoption of the dogma is of Jesuit origin, that it is the Jesuits who began the agitation for it, and who have been preaching through their various organs that it was for this the Council was called together. He adds that the Catholic catechisms, and other religious books, will all have to be altered if it is adopted, as under it the Catholic Church will fall into the background, and one man take its place in the eyes of the faithful.

The infallibilist bishops, speaking in their petition of those who deny the validity of the Council of Florence, declare, according to the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, "blaterare non erubescunt;" that is, that they do not blush to spread abroad certain views in a cackling, garrulous, and foolish manner; or, in other words, are not ashamed of being blatherskites, an imputation which will astonish a good many gentlemen at Washington who glory in blattering, and, so far from blushing over their rubbish, get it printed, and then circulate it at their own expense. If we might make so bold, and had any chance of being heard, we would suggest to the proper authorities at Rome a short and easy method of dealing with the newspaper correspondents would be that prescribed by the old English Statute of Westminster, I., cap. 34, whereby it is provided that "none be so hardy as to tell or publish any false news or tales, whereby discord, or occasion of discord, or slander may grow between the king and his people, or the great men of the realm; and he that doth so, shall be taken, and kept in prison, until he hath brought him into court who was the first author of the tale."

The newspaper correspondents do not go quite unscathed. Archbishop Manning has preached a sermon against them at Rome, in which he denounces them severely for saying the Council is not unanimous; but the devil, nevertheless, persists in instigating them to say that a counter-petition has been signed by 140 bishops against the infallibilist dogma. That the infallibilist party are somewhat nervous about the possible effect of the promulgation of their doctrine on the relations of the Holy See with France is inferred from the despatch of the Archbishop of Algiers on a secret mission to Paris, his object being, it is supposed, to find out whether it would not be possible to frame the dogma in such terms as to satisfy the Jesuits, without alarming the French lawyers about the Concordat, and thus precipitating the withdrawal of the French garrison. There are rumors of an intention to make a belief in the legitimacy of the temporal power also necessary to salvation, so that anybody who advocated the annexation of Rome to the kingdom of Italy would be sure of everlasting damnation. He is exposed to it already, but, if we are not mistaken, his case is not desperate.

THE LEGAL TENDER DECISION.

Those who read the opposing opinions of Chief-Justice Chase and Judge Miller on the legal tender case, must have felt that whatever the defects in the reasoning of the former, or the awkwardness of his position in having to condemn on the bench what he had actually done and tried to justify as Secretary of the Treasury, the moral right was on his side. The sacredness of contracts is of vital importance to mankind; indeed, their enforcement is one of the great objects of civilized society. Men ought to be made to pay what they agreed and expected to have to pay. Their escape from this obligation, through the laxity of the laws, is a great misfortune; but their escape through the connivance, and even with the encouragement of the government, is a still greater misfortune—indeed, one of the greatest that can befall a nation. We do not hesitate to say, that the prevailing laxity in commercial morals, the rise of notorious cheats into positions of fame and wealth, and the prostration at their feet of large masses of private property, is largely due, not simply to the spirit of speculation bred by the issue of irredeemable paper, but to the sanction given by the law to the wholesale cheating by fraudulent debtors which was the direct result of the Legal Tender Act. Everybody who paid off in paper during the war a debt which he had contracted in gold, and found that he had saved forty, fifty, or a hundred per cent. in the process, we may be sure was ever after a worse man than he had previously been, and that his influence on every one with whom he dealt was worse.

In fact, a better device for loosening the bonds of social morality than the Legal Tender Act could hardly have been hit upon. As far as the Government was concerned, it was simply a forced loan; but forced loans, though very high-handed measures, and necessarily unjust in various ways, do not blunt the public conscience. The Government takes what it cannot do without, as it takes taxes, and takes it unequally, as it takes conscripts; but it takes it for the good of all, and with the intention of repaying it. When, instead of raising forced loans, it issues legal tenders, it disguises the real nature of the transaction, by granting a license to divers persons to defraud their creditors of large sums, of which no part goes to the public treasury, and by diffusing the loss over a wider area than would be possible if it openly levied contributions. But, stripped of all technical covering, to make depreciated paper a proper satisfaction of private debts, was simply to sell indulgences to cheats, in order to secure the means of carrying on the war. Judge Miller compares it to the incidental loss which takes place when the value of property is changed by a declaration of war, or the raising or lowering of the tariff; but this is surely a delusive comparison. The only exact parallel would be the assumption by Congress, on declaring war, of the right to permit anybody who enlisted in the army to plunder his neighbors, before joining his corps, to the amount of a certain percentage of the value of his own property, or of the right to permit all persons affected by the raising or lowering of the tariff to deduct a large percentage from all debts due by them. It is not the depreciation of property which it causes which is the great objection to the Legal Tender Act—it is the mode of depreciating it.

On the point whether Congress or the Courts have the right of deciding what means are necessary and proper for the exercise of the war power, we suspect most people will agree with us in thinking that Judge Miller had the best of the argument. Society has become such a complicated machine; its interests are so vast, and varied, and delicate; the influences which affect them so numerous and difficult of comprehension; and wars have become so largely contests of money, machinery, and scientific skill, that there is probably no more difficult problem submitted to the human mind in our day than the best means of bringing into play the whole of a nation's power of offence and defence. How to raise armies in a modern commercial community without fatally deranging industry; how to get money to support them without plunging business into confusion and disheartening the people, at a crisis when everything depends on the people's keeping up its courage, are problems now which include nearly the whole art of government. There is no way of submitting them to the decision of a court of law; a court which was competent to pass on them would no longer be a court. They are essentially questions of legislation, and have to be decided by those considerations of expediency which, to a legislature, are everything—to a legal tribunal, nothing, or next to nothing. Chief-Justice Chase, and the judges who agreed with him, quâ judges, did not have them before them when he wrote his opinion. There was and is no way of getting them before them. Counsel could not state in argument, or put into the pleadings, all the influence which led Congress, in 1862, to pass the Legal Tender Act, or all the circumstances on which its decision was based, and consequently the Court could not possibly form a correct judgment on the necessity of the measure to the proper conduct of the war, even if the judicial habit of mind was not one which disqualified men for the performance of any such task.

Well, what then? Was the judgment of Congress final, or has the Court anything whatever to say about the matter? Undoubtedly it has. The business of the Court is to interpret the Constitution; and even if it be true, as many people believe, that the Constitution impliedly permits Congress to declare other things than gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts, it does not follow that it permits it to license debtors to pay off their debts by offering something of less value than they agreed to pay. Legal tenders are one thing, depreciated legal tenders are another thing; and no Court can be expected to declare cheating lawful, unless it is plainly and unmistakably obliged to do so by the recognized decrees of the sovereign authority. Congress may have power to declare potatoes a legal tender, but no Court can infer from this that a man who agreed, before they were issued, to deliver a bushel's worth of them to his debtor, is justified in only delivering him half a bushel's worth. The Court can very well say, and does say, that it knows nothing of legislative necessity, but that it does know that nothing but express direction would justify it in declaring lawful and justifiable the evasion of a clear moral obligation.

Moreover, even supposing the Legal Tender Act was necessary at the time; supposing even that the permission to cheat creditors was necessary at the time, that does not make it necessary now. That a man who, in January, 1862, agreed solemnly to pay one hundred dollars in gold in January, 1870, should be allowed when the time came to pay only seventy-five dollars in gold, is surely not "necessary" to the proper conduct of a war which ended in 1865, or to the salvation of a nation which was never more flourishing or vigorous, and which, if it runs any risk at all, owes it to the weakening of the individual moral sense. Many things which will not bear the moralist's examination have to be done in war; the concessions he ought to make to the exigencies of armed conflict are amongst the darkest problems in ethics, but then no such concession should be stretched one inch or one minute beyond the occasion which calls for it. If necessity knows no law, there is all the greater reason for getting rid of necessity at the earliest practicable moment.

As to the future effect of the decision in limiting the powers of Congress, we think the safest plan now is to do right, and leave the future to Providence. Let us stop at once all cheating we can stop. If cheating be ever again necessary to the salvation of the country, we may be sure it will be done, the Supreme Court decision to the contrary notwithstanding. If, which is wildly improbable, the national existence should ever again be placed in the peril in which it stood in 1862, we may be quite sure there will be a Congress and people who will do what the case requires. Our duty is to set an example of justice and good faith, and of respect for the sanctity of promises. This is the very best legacy we can leave to posterity, and there is no surer way of relieving the Government from ever again having to issue legal tenders than paying off rapidly those now in existence—that is, resuming specie payments.

TOWN FOLLIES.

"There are towns in this State now," says the Chicago Tribune, "which have voted railroad debts amounting to 50 per cent. of the assessed value of all the real and personal property therein." "Mr. Allerton, to-day," says an Albany despatch of February 4, "introduced the old State Aid Railroad Bill of last year, which proposes to give all railroads now constructing in the State $4,000 per mile for every mile completed within the next two years." During the years 1868 and 1869, two cities and eighty-three small towns in Massachusetts were authorized by the Legislature to subscribe over $6,000,000 in aid of railroad construction, besides $12,000,000 of indebtedness incurred by the State itself for the same end. Similar violations of the fundamental principle of our political system might be cited from every quarter. Congress sets the example by donating millions, and the youngest township of the West hastens to follow it, by pledging its credit for thousands. We began our career as a nation on another theory. With us, at least, private persons and private interests were to be left to work out their destiny in their own way. The Government was to confine itself to its simple functions, chief among which was provision for external defence and internal order, while for all else it accepted a policy expressed in the two forcible words, "Hands off!"

The recent and frequent violations of this policy have at least gone far to vindicate its wisdom. From the moment these fundamental rules were disregarded, the republican form of government has shown itself more and more cumbersome and unwieldy. It has proved that its machinery was not intended for interference in all the affairs of life. With us, under the present dispensation, the voice of the majority, speaking through the caucus, undertakes to decide how much or how little "currency" the community requires—what special interests are to be fostered—when and where railroads are to be constructed. By degrees, a government designed to fulfil only the simplest functions has had the most complex thrust upon it. As a result, we more and more enjoy, in contemplation, such noble announcements of "ring" and "caucus" wisdom as our present protective system, or the formidable liabilities incurred by towns for railroads, or that usual announcement, "Currency very hard to get; gold at 120."

The particular abuse we now propose to deal with, however, is the construction of new railroads with public money. A railroad mania may be looked for about once in every fifteen or twenty years. While the law of supply and demand is left free in its operations, the amount of mischief wrought by these means is comparatively limited. A certain proportion of bubbles burst, a certain number of fortunes are ruined, a certain amount of misery is inflicted; things then right themselves, the bankrupt railroads pass into the hands of the shrewder members of the community, and the sponge of insolvency wipes away the load of indebtedness. There are as yet no insolvent courts for towns, counties, and States. Railroads constructed by them may pass into private hands, but the evidences of indebtedness are already there before them. Who, then, must meet demands for interest and principal when due? These are not now wiped out by the transfer of property, and the land, of course, must ultimately pay the debt. Individuals and personal property will always forsake an unduly taxed locality; land can neither be removed nor concealed. As the article in the Tribune, already quoted from, goes on to say: "Men will not live in towns or counties to labor for bond-holders; and deserted villages, abandoned towns, and lands no longer cultivated, will repeat the story of the curse and blight of an unrestricted power to borrow money."

The lesson is a deeper one. It is not alone "the unrestricted power to borrow money" which has worked, and is working, this mischief with us. It is rather the meddling of Government in matters which are none of its concern—the substituting the voice of the majority for the hard, calculating instinct of the moneyed man—the interference, in a word, with the law of supply and demand. If Government is to regulate these matters, it must be framed to do so effectively. An autocrat, surrounded by trained ministers and an army of educated engineers, might specify the where, the how, and the when; let a republican majority attempt it, and it will only tumble into an unruly town meeting, where its voice will be drowned in the shrieks of greedy rings.

It was the war which made debt fashionable. It may almost be said that majorities then got a taste of money as well as of blood, and bonded indebtedness was found a most effective way of raising funds. For a time every locality seemed to think it had come across a hitherto undiscovered Pactolus. It was easy—it was more than easy—it was pleasant, and gave one a gratifying sense of importance to vote some public improvement, the cost of which went into a tax levy. The day of settlement seemed very distant—it might never come; to many it certainly never would come. A new social theory seemed thus to be evolving itself, in which the community was but a grand co-operative association, with property in common, the assessments on which were to be made in the name of taxation. The majority was to decide what was needed, what would be useful, what, indeed, would be profitable. Thus railroads were built, currency was regulated, and copper and pig-iron were protected. The result, so far as railroads are concerned, was soon seen in a crédit mobilier at Washington; in repudiation of county bonds in the North-west; in cities in Illinois, "once flourishing, but now practically in jail;" and in the Boston, Hartford, and Erie managers elbow deep in the Treasury of Massachusetts.

As usual, the evil, in its own rough way, seems working a partial cure; sometimes it is through repudiation, sometimes a constitutional restriction is attempted, or, more frequently, a statute remedy is sought. Certain counties in Iowa are even now trying their hands at the first, Illinois is considering the second, and Massachusetts is experimenting with the last. The story of this Iowa attempt at repudiation, with all its details of popular dishonesty and judicial turpitude, is too long to be told here. The Illinois Constitutional Convention now has under consideration a clause prohibiting both Legislature and municipalities from creating corporate indebtedness except for corporate purposes, and then, even, only under strict limitation as to amount. This and this alone would strike at the root of the evil, and constitute a notice, binding on the money-lenders of the world. The Massachusetts remedy is less effectual. That State, having wallowed into an eight or ten million "job" for the more effectual development of Central and Western Connecticut, is beginning to entertain doubts as to whether the public money should be perfectly accessible to all private parties without regard to character. The earliest manifestation of this sentiment is seen in an attempt to put up the bars, which the legislation of the few last years had effectually prostrated, around the town treasuries. The pockets of all the railroad exploiters of that State have now for some years been crammed with public money. Where a Hoosac tunnel or a Hartford and Erie job was not accessible, half-a-dozen country towns, with a city like Springfield or Worcester flung in, would stay the stomachs of some greedy band of railroad cormorants in default of fatter game. The question of granting or withholding town subscriptions to railroads has, under recent legislation, been settled by a majority vote in open town meeting, without the use of the written ballot or the check-list. In place of this, the Legislature now proposes to substitute a two-thirds vote, by written ballot, under guard of the check-list. The move, though in the right direction, is but a single step. If Government must meddle—if it can no longer be made to confine itself to its proper functions—if it will take from me and give to another, then the rule here found good as regards railroads would be found good as regards all things else. A similar limitation might and should be placed on all appropriations of public money to every private use. Whenever the State or a county or a town wishes to apply the proceeds of the tax levy or to incur debt for any other than a strictly corporate purpose, whether it be of utility, of benevolence, of display, or of profit, running through the whole list of subjects mendicant, from a religious library to a swindling railroad, in each and every case, whether the donation is made by direct, popular action or through a delegated authority, it may safely be asserted that a two-thirds affirmative vote is the least protection which the public safety requires.

NOTES ON THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS AGITATION.

NO. III.

BY A LOOKER-ON.

In our former papers we have noticed such objectionable theories and unsound positions on each side of the woman controversy as had chanced particularly to impress us—which was a simple matter of recording one's views and sentiments; but in approaching now the particular question of suffrage, which is the head and front of the organized action of the new movement, we find ourselves in some difficulties of special ignorance as well as a haze of general doubt. We have wished to imply our earnest sympathy with all those who are laboring to throw down the college walls to women; to interest them more generally in the world's serious thought and activities; we certainly rejoice, also, in the present signs of a more thoughtful enquiry into what are the real and what the factitious limitations of woman's labor; but when it comes to the question of her political enlargement—we stop short. Not in absolute rejection, but in a state of mind very far from enthusiastic desire. It is likely that we shall be quite unable to formulate in any arguments that will not be for a derision to the believers this non-eagerness for the ballot, nevertheless, we propose to declare, with what definiteness may be, our indefinite apprehensions, since however it is with their substance, the shadow of them doth seriously becloud that attractive glory which others see in the polls.

The thing that earnest women desire to-day for their sex is more real efficiency and not more conspicuous shamming. Precisely our dissatisfaction with the past is that we have been led therein to too much shamming. "This day let us make a sound beginning, for what we have hitherto done is naught"—the old monk's word of the far-off ages is the word we devoutly echo. Comparing our work with men's in fields where it can be compared, we feel that it has wanted the quality of thoroughness; that things have been wont to be grasped in their length, breadth, and thickness by the other sex, as not by ours; and whatever new fields we are now to enter, it is our supreme desire to enter them, meaning business. And our dread is that women are not going to mean much business when they go into politics.

It is a very simple matter to deposit a vote. The adjective unwomanly is certainly a very ridiculous adjective to attach to such an act in itself. The nondescript female, wearing an enormous dickey and a stovepipe hat, bending with awful brows and rigid, outstretched hand over a ballot-box, while an equally nondescript man hangs in limp and awkward despair over the bawling baby at home—these figures serve to enliven tableaux and charades for our village fairs, but they have no other existence in any sensible mind. We know very well that there is not in woman, or man either, power or inclination to reverse the "spheres."

We are as fully convinced, also, that women could go out on election day, if it became their business to go out, without coming home in material or moral wreck. American men are not in the habit of saluting American women with brickbats or ill words or manners; and we are altogether sure that if the polls were open to her sex by law, that superfine being, "the most delicate female," could go thither and return with the full complement of her delicacies unreduced. We even admit the strong probability that the sharing of this proverbial lady and her sisters in the performance of the day would make it one of better behavior. And we suppose that whatever difficulties arose in ill quarters from the voting of women could be regulated by the firm measures which are taken to regulate other evils mixed with good.

But we take it that woman's agency in politics would not be limited to voting on election day. Women would be eligible to office, and some of them would soon hold it. With reference to this contingency, we have first to declare our impression (subject, of course, to correction) that as a rule the best women of the country would not seek or accept these honors. It may be answered that neither are the superior men of the country in the ranks of its politicians. True; but some of them are. We hear much of the incapacity and corruption of statesmen, but we suppose there is considerable salt of brains and honor, even in Washington and at the State capitals, else things would go at once to pieces in that death which is the sure end of complete disease. No, we fear that the proportion between the competent and the charlatans among female politicians would be even smaller than among the male; and does the grand army of the pretenders anywhere in this world need reinforcement? Moreover, we fear this new order of pretenders would be an especially perplexing one. We suppose the sham men who get into Congress receive a pretty good cudgelling before they get out, which profitable chastisement could not be similarly extended to the short-coming ladies. Could it? That is one of our questions.

We would put this question a little more fully. We premise again that we are in a night of ignorance on these matters. Congressional and legislative debates are unknown to us save in the newspapers; but with such idea as we have of them, the idea of the habitual participation therein of the two sexes does not well cohere. We are aware, of course, that the forcible elements of discussion do not reside in violence of speech and fury of wrangling, but quite the contrary; nevertheless, taking the world as it is, and not as it should be—taking, especially, this conglomerate American republic, is there not often required, in the real interests of truth, a style of utterance in its legislative halls not perfectly lovely as between man and man, and altogether unlovely as between man and woman? It is not an exclusive circle of great thinkers, of highly cultivated and polished literati, met to discuss abstract questions of art, philosophy, or religion, which one finds in Congress and Legislature; but a most heterogeneous company, assembled to decide on all manner of fiercely-felt, everyday, practical interests, where, through clashing personalities and infinitely varying standards of mental and moral worth, the average will of the people is somehow to get itself wrought. We have hinted our idea that potential forces in these bodies must more or less wield the battle-axe, and a force that is not potential—that is, no force at all—would certainly find its dignity in being absent.

Now our bugbear is that the mutual deference between the sexes, habitual in civilized society, and which we have certainly been accustomed to regard as one of the mitigations of life—that this courtesy indeed is not in so much danger of being rudely destroyed in these new positions, as of being the basis of a whole new order of sham proceedings, where in all conscience there are shams enough already. There are no intuitions on the subject of pig-iron; an honest legislatress should study up pig-iron, if it became her duty, which indeed we have sufficient faith in our sex to believe it might be in her to do, if only she were held to it strictly, and not excused with a flood of nonsense about her being born superior to poor, plodding man's necessity of looking into things before he knows them. With our blessed American faith in the sufficiency of born gumptions, and the Yankee-smartness tenet of that creed, let us add the womanly-intuition tenet, and va! for such a reign of humbugs as even the spread-eagle did never spread himself above before.

As for this womanly-intuition business, has not the bountiful Creator blessed most of us with a good deal more floating sense than we are at all willing to take the irksome pains to shape out and bring to bear upon the facts or philosophy of life? Most men and women are mortally tempted to do bad work—pure intuition-work—because it is so much more delightfully easy than to do good work—which has intuition in it, to be sure, and—something besides. We who write unto you, we know ourselves in the same condemnation, therefore we preach. We wonder (as one more explanation of woman's inferiority) if even energetic man were constantly informed that he had a fund of masculine intuitions on which to draw for all the expenses of thought, whether he would not lap his brain in sloth, and thank the Creator who had made him to possess all the harvests of wisdom, with no sweat of knowledge. Verily, between superficial over-valuing of her performance on one hand, and supercilious under-valuing on the other, this poor creature, woman, does get a most unfortunate training in this world.

There are women before the public to-day who begin to promise to do never better than in their first efforts, but rather worse, because their first efforts were prematurely crowned with the absolute meed which they in nowise deserved. The breath of their bad flatterers inflates now all their speech; in their utterance on this theme they have, in their prophecies of the immediate purification of the nation were women to rule its politics, an unseasoned arrogance which implies that they do not so much as apprehend, to say nothing of comprehending, the intricate fabric of civil government. We suggest to these Penthesileas that, if they go into politics with efficiency, they will have to take some lessons of men. Howsoever these male monsters got the first place in most of the world's wisdom, they have got it, and it befits the candid mind to acknowledge the same. If the new era is to be a Woman era, still for a season yet men must be our schoolmasters in much.

It may be that the extravagances of these prophets are only the ferment incident to a new order of things, which would settle as naturally as it has arisen were once that order permanently established; and that all our apprehensions about female politicians are such as the first wind of experimental practice would utterly drive away. The advocates of woman suffrage have certainly a strong argument in their position, that it profits both men and women to be able to take an intelligent interest in each other's pursuits; that the majority of them to-day are separated in a needless and unfortunate degree in habits of thought, tastes, and training; that whatever makes a larger intellectual sympathy possible between the sexes purifies and enriches life; that not only the ideal human companionship, but social and civil progress, depends on what is the plane of relations between those who, on one footing or another, always have passed and always will pass their lives together. And since it is no longer the fashion to relegate the squaw to the back door of the wigwam—since she sits in the front door (with much spread of garments)—it may verily be that she should now enter the councils of the chiefs, and hand round the peace-pipe (though she does not smoke it), to balance by these sober responsibilities the tendency to folly not unnatural in a being first abased as a slave, then exalted as a doll, the discovery of whose true place in creation mankind has seemed to find a long puzzle.

Seriously, we think it may be that women need to vote, and men need to have them. But if this need ever comes to be felt with any wide enthusiasm, we believe it will be kindled by the hope of these immaterial gains chiefly; that is, if a general growth in knowledge, thought, and all the aids to efficient living—if these shall seem to go hand in hand with the ballot, we think there are women enough in the Republic who sincerely desire this progress to swell the now thin ranks of this reform with a prevailing tide. But we doubt whether the property question, the labor question, even, have in them any vital element of conversion. The women of the country at large do not feel that their property interests are antagonistic to those of men, or, where unjust legislation still exists on these matters, they do not believe that the only way to right is to obtain the power of legislating themselves. We can hardly avoid the conclusion, practical interests of this kind being usually so keenly felt, that married women of property would be flocking in multitudes to this standard if, in actual fact, their freedom was much fettered by the law. And the labor question reaches into wide, wide regions—regions so uncertain and hazardous that the thoughtful cannot advance there save step by step. The most superficial feel that it is not an arbitrary fiat alone which limits woman's "right to labor." We wait for much light on this question The woman-suffrage leaders may be the persons to give it; we hope they will.

Meanwhile, we who write far away from conventions would like to be better informed of their proceedings. The late Woman Suffrage Convention at Washington we suppose must have meant something; gathered at the national capital, if there is any significance in these meetings, that must have been significant. Yet we sought in vain through the long letters of newspaper correspondents—women, too—women favoring the cause, whose business in Washington apparently is to attend such meetings, note-book in hand—we sought from them in vain the remotest idea of the debate. Much grouping there was of the various ladies in their various features, and especially clothes, about the platform; there the report ended. Now, the face and figure and dress even of some world-famous individual who has become a living presence to our thought, we confess we like to be informed about—the personality interests us; but a company of ladies, most of them utterly unknown to fame, except as being to-day speakers on a great question—to parade these out with their names and toilets, without reporting one syllable of what they said, is to do them and us much wrong. We really don't care whether the young law-student from Missouri wore on her hat the bird of paradise—as we are assured she did—or the owl of the Dismal Swamp; her velvet basque in no wise interests us; but, if that young person spoke to edification, we would most thankfully receive the poorest abstract of her remarks.

It occurs to us, correspondents, that you may have some mistaken ideas concerning the rural districts of your native land, for we conclude, of course, that you do not indite your dress letters for the ladies who can look in at Stewart's. We inform you, then, that America is dressed up to her last woman. Velveteen suits and long-tailed birds on hats are in all our meeting-houses. In the very aboriginal wilds, paniers have risen and set. Most of us who are in years to go out of the chimney-corner at all have one show gown scarce to be beat in Washington. Now that we reflect upon it, we are sure you cannot know how extensively the works of E. Butterick & Co., "Manufacturers of Patterns for all Kinds of Ladies' Garments, Publishers of the Metropolitan and Quarterly Review of Fashions," are abroad in the land. We are painfully forced to tell you, too, that you cannot supplant that valuable man and his coadjutors. Your long accounts of toilets are, after all, hazy. E. Butterick & Co. tell us, with diagrams, exactly how the satin pipings are to be laid on, precisely how far from the edge of the puff the gathers are drawn, with a distinct end to enlighten and instruct which commands our grateful respect. But you—we pause in our invidious comparison, thinking we may be as much mistaken in you as you are in us.

[The articles, of which the foregoing is the last, contain not our opinions, though in most things we heartily concur with them, but those, we believe, of a large class of women of the very best kind, whose adhesion to the woman suffrage movement must be won to make its triumph anything but a public calamity, but whom thus far its advocates in this country have had remarkable success in repelling. Of the force with which the writer has explained her position we need not speak; no more striking contributions to the literature of the subject have yet been made, on either side of the water. To win over the large body of thoughtful and refined women, of whom she is a representative, would, one would think, be one of the first and dearest objects of the platform champions of the new movement; but how very little trouble they gave themselves about anything of the kind, and how closely occupied they are in producing a shabby imitation of the hack male agitators, of whose public performances people are so weary, was curiously illustrated in the reception given by the Woman's Journal to the first of the articles by a "Looker-on."

That article dealt somewhat severely, but entirely within the limits of fair discussion and with great power, with some of the weak points of the leaders of the Woman's Rights agitation. The Woman's Journal, which, be it remembered, was established because the Revolution was too coarse, and violent, and unscrupulous, thereupon, by way of reply, invented a falsehood for which it had not the shadow of a foundation, namely, that the writer of the article was not a woman, but a man; and on this falsehood founded a slander, namely, that the Nation, in representing it to be the composition of a woman or allowing it to appear as such, had been guilty of a fraud on its readers and of "professional dishonesty." This falsehood and slander was then wrapped up in a column of rather silly and incoherent abuse, and actually published as the leading article of a paper which is to persuade people that the female conductors of it would make good statesmen. In the course of the tirade, too, Christ and Henry Ward Beecher were gravely cited in support of the opinion that to be "neutral" in the wars of preachers of this kind with the rest of the world is "to be in alliance with the wrong."

Now, we will improve the present occasion to say one or two plain words to those who are engaged in this agitation, for which we claim a respectful hearing, inasmuch as we believe them to contain the sentiments of ninety-nine out of a hundred intelligent and thoughtful men and women in the community.

1. Their position before the public here differs from that of their fellow-laborers in England in this, that the social status of English-women is one of much greater inferiority to the men, and their legal status one of much greater hardship than that of American women. The latter occupy a far higher position in the family and in society, and are far better protected by law in the enjoyment of their property and other legal rights, than Englishwomen are. Every American reader of Mr. Mill's book felt that his statement of the case, therefore, was in various ways inapplicable to this country. The property of Englishwomen is still at the mercy of the common law, and the common law is supported by the prevailing male sentiment, while the property of American women in some American States is better protected than that of men, in most States as well, and in all may without much difficulty be put on the same footing.

2. The feature of the woman's suffrage movement in England, therefore, which most attracts public attention, and by which its claims to respect are most frequently tested, is its value as an instrument for the legal and social elevation of women, for giving them more importance in the household and a better standing in the courts. Its champions, therefore, appear before the public mainly in the character of pleaders for the emancipation of a class which everybody feels to be really "subject," and which the great majority thinks ought to be subject. Their capacity as politicians, or the probable influence of their enfranchisement on the Government, has not come up prominently for consideration.

3. In America, on the other hand, it is as possible politicians and statesmen that the public watches the ladies who figure on the woman's rights platform and in the press. They do not impress people as a ground-down class seeking deliverance, so much as candidates for office—persons who want to have a hand in voting the taxes, framing the laws, and declaring war and making peace. Consequently, the indulgence which the liberal and candid are usually disposed to extend to the absurdities and extravagances of ordinary reformers, they refuse to extend to theirs. The follies of a man or woman who contends for the emancipation of the slave, or the improvement of the prisons, or the promotion of temperance, are, to a great extent, what Bentham would call self-regarding follies, which the rest of the community can afford to overlook. But the follies of persons who gravely propose to take a large share in regulating the lives of all their neighbors, in administering justice, levying the taxes, sending us to the field to fight, and, in fact, deciding for what objects, and under what conditions, a great nation shall exist, are matters of serious concern to everybody.

4. Accordingly, the woman's rights agitation here is watched, and the female press is read, mainly with the view of discovering what kind of element the admission of women to the suffrage would introduce into our politics. If, from the speeches and articles of the leaders, it could be inferred that the change would probably supply any of the great wants of the day; that it would either provide a class of soberer, more thoughtful, and purer politicians; or that it would increase the popular appreciation of knowledge, deliberation, and self-restraint; or that it would introduce new habits of thought and discussion into the political arena; or infuse a more scientific spirit into legislation; or more candor, directness, and information into the debates which precede legislation; or would give greater support to men of real ability and high character, and greater political value to character, there is hardly a doubt that the very best portion of the community would speedily rally to its support, for this portion of the community is just now greatly perplexed, and is looking around eagerly for new ways of salvation. We wish we could say that either the conventions or the press of the movement were giving promise of these things. Thus far, they have certainly not done so, and, indeed, it may be said whatever strength the cause has exists outside of them, and almost in spite of them. If the movement results—as we have little doubt it will—in giving women the franchise, it will make all the difference in the world to the country, and to mankind, whether they get it as a consequence of the deliberate conviction of society that all good causes will profit by it, or as a consequence of that devil-may-care feeling about the suffrage, and about the whole government, which is now very prevalent, and which makes nearly everything in the people's gift the prize of loud and importunate speech.

But we shall, in spite of the faults of the Woman's Journal, look to it next week for something very explicit in the way of a retractation of its charge against the Nation. There can be no sort of doubt that Christ and Henry Ward Beecher both hold that persons who bear false witness against their neighbors, and fail to make atonement when summoned to do so, "are in alliance with the wrong." To make the duty of the Journal all the plainer, we will mention that the name and address of the lady who wrote the articles in the Nation are at the service of its editor.]

ENGLAND.

LONDON, Jan. 28, 1869.

THIS is the season for public meetings, in anticipation of the Parliamentary session. Every man or party who has a pet crotchet is anxious to give it an airing and to force it, if possible, upon public attention. The land laws, education, emigration, and all kinds of minor projects, are advertising for the amount of support necessary to force them through Parliament. The speeches delivered to their constituents by various ministers are read with great attention, in order to draw from them, if possible, some indication of the Government policy. Of Mr. Bright's speech, if I remember rightly, I said something in my last letter. Two of the most rising of our present officials, Mr. Forster and Mr. Stansfeld, have lately been addressing their constituents. The main result of what they have to say may perhaps be expressed as follows. In the first place, Government will of course bestow its chief attention upon the Irish land question. No hint of any importance seems to have been dropped as to the probable nature of the measure to be introduced. That it will not interfere with the rights of property, that it will satisfactorily settle all just claims, that it will lay a sound foundation for future good feeling, and so on, are amongst the necessary platitudes from which nothing is really to be inferred. The most significant hint is perhaps to be found in an article in the Times, which may be taken to indicate the expectations of that paper. It is, I need hardly say, a customary device of the Thunderer to advocate in an oracular manner those measures which it has reason to suppose are already adopted by the powers that be. The general design of the proposed legislation is the establishment of lower kind of Courts of Commissioners, with very large powers, for settling on the spot the relative claims of landlords and tenants. Upon this, however, I will not speculate at present. Taking for granted that the Irish land laws will have the precedence, is it probable that that piece of legislation will absorb the whole activity of the session? This is the question which is being vigorously agitated. It is plain that the subordinate officials, such as Messrs. Forster and Stansfeld, are really anxious that more should be done. They call upon the Liberal party to press the Government, and on the constituents to press the Liberal party, so that in one way or other enough pressure may be applied for the purpose. But there is evidently a certain degree of hesitation.

The educational controversy is bringing out some very vigorous disputes; the advocates of a secular and denominational system of compulsory and voluntary agencies are as bitterly opposed as a combination of theological and political hatred can make them. It is natural that a government which has in prospect the difficult task of meeting enraged land-owners should shrink from also setting the clerical world on fire, and should like to keep its head clear for steering some judicious compromise through one set of shoals and rapids, without committing itself simultaneously to another. The last speaker on the subject is the Solicitor-General, Sir J. Coleridge, a gentleman of singularly smooth and plausible eloquence, and who unites to Liberal politics certain High-Church proclivities which fall in only too closely with Mr. Gladstone's way of thinking, and hamper him on some important topics. He evidently shrinks from the educational question; and from his language I should think it not improbable that Government would either temporize by some avowedly transitional measure, or would introduce a more comprehensive measure, without attempting to insist upon it for the present.

We are promised a measure upon licensing public-houses, by way of a sop to the temperance agitators; and are assured that we shall have the ballot introduced before another election. Upon another topic of great importance nothing has been said, so far as I am aware, by any authoritative person. Great efforts, however, are being made to obtain for it a prominent place in political platforms. I wrote to you some time ago about what may be called the Colonial Empire question. The duty of England to the colonies is still discussed with vigor, but the question has passed into a rather different phase. A large number of public meetings have been held, and various radical members have made themselves prominent in pressing popular demands upon Government. They ask that large sums should be spent in assisting emigration to the various colonies—partly with the view of relieving our distress and partly in order to keep up the connection between various parts of the empire. Mr. Goschen, the president of the Poor-law Board, has sanctioned the principle of emigration by offering to subscribe (in his private capacity) a certain part of the passage money of 2,000 laborers, hoping that his example will be followed by others. He says that this is the only form of relief which promises any permanent results. I fear that the political economy of this statement is so far doubtful that it is quite possible for the masses to remain as wretched as before, even whilst overflowing as rapidly as ever into other countries. Emigration is no more a panacea than any other mode of relief which does not propose to act upon the morality and intelligence of the population. But Mr. Goschen's offer, however well meant, did not satisfy the leaders of the agitation. They declare that private charity is necessarily inadequate; and will be content with nothing short of some large and decisive measure carried out by Government. The statement of Mr. Edmund Beales (famed for the Reform Bill agitation) is that Government is bound either to find work for the people or to place them where they can get work. This is a simple doctrine, and probably not a very wrong interpretation of the popular theory. The opinion of the lower classes is simply that they are very badly off at the present moment, and that we have a great extent of land somewhere in the colonies which ought to be applied to their support. There is a socialistic sound about this which will not recommend it to a Parliament of capitalists and landed proprietors. To say the truth, I think that very exaggerated ideas are current of the extent to which emigration is likely to afford relief, and the clamor which is being raised may lead to grievous disappointment. Government is obviously anxious to avoid these questions for the present; they have snubbed the gentlemen who proposed to bring about a conference with the colonial authorities, and they are very unlikely to grant any pecuniary aid. Indeed, to say the truth, the most obvious principle or policy is a determination to spend no money upon anything that can be possibly saved.

I heard a view propounded the other night upon the emigration question which is worth a few words—not because it is likely to be adopted, but as significant in its way. The suggestion (which had the merit of simplicity) was that the English Church should be disendowed and the funds devoted to promoting emigration. As you may guess from the tone of the proposal, it was not made in any high official quarter. It was put forward at a place called the Hall of Science—which is a fine name for a lecture-room containing about 1,200 people, in a remote corner of the city of London. The proprietors of the room seem to be a body called the Secularists, whose prophet, at the present moment, is a Mr. Bradlaugh. They discuss such questions as whether there is a soul, or a God—both of which they generally decide in the negative—and others of which this is a specimen: "Was Judas Iscariot a curse or a blessing to the race?" Mr. Bradlaugh is the author of various tracts, Why am I an Atheist? Reasons for Disbelieving the Bible, and the like. He is also a very good popular speaker, with plenty of unction, humor, and clap-trap. On the occasion on which I heard him, he was addressing a crowded and enthusiastic audience chiefly upon the Old Testament. He treated that work in the style to which Tom Paine familiarized us in the last century; and, less excusably, denounced not merely the text, but religion in general. It was singular to hear a man attacking everything that one hears in churches with the utmost coarseness, and rapturously applauded for every good hit at Abraham, David, or Moses. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, does not limit his ambition to religious iconoclasm. He is also lecturing upon the French Revolution with a special application to the present day, and would be willing to follow out Tom Paine's example by sitting in republican conventions as well as by assaulting the Scriptures. I do not think him anything more than a vulgar but clever speaker, with plenty of mother-wit and next to no refinement. Perhaps I may be prejudiced by his always speaking of 'Ebrews and Ma'ommedans; but I do not expect him, I confess, to be a Mirabeau or a Danton. However, his popularity is an illustration of the discontent which is widely spread amongst certain classes, and of which the emigration agitation is in the main another symptom. I must leave it to you to speculate on the probable interpretation of these phenomena. I will only go as far as this: that a large increase of emigration is highly probable during the ensuing year, and that I do not suppose that it will precisely follow the intentions of its promoters. I don't think it will all go to our colonies, nor that, if it does, their loyalty will be necessarily stimulated by being made a useful supplement to our system of out-door relief. Further, I do not suppose that Mr. Bradlaugh will succeed in shutting up all our churches at present, or erecting an altar in St. Paul's to the Goddess of Reason; but when preaching of this kind is popular, the clergy have need of considerable support to enforce a system of denominational education.

FRANCE—THE OLLIVIER MINISTRY.

PARIS, January 28, 1870.

WHEN I last wrote, the Ministry was barely formed, and could not be said to have brought itself into working order. How much has passed since then, and in the space of a couple of weeks!

Let us begin at the beginning: Parisians of the oldest date, political Parisians of twenty or forty years' standing, will tell you that never was a ministry received so enthusiastically as was this one. And this is true. On the 3d of this month, the new Cabinet, which had been at first called the "Ollivier Ministry," acceded to power, and it was decided that there where all were equals no one could be preponderant, and that, consequently, it was the Liberal Ministry, and not "le Ministère Ollivier." Well! Émile Ollivier, caring for higher aims than could be identified with mere words, agreed readily to this, and the Centre gauche were much pleased at being told that "everybody was minister," that there was no "Prime Minister," and that the old parliamentary routine was to be revived. In this way, the week from the 3d to the 10th of January passed, and then the honeymoon of blissful enthusiasm was convulsed to its centre by a tragic storm. On the afternoon of the 10th of January, Pierre Bonaparte, a cousin of Napoleon the Third, murdered a man in cold blood; the man being a lad of twenty, a journalist risen from the ranks of the people, and who had gone to the "den of the Corsican ogre" in the sacred character of a "témoin," bearing another man's challenge.

This did bring with a vengeance a "change over the spirit" of the Ministerial "dreams!" Paris was shaken as a forest in a hurricane. "This!" people went about exclaiming—"This is the stuff whereof our masters are made! This is the race whose strength is being increased by the 'Liberals!' This is the family which is being fixed in France by those who ought to destroy it!" So great was the feeling of horror and disgust, that I assure you, when came out the incriminated article of Rochefort in the Marseillaise, the most moderate and conservative persons said in their salons (those strongholds of tradition): "This is not exaggerated!" I shall refer to this feeling by-and-by.

Wednesday, the 12th, the day of the funeral, came and passed, and convinced all the genuinely impartial portion of the French public that the reign of violence was over. Violence, it had long been felt by the really clear-sighted, was extinct in all Europe; its hour is gone by; there is no use in it; it is an anachronism. All the modern thinkers, all the real "Liberals" of our time, know this, and would treat great public demonstrations with respectful attention, but without a shadow of fear or distrust. Here lay Ollivier's error, or misfortune. He who knew that the "manifestation" of the 12th deserved attention, and should have excited no alarm, was forced into accepting the old-fashioned, timid view of such men as his colleagues, Messrs. Daru, Talhouët, etc., and seeming to dread the quiet, solemn gathering of the masses round the grave of the murdered youth, rather than take it gravely into account.

Immediately, however, on hearing of the project of applying to the Chamber for permission to prosecute Rochefort, which he, Ollivier, disapproved, he acted with a promptitude to which I know, on the Continent, of no parallel, and, by the night of Thursday the 13th, had elaborated a law by which the crimes of the public press were once again to be submitted to the jury. This projet de loi Émile Ollivier carried to the Council of State, and deposited on Friday the 14th. On the morning of Saturday, the 15th, he again went to the Council of State, where a séance générale afforded Prince Napoleon, in his character of a Prince of the Imperial House, the right to appear. The Prince had not been at the Conseil d'État for six years, and was disliked and feared by that august assembly. By the frank and clever speech he made, however, he gained over every one present to his political views. Émile Ollivier left the Council of State to proceed to the Senate, where he made his first speech, and absolutely captivated the "reverend seignors."

His plan was, if obliged by his timid colleagues and by the Emperor to commit the mistake of prosecuting Rochefort, at all events so to arrange matters beforehand as to make the prosecution relatively harmless. He meant to have the law voted by the Conseil d'État, voted by the Chamber, and promulgated before Rochefort was summoned, and in that way send him before the ordinary jury, who perhaps might almost have acquitted him. That done, on Monday the 17th, Ollivier satisfied the silly longings of his colleagues, by consenting to make one with them, and ascended the tribune to expose the "Cabinet question," and declare to the Corps Législatif that, if they would not vote the surrender of Rochefort, the Ministry would retire. A most monstrous and useless mistake! And Ollivier's eloquence suffered severely from it; he was embarrassed, and weak, and gave even Rochefort (who is neither a politician nor an orator) the opportunity of correcting him successfully.

The speech was M. Picard's, who simply put things straight, and gave a logical sketch of the situation as it really stood before the public. However, the House voted and the Ministry was "saved," as it termed it, and, as you went away, you heard on all sides the words: "One other piece of salvation such as this, and we are utterly lost!" Émile de Girardin, Ollivier's warmest friend, said next day: "Let us be silent about yesterday's debate—great sorrows are dumb." There was the truth. Worse remained behind; for Ollivier, who had counted upon neutralizing the prosecution by the common jury, found himself mysteriously betrayed, and the summons for Rochefort to take his trial was issued for Saturday the 22d.

Nothing remained save to obtain the largest amount of leniency. This the keeper of the seals did contrive to secure, and, when the sentence was published, there was a universal feeling of relief. "But," said Rochefort himself with a smile, "if I am the terrible and dangerous incendiary about whose prosecution so much fuss was made, I am far too little condemned; if I am quite innocent and harmless, I am too much so." The "incident" is over now, but it was a most foolish one, and the best chance of the Cabinet is, that it should be forgotten, as so many things are in this rushing current of political life.

Since the Pierre Bonaparte tragedy and the Rochefort prosecution, the whole interest of the situation is the commercial policy, out of which all future complications may spring. So long as the existing Chamber endures, the majority is in the hands of the Emperor, and the majority is a free-trade one. Now Messrs. Daru, Louvet, Segris, Talhouët, and Buffet, Ollivier's five colleagues, are all resolute protectionists, and, economically, M. Thiers is their chief. But here you hit at once upon the Gordian knot, and who is to undo it, and how is it to be undone? The old-fashioned political Liberals and so-called Parliamentarians (stigmatized as Orleanists by the Imperialists) are opposed to what the younger public in Europe styles everywhere liberal ideas. They are opposed to freedom of trade, and disarmament or peace, guarded by national armies, as in America, Switzerland (and nearly in Prussia); they believe in prestige and "protection," and military glory, and a tutelary police; in short, in all the various devices of security which no man of our day does believe in more.

These are Ollivier's colleagues. What is he to do with them, he who has long ago discarded all these narrow, antiquated creeds? On the other hand, the men who will, if well led, go in for all these modern forms of economical freedom, are politically adherents of personal government, are narrow Imperialists, and would gladly give their majorities to M. de Forcade over again. What is then to be done? Much will depend on chance. The enemies of the Ministry (among whom are many of the Minister's private friends, are so alarmed at the situation that they think the sooner a crisis is provoked the better, and, convinced as they are that Ollivier is only a "wolf in sheep's clothing," they would help to bring about a movement that should strip him of his fleece, and show him entirely a wolf. "He is a Jacobin!" cry these men, "and he will lead us to the scaffold!" (They still have the beliefs of the last century!) "He is a Bonapartist bought and sold!" cry the others, "and will one day send us off to Cayenne!" Here are the shoals between which Ollivier has to steer.

Correspondence.

GERMAN-AMERICAN RELIGIONISTS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the issue of the Nation of February 10, I notice a communication of R. Francis Colton on the "Religious Views of the German-Americans." Being the author of the "letters" therein referred to, I beg to state that Mr. Colton has misunderstood me in a very important point. I did not intend to speak of the German-Americans at large, but only of a certain class among them. If agreeable to you, I shall soon have an opportunity to communicate some facts to the Nation respecting the state of religious thought among the German-Americans, that will fully convince Mr. Colton of his mistake, which, perhaps, is due to an inaccuracy of expression on my part.

Very respectfully,

Dr. H. von Holst.

February 11, 1870.

[We ourselves were guilty of unintentional injustice towards Mr. Colton, in a too careless rendering for him of the German passages cited. For "certain moderate persons" we should have written "influential;" and "Free Congregation" and "enlightenment," and "annihilation of dogmatic conviction" and "progress," were respectively declared synonymous ideas.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

The following books are announced by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. as in preparation: "The Land War in Ireland," by James Godkin, author of "Ireland and her Churches"; "Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection," by A. R. Wallace, the well-known naturalist; "The Beginnings of Life: including an Account of the Present State of the 'Spontaneous Generation' Controversy," by Dr. H. C. Bastian; a second series of "Historical Gleanings," by Mr. Harold Rogers, late Professor of Political Economy in the University of Oxford, and editor of Mr. Bright's speeches. This volume will contain sketches of Wicklif, Laud, Wilkes, and Horne Tooke. Mr. Rogers's first series appeared last year, and treated of Montague, Walpole, Adam Smith, and Cobbett, and was very favorably received in England.——Messrs. Roberts Bros. will publish in April Miss Alcott's "An Old-Fashioned Girl," a companion volume to the same author's "Little Women" and "Hospital Sketches."——The Catholic Publication Society have in press a new work by Rev. John Henry Newman, entitled: "The Grammar of Assent." It will make one volume, duodecimo, and is published from advanced sheets furnished by the author.

—Readers of Hawthorne's book on the English entitled "Our Old Home," and of such passages from his English diary as appeared in the Atlantic Monthly some time since, will be glad to hear that Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are soon to publish the greater part of the note-books which Mr. Hawthorne made during his sojourn in England. The work will appear in two volumes of about the size of those containing the selections from the American note-books. There is, perhaps, no one living who could be trusted to take from Hawthorne a truly characteristic germ and develop the full-blown romance; nevertheless, the forthcoming work will, of course, be rich in suggestion; and possibly it will shed new light on this artist's methods, as well as on the peculiar character of the man.

—We have received from Messrs. John Wiley & Son a catalogue of the biblical works and works closely related to the Bible which are published by the celebrated Bagsters. It is well prepared, and fitted to be of excellent service to almost any clergyman. It opens with an alphabetical index, which tolerably well covers the eleven or twelve hundred numbers contained in the body of the catalogue, although it cannot be said to cover them completely. If one looks in it for "Improved Renderings of the New Testament," desiring to find the page where that work is described and the price given, one must know its author's name and look under "Craik," or else must begin and read through the whole index. Still, as publishers' indexes go, this is a good one, and the catalogue itself merits higher praise, being very well printed and well arranged, and giving prices in sterling money and in our currency. That is to say, it gives the prices in both currencies in the cases of books which Messrs. Wiley & Son have in store ready for immediate delivery. A pretty large minority of the works mentioned are to be had only after the necessary delay of getting them from England, and of these the price is to be computed by allowing for each English shilling fifty cents of our paper money—or possibly a little less now, some time having gone since the catalogue was printed. The eleven or twelve hundred titles of which we have spoken are those of all varieties of Bibles—ancient and new, polyglot or in one tongue, English, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Latin, Syriac, Hebrew, what not—of grammars, lexicons, concordances, ecclesiastical histories, commentaries, atlases, church services, and all the books that go to make up a theological student's working library. At the end of the catalogue are specimen pages of many of the more important works.

—Mr. Pumpelly's missionary, who had given away so many Bibles to the Chinese that he thought no Chinaman in his district could stand up at the last day and show any sufficient reason why he should not be condemned, made a statement that would, perhaps, seem in some ways, at least, not so unaccountable and less exaggerated if Mr. Pumpelly's readers were aware of the enormous number of Bibles and New Testaments that is annually distributed by the various associations for promoting the knowledge of the Bible. Two societies, one English and one Scotch, distributed during last year alone 2,360,000 copies. Since it was founded the British and Foreign Bible Society has sent into France alone 5,645,000 copies. How eagerly the various Protestant societies are when a new field is opened to them for the dissemination of Bibles has recently been illustrated in the case of Spain. Most of our readers have heard of the splendidly bound Bible sent to Madrid for General Prim, and how in a very brief space of time it was back in London, having been bestowed by the General as soon as it reached him—or by some subordinate through whose office it passed before it reached the chief—on some Englishwoman who happened to be in the city. That was one case. Beside it may be set these facts. Since the revolution, which is now some seventeen months old, there have been opened in Spain 85 Bible depots, and there have been printed in Madrid 42,000 Bibles, 35,000 New Testaments, 500,000 selections from the Scriptures, and 1,300,000 tracts. This is exclusive of 10,000 Bibles that had been sent into the Peninsula in 1868, before the revolution broke out, and exclusive also of 1,000,000 that are speedily to be sent there from various quarters. When one thinks of the translations of the Bible into 51 different dialects spoken in India, of the 57,000 that the British Society has distributed, of the 350,000 copies sent to the Italians since they have been under Victor Emanuel, of the 300,000 copies circulated by the Danish Society, of the labors of the various American societies, of the presses of the Holy Synod of Russia, one is led to speculate curiously as to what becomes of the volumes and what is the effect of the reading of them.

—It was perhaps wise in the House, and will also be wise in the Senate, should it adopt the House bill abolishing the franking privilege, to deny freedom of the mails to newspapers along with Congressmen. Reforms certainly gain strength from a simplifying of issues, and the principle that all postal matter should be paid for is as clear as it is reasonable. There appears, however, to be a spite among Congressmen against the press, as if the chief cause of their being deprived of a darling privilege; and a consequent satisfaction in cutting off the free county circulation and free exchange of newspapers, on the ground that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Now, we have only to compare the limitations of the two privileges and the opportunities for abuse afforded by each, to perceive that the tu quoque taunt or argument is misdirected against the press. The Congressman's frank is potent not only for all sorts of missives that can be put in the form of a package, but in all directions—from Washington to Washington, from where the M. C. is not, as well as from where he is—and in the hands of any person who can obtain it for love or money. The newspaper frank consists not in a signature which may be printed and multiplied and lent and forged indefinitely, but in a plain wrapper, that can legally cover only the paper itself or its supplement, or at most a bill, and in a single direction—from the office of publication to the subscriber or exchange paper. Instead of being sealed, this envelope is open at both ends, often permitting the paper to be extracted and replaced after inspection, without injury. By far the greatest abuses which have arisen under this privilege are due to the laxity of post-office decisions as to what are and what are not legitimate newspapers, so that it has become a common expedient for publishers and advertisers to issue semi-occasionally a gratuitous circular, broadside, or other soi-disant periodical, whereby they may have "exchanges," and no postage to pay.

—When it is asked why newspapers should be allowed to go free to anybody—even to other newspapers—another question must first be answered: Why are they actually charged, when paid for, only from one-twelfth to one-sixtieth of the letter-rate? This favor evidently rests on considerations of public utility, and we can conceive it to be extended through diminishing ratios to absolute exemption from charge for transportation. We never expect to see this, any more than we expect to see the rate mount backwards towards the letter-rate; but it is worth while to keep in mind the motive for making newspaper postage cheap, and putting upon letters the burden of the post-office balance. So much premised, there is a great deal which might be said in behalf of free exchanges, but we will merely point out that on their continuance may depend the existence and worth of the small country papers. Whether these have any raison d'être; whether it is well for the metropolitan press to have a larger and more direct influence than it now has, with fewer critics as well as satellites; and whether, if we destroy or weaken the country press, its place will be filled, sooner or later, by something better—are some of the questions which ought to be debated, if the present proposed legislation is not to be followed up by a general reduction in newspaper rates, which shall mitigate the natural hardships of the change. And after all, whatever graduated price we pay for it, will the newspaper be as sacred in the post-office as the letter? There are plenty of supposable instances in which far more, of pecuniary and intellectual well-being, hangs on the receipt of a paper than of an average letter, and that, too, a paper not sent expressly and marked for a purpose, but coming regularly to the subscriber. True, the public are much to blame for the post-office neglect in this department, and, possibly, will never exact the same fidelity and certainty as in the case of letters, inasmuch as losses are more easily repaired, and the risk of loss can be avoided by enclosing any paper of sufficient importance in an envelope, and paying letter-postage upon it. Nevertheless, were our service what it should be, there would be no difference in point of despatch between letters and papers, nor any in the post-office view of duty in regard to them; and we sincerely trust that the Postmaster-General, if successful in abolishing unpaid transportation, will reinforce the Secretary of the Interior in his demand for a thorough reform in official appointments in all branches of the Government.

—Three years ago, to a day, we entered "a plea for culture" against our tariff-tinkers, who wanted to change the 25 per cent. ad valorem duty on imported books to a specific duty of ten and twenty-five cents per pound. That project happily proved abortive; but, now that the tariff is again on the carpet, the advocates of protection in book-making as well as in the casting of pig-iron reappear with a demand for twenty-five cents per pound, pure and simple, whether a foreign work have been published ten, twenty, forty, or a hundred years ago. The whole subject was so thoroughly ventilated in Volume IV. of the Nation, that we shall not now reargue it, besides that we have a comfortable feeling that the fate of any tariff measure just at present is not more hopeful than in 1867. However, as some of our readers may have seen the programme of these literary protectionists, we will collect the chief points of a reply to it which has been prepared and circulated by "American importers who are also publishers." And to place the former in their true relation to the intellectual welfare of our countrymen, let us premise that their concern is to reprint English books at as large a profit as possible, and that, on the authority of the circular before us, there is but one in a hundred of the works actually imported which they could think of reprinting, for want of a sufficient market. For the sake of the profit to be derived from this one, they combine to tax the natural purchasers of the ninety-and-nine, and are credulous enough to believe that "no injury need be apprehended to the interests of education and intelligence" from such an impost. They even so far forget their own interest as to assert that, after all, the rate will frequently not be raised, or but slightly, while "the revenue will always receive its dues," since there will be no more fraudulent invoices on the part of the English branch houses over here, to whom are sent "the larger part of the books imported." To this their opponents answer, that such importations are but 10 per cent. of the total, and that therefore the injury inflicted by the proposed duty would fall on American houses in the proportion of nine to one. They also declare that, with all the existing drawbacks to the manufacture of books in the United States, even adding author's copyright, we can still reproduce English works more cheaply than they can be imported, by reason of a virtual protection of 25 per cent.; and we may cite as evidences, though they do not, the republication here of works as varied as "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," Gladstone's "Juventus Mundi," and (in contemplation) Mr. Freeman's "Old English History for Children." They also give a list of imported works selected fairly, avoiding extremes of cheapness and dearness, from which it appears that a specific duty would increase the rate of the present ad valorem from 41 to 200 per cent.; that is, would make it prohibitory to the purchaser, and by so much diminish the revenue. The average increase thus occasioned would be: "upon works of general literature, of 162 per cent., upon theological works, of 104 per cent., upon scientific works, of 64 per cent., and upon medical works, of 56 per cent.;" or, upon all classes, of 96 per cent. But in the case of the two last, the ratio is smaller because they are higher priced, as being in more limited demand, than the theological (which are almost the heaviest single line of importation) or miscellaneous works. The proposed tariff would consequently establish an extraordinary and pernicious discrimination against clergymen and the general public; or, in other words, those who can least, either pecuniarily or intellectually, endure it. There is, then, nothing to be gained for the revenue, and if some publishers should be the better of the change others would be ruined; while, if they were united in favor of it, it would still be a conflict of the interests of less than 50,000 manufacturers and employees in all branches of book-making against those of thirty-five millions of people.

— Last year there was considerable discussion in Boston concerning the state of the two schools of the upper grade, known as the High and the Public Latin, and it was variously proposed either to merge the two in one, or to effect radical changes in the studies and administration of each. Among those who desired improvement of some kind, and who took a direct part in the agitation, was Prof. W. P. Atkinson, of the Institute of Technology, whose address before the sub-committee of the School Board has just been printed in pamphlet form. We refer to it because his argument is of more than local application—is, indeed, a contribution, and a valuable one, to the controversy between classical and practical or utilitarian training. He is an advocate of what he calls symmetrical mental development, and his plan is to ascertain as nearly as possible the proportion which each study bears to all others in a truly liberal scheme of education, and then regulate the time and attention bestowed upon it accordingly. He would begin by overhauling the primary school, and thence working upward, doubtless understanding, as well as anybody, what a heroic task he lays out, and how long it will be before his revolutionary ideas can so much as be comprehended by teachers, and committeemen, and municipal authorities. If we do not mistake, the marking system is the type and symbol of our present mode of instruction as contrasted with that which Prof. Atkinson inculcates; and could it be intelligently abandoned, we should believe the first step towards a general reform had been taken. On the actual defects of our schools as now conducted, the Professor delivered himself clearly and forcibly nearly two years ago, at Pittsfield, Mass., before the American Institute of Instruction; and those who wish to pursue this subject further will do well to procure the bound volume of lectures (new series, 1868), published by the body just named in the course of 1869.

—This volume contains also one or two speeches by Hon. Henry Barnard, then and till recently Commissioner of the National Department of Education. They are worth reading to be reminded what limited resources, without a particle of authority, the so-called "Department" has, and to do justice to the retiring Commissioner. We are compelled to say, however, that we consider Dr. Barnard an unfit person for the position he has hitherto held, and should still be of that opinion—even à fortiori—if his opportunities had been greater, and his powers like those of other heads of departments. The Institute honored him with resolutions of confidence, and laid particular stress on his library, which he had been thirty years in collecting, containing a great mass of facts and figures relating to education in all parts of the world. To our mind, this was the fatal possession of the Commissioner, and if he has done anything since his appointment to Washington but rummage among and rearrange his dusty and dead statistics, we hardly know what it is. As to his successor, Gen. John Eaton, he is not, either, the proper officer of a real Department of Education, though an honest and in many respects capable man. We owe his selection by the President probably to the latter's knowledge of his character, and some observation of his management of the freedmen, under the Bureau, in Tennessee. We suppose he will perform acceptably all that the law requires of him, but it is doubtful if that is enough to save the Department from the disfavor of Congress. A man of the requisite culture and experience, and young enough to entertain advanced views on the subject of popular education, might lend such dignity to the now contracted and pitiful function as to extort from our lawgivers a liberal enlargement of it, and from the people an interest in it, which would ensure the most valuable results.

—If "our antagonist is our helper," then the patriotic men of Boston have great reason for giving gratitude to Mr. Dawson, the editor of the Historical Magazine, who is never tired of calling their attention to the fact that they never were by far too good for this world—as they have cunningly contrived to make all the school-histories say—and that the present generation of Bostonese, in whose hands the former New Jerusalem has become the Modern Athens, are, past doubt, worse in many respects than their rascally ancestors. The Boston of the "Prince Society" gives Mr. Dawson peculiar trouble. "This 'Boston' is not," he says, "the aggregate of that venerable municipality which is impatiently huddled round Beacon-Hill, and joyfully pushes its way into the Back-bay, in the absence of any better place to which it can go; but, comparatively, an insignificant number of pretentious men, generally of what assume to be 'the first families' of the city, although very seldom of the most ancient and honorable of the number: men who forget the shortcomings of their own ancestors in their zeal to talk about the assumed virtues of the men who make no such pretensions: men whose successful want of integrity in one occupation, no longer pestered with their presence, has too often been transferred with themselves to another profession which has not yet gotten rid of either." These last are dark sayings, as well as, presumably, severe and cutting; but we suppose the critic means to say that certain bad men, after having been successful in trade in and about Boston, have now betaken themselves to carrying out the nefarious scheme of falsifying history by making Boston appear always righteous and great. Mr. Dawson goes on to say that "this 'Boston' has an idea that it is improper in any one to look into the records of other days," if the effect of such impartial investigation would be to impair the standing of the heroes and saints that have been "invented" by the local historians. More than that, this same "Boston" suppresses all damaging testimony; and, more than that again, it seems to think it has the right to make as many historical lies out of whole cloth as may at any time be needed to establish the fame of the above-mentioned great and godly founders and forerunners. In these last "Andros Tracts," now, are there not omissions that amount to a suppression of the truth? Yes, there are many, Mr. Dawson says; but nothing less was to be expected of the set of men who have pursued a systematic course of falsehood in their treatment of the history of slavery in Massachusetts, and of that commonwealth's attempt at nullification and secession. So he goes on; and if the learned men of the "Prince Society", are as shrewd as we take them to be, they will chuckle a good deal among themselves while they note the spirit and tone of Mr. Dawson's remarks. They are always such as to create a strong presumption that he is in the wrong.

—It will be not a dozen years, nor fifty, but a hundred, perhaps, and perhaps more, before we get into the light ready for use all the materials bearing upon the war of the rebellion. And, indeed, when we think of the men who are dead and can now make no sign—of men like Foote and McPherson—we may rightly doubt if the true story of the war in all of its important details will ever be told. In this, however, the story of the late war is like all history. It is a matter of degree only as between it and other chronicles; for whether it is written history or rewritten that we read, we know that we but see in part. Mr. William Swinton having said in his history of the twelve decisive battles of the war, that at the famous battle of Stone River the rebels had in the field about 35,000 thousand men—to this statement General Rosecrans makes a reply that ought to gratify the Chicago Tribune, which journal has recently made a brief estimate of Mr. Swinton as a historian which is distinguished less for civility than for that forcible use of English which makes some of the Western editorial articles so racy. General Rosecrans wants to know how, if the rebels had but 35,000 men, he took prisoners from one hundred and ninety-two regiments of infantry, twenty-three batteries of artillery, and twenty-nine regiments of cavalry, besides twenty-four cavalry commands less than regiments. Furthermore, how, he asks, could General Bragg have had, as he officially reports, 14,700 men put hors du combat if he had all told but 35,000? That would have been a loss not greatly under fifty per cent. of his whole force, whereas the likelihood is that his loss was not far from that of the Federal army, which was about twenty per cent. This would make his army 73,500 strong. Again, Bragg's official map represents his line as overlapping Rosecrans's on both flanks, and this though he gives Rosecrans a line longer, by the space occupied by one division, than it really was. Mr. Swinton then would have us believe that Bragg, with 35,000 men, overlapped on both flanks all of Rosecrans's line of 43,000 men, an imaginary division, and several hundred yards besides. About 52,000 men, Rosecrans thinks, were in Bragg's force. General Rosecrans—against whose character for truthfulness no one, so far as we know, says anything—is yet not a person who is apt to talk with mathematical coldness and colorless exactness, and he may be as much mistaken as Mr. Swinton. But the dispute between them shows once more the necessity that all possible pains should be taken to bring out all the evidence that every one has to offer in regard to the greatest war of modern times. It is a pity that all our leading generals are not writing memoirs of their campaigns, and fortifying their assertions with figures and the added statements of their subordinates. We hear of hardly one who is so engaged. The various army associations, as that of the Potomac Army, the Army of the Cumberland, and the others, might profitably apply some of their funds to the encouragement of such publications. And the treasury of the "Grand Army of the Republic," as it is called, would be as well employed in the endeavor to seize and fix the fleeting records of the war as in arranging the bestowal of post-offices, and assessorships, and Washington clerkships.

—In England, they are still debating what sort of raised letters or arbitrary signs for the blind to make the standard. With us, what is called the Boston letter has been generally adopted: the Roman letter, both capital and small, with angles for curves to facilitate the touch. We have lately been shown a work printed in this way, by the National Association of Philadelphia, incorporated last year for the purpose of publishing literary and musical works for the blind. The one referred to is a dictionary of musical terms, which we are informed is a desideratum for blind teachers of music, of whom there is a surprising number in Philadelphia. Other works are in progress, and all will be furnished at cost, or without cost to the indigent. The Association depends upon subscriptions and legacies for the necessary funds to carry out its designs, and probably can safely calculate upon the support of the philanthropic. Mr. H. L. Hall, of 316 North Twenty-first Street, Philadelphia, is the sole agent.

—Everybody knows that Americans are good-natured to a most unexemplary degree. Who ever heard of a hotel-clerk's being drawn over his marble counter by a long-suffering pilgrim and put to a sudden and violent death—killed while yet picking his teeth? Nobody. Conductors on railroads mostly die natural deaths; and so do expressmen, and waiters, and telegraph operators. This is the first winter for forty-odd years that thousands of passengers by the East River ferry-boats have not more than once or twice spent a cheerful hour or two among free ice floating in the river. All the women who are clerks in stores and shops insult and in many ways "sit down on" the other women. Vendors of refreshments at way stations are only seldom visited with an energetic storm of abuse. Whenever we get together in political crowds we permit the gentlemen on the platform to put their tongues in their cheeks and call us "the masses," and, having thus impudently flattered us with the plural, otherwise to treat us like fools by the hour together. And when we assemble in crowds not political, those who "cater intelligently to the public taste"—how do they not treat us? Is there any other country on the round world where audiences would submit to see regularly on their play-bills such a notification as this? It stares one in the face at one of our most frequented New York theatres:

"Spectators are requested to remain seated till the close of the play, as the noise made in departing by the impatient few mars the pleasure of the more intellectual persons in the audience who wish to witness the completion of the performance."

You pay your money, my poor, unintellectual little public; but as for taking your choice whether or not this play shall be said to be intellectually played—why, that is a matter you need not concern yourself with. We of the green-room have settled it for you; it is to be intellectual to like us.—There is, no doubt, a sort of indecency in walking out of a theatre while most of the spectators are anxious to sit undisturbed; but there are other sorts of indecency, too, it seems.

—Anglo-Saxon scholars will be interested in knowing that Mr. Thomas Wright has discovered in the library of Corpus Christi College, at Cambridge University, a new alphabetical Latin-English, or rather Latin-

Anglo-Saxon, Vocabulary. It is written in double columns on large leaves of vellum, and the forms and orthography of the words are extremely archaic. Mr. Wright thinks it to be far older than any such monument hitherto known belonging to any of the Northern languages, and refers it to the eighth century. Scholars will soon be able to see his evidence in this behalf, for the vocabulary in question is to be printed in a second volume of Mr. Wright's vocabularies—a companion to that (Anglo-Saxon and English) already printed by him at the expense of Mr. Joseph Mayer, of Liverpool.

—Mr. Alfred R. Wallace, in his "Malay Archipelago," indicated, as we pointed out in our review of the work, a considerable fondness for politico-economical discussion. He was then chiefly interested to show that Government protection and regulation of traffic was a humane necessity in the case of a semi-barbarous people like the Indo-Malayans, whom free-trade with Europeans would have demoralized, impoverished, and probably destroyed. He set over against each other the English mechanic and factory-hand, with all their misery, and the contented and prosperous Javanese, and drew a sorrowful picture of the condition of his countrymen. To a late number of Nature he contributes a letter deprecating a proposed appeal to Government in aid of science—which has since, nevertheless, been made—and taking this position:

"I uphold national education, but I object absolutely to all sectional or class education; and all the above-named schemes are simply forms of class education. The broad principle I go upon is this: that the State has no moral right to apply funds raised by the taxation of all its members to any purpose which is not directly available for the benefit of all."

The editor of Nature warmly dissents from so restricted a view, contending that science in England needs organization such as Government alone can give it, and that, however much scientific men constitute a class, their labors are notoriously disinterested, and cannot possibly be confined to their own advantage. The question is a nice one, and all depends on where the line shall be drawn. Even in this country, where we do not allow any distinction between the government and the self-governing people, there are persons who hold that high schools come under the ban laid down by Mr. Wallace, and should be left to private endowment. But if a national vessel may be sent on a scientific mission when otherwise it would have been laid up in time of peace, or even carry a savant at the public expense to the scene of his explorations, we cannot see what becomes of Mr. Wallace's limitation, since the principle is not altered with the amount misappropriated.

TENNYSON'S LAST VOLUME.*

From the genuine lovers of the best poetry we suppose that these latest idylls by Tennyson have had nearly if not quite as warm a welcome as was given the old ones. But among that larger public which habitually reads and likes a great deal of the poetry that each year produces—the public which has given Mr. Robert Lytton the third or fourth place among the popular poets of the day in America—"The Holy Grail" has met with a very much cooler reception than was accorded to the preceding volume. "The Idylls of the King" were pronounced by the general voice to be the finest poetical work of our day, and this award was made with a loudness and unanimity that certainly might have seemed ominous. Of this "Holy Grail" nothing so good is said, and among both the readers and writers of the moment there are many who decry the verses, and who assert the poet's manifest decline. We think, however, it is not in any important difference between the Tennyson of to-day and the Tennyson of fifteen years ago that we shall find the reason for his former popularity with the ordinary reader and his present comparative disfavor. It is to be sought in the reader himself; for, as we say, no marked change is noted in the opinion which is entertained of the two volumes by the best judges; they find these verses as good and as bad as those, and good and bad for the same reasons.

But as the first series of these idylls appeared, the ordinary devourers of pleasant poetry were first introduced to a knowledge of the Arthurian cycle of romance, of which previously they had, most of them, known next to nothing. Here, of a sudden, were the Launcelot and Camelot of the dreamy, semi-allegorical "Lady of Shalott" appearing as a living man with a history of his own, and a city full of knights and ladies, and more or less of the other machinery of mediæval romance. Sir Gawain, Sir Modred, King Arthur, Guinevere, the Quest of the San Greal, and other shadowy names were suddenly vivified, and a fresh field of story was made known. We had forthwith, as most of us will recollect, a sort of popular revival of the Arthurian legends; and this revival is proof that the average reader of the polite literature of the day had been much enjoying the poet as story-teller, and was interested in the personages with whom he had just made acquaintance. But this is an interest of a kind which almost never is long maintained by many. It may be supposed that in this case it led some few persons on to new delights as they explored for themselves the stream from which Mr. Tennyson had taken such waters as he wished, but that soon the many, for ever seeking some new thing, returned satiated. These latter readers are not of the kind that appreciated what poetry there was in the former idylls, and it is partly because the Arthurian romances as stories have palled on their taste that they accuse the new poetry of inferiority to the old.

Then, it is true, we suppose, that no book by whatsoever author could now make the noise among us that might have been made twelve or fifteen years ago by any work of any one of three or four authors. Tennyson is no worse off in this respect than Longfellow or Dickens—unless possibly "Enoch Arden" may have done him special injury, and Dickens's recent tour may have done him good. The American public is certainly changed from what it was before the war. The four years of fighting—of fighting out such issues, at such a cost—and the constant political agitation since, to say nothing of the many other forces not so obvious but perhaps as powerful which have come into play, and which in our new society come into play so rapidly and with such effect, have deepened and widened the public mind, and we are less enthusiastic and also less raw as well as less ill-informed than we used to be. Possibly, too, it should be considered that as a nation of Tennysonites we were youngish people. We do not remember, we believe, that it was the middle-aged American of 1855 who used to be fond of "Maud," and "In Memoriam," and knew "tears, idle tears" by heart, and carried a blue and gold 24mo in his pocket. Doubtless it may very well be, after all, that for Tennyson's decline in favor there is the simple explanation that it was mainly the young ladies and gentlemen who were liking him so much half a generation since, and that for the present generation the fashion in poetry has partly changed. That there has been in the poet any noticeable change we do not find ourselves able to see. When the time comes, if it is going to come, when he shall be read and admired for his finish and skill, the poems before us, we should guess, will be as likely to come in for praise as any equal number of their predecessors.

That they are going to be praised as fortunate in point of subject—that, indeed, they are not going to be held radically unfortunate in subject, we do not believe. It is much to be doubted if any great poet would ever have chosen the Arthurian romances as a proper theme for a modern poem. Milton talked of it; but it is to be observed that he never did more than talk. Bulwer talked of it, and in a sufficiently unwise manner; and indeed did it, and that, too, in a most inadequate manner, as everybody knows. It was among Coleridge's opium dreams, but except Mr. Tennyson no man of poetic capacity has both meditated and tried to write the modern epic with Arthur as hero; and certainly such success as Mr. Tennyson has had it seems as if he might as well have got with much less embarrassment to himself. In fact, he has to some extent—so long as his idylls are remembered—injured a fine poem (albeit not formally arranged and written out) in order that he might produce not only an inferior poem of his own, but that he might produce a poem inferior to his other work in many important respects. Who that has ever read the volumes compiled by Malory has not been led into a beautiful world of enchantment? It is not unlike the world into which we are led when in the most delightful of modern poems we wander into the forest of Arden with Rosalind and Celia—like it, different as it is. The ladies, the waiting-damsels, the spells, the amours, the tourneys, the chapels perilous, the castles joyous, the vows, the philters, Sir Tristram mad, Sir Palomedes by the pool in the forest, the frank sinning, the business-like repenting, the holy hermit who heals wounds, the crooked dwarfs, the mighty knights, magically armed riding on strange quests, the simple poetry of nature—all these charm the imagination and delight the fancy, and are nearly as far from Mr. Tennyson's correct moral sentiments, his modern remorses, his divorce-court loves, and his riot-act justice, as they are from ward caucuses in Philadelphia and the produce market.

Of this second set of the idylls, the one which does least violence to the spirit of the old romances is, as might have been expected, that one now entitled the "Passing of Arthur"—the "Morte d'Arthur" of the poet's youth—a poem of the days when romance is in the blood; when we are native to the airs of imaginary lands; when we have not yet taken no the burden of thought and the yoke of duty. That it did no violence at all to the spirit of the legends, even when it had its old form, is of course not to be said. It was the modern poet who said:

* "The Holy Grail, and Other Poems. By Alfred Tennyson." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1870.

> . . . . . "Woe is me!
> Authority forgets a dying king
> Laid widowed of the power in his eye
> That bowed the will."

And of this passage, good and careful as it may be called, Sir Thomas Malory would never have said "as the book saith:"

> "Dry clashed his harness in the icy caves
> And barren chasms, and all to left and right
> The bare black cliff clanged round him, as he based > His feet on juts of slippery crag that rang
> Sharp-smitten with the dint of armed heels—
> And on a sudden, lo! the level lake,
> And the long glories of the winter moon."

So of a dozen other passages that might be cited; but in general the "Morte d'Arthur," as it stood, was a not inharmonious echo of the strain that called it out. Of the two hundred prefatory lines which are added to it in this edition, it will be perceived that they subserve Mr. Tennyson's general purpose in his idylls, and that they are not strictly in keeping with the particular poem to which they are prefixed. As he left behind him "the golden prime" in which he wrote with such enjoyment the "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," and the "Lady of Shalott," and the "Morte d'Arthur," and began to do thinking, and to have "views," and to feel that on him also there was laid some "solving of the universe" to be done, he made for himself a hero—"in likeness of a goodliest English gentleman"—a kingly statesman repressing evils in the body politic, forgiving personal injuries, serenely applying ideal "personal government" to a turbulent chaotic realm—to speak irreverently, a sort of magnanimous, wide-minded Governor Eyre in a clearly rascally Jamaica—and the "Idylls of the King" illustrate this hero and his deeds, and give to him and them more or less coloring drawn from the Arthur of French and English legendary lore. The two hundred or more verses which are now prefixed to the youthful "Morte d'Arthur" are in keeping with this later conception rather than with the earlier, and are a sort of link to chain together the Arthur of the nineteenth century and that Arthur who "never was on sea or land."

Considering the new poems apart from their relation to the romances, and apart also from the poet's scheme—which, at least to our apprehension, labors, as we have said, under a fatal disadvantage, and about which we say no more—the best poem in the book seems to us to be "Pelleas and Ettarre." "The Coming of Arthur" is only an introductory antechamber, and exists not for itself, but for what follows, and "The Holy Grail" itself, on which Mr. Tennyson has spent much labor—labor ill-bestowed after "Sir Galahad"—is now, in everything but its innermost essence, remote from human sympathy. That the pure in heart see God, and that they and only they can come close to him in this life, is the lesson of "The Quest of the San Greal," as we of to-day translate it. But this is a subject that now refuses itself to poetry, whatever may have been the case when concrete religious images impressed men more; and the old machinery used for its present presentation cannot but seem fantastic—utterly unfitted to the spiritual reality. But in the "Pelleas and Ettarre" the poet has solid ground beneath his feet. Pelleas is a youth

> "But lately come to his inheritance,
> And lord of many a barren isle was he"— handsome and strong, ignorant of the world, and unacquainted with woman—

> "For out of the waste islands had he come,
> Where saving his own sisters he had known
> Scarce any but the women of his isles,
> Rough wives, that laugh'd and scream'd against the gulls,
> Makers of nets, and living from the sea."

Riding towards Caerleon to be made a knight by Arthur, the sun, beating on his helm, drove him to seek the shade of the woods, and his halting-place is thus finely described:

> "Near him a mound of even-sloping side,
> Whereon a hundred stately beeches grew,
> And here and there great hollies under them.
> But for a mile all round was open space
> And fern and heath: and slowly Pelleas drew
> To that dim day, then, binding his good horse
> To a tree, cast himself down; and as he lay,
> At random looking over the brown earth
> Thro' that green-glooming twilight of the grove,
> It seemed to Pelleas that the fern without > Burnt as a living fire of emeralds,
> So that his eyes were dazzled looking at it.
> Then o'er it crossed the dimness of a cloud
> Floating, and once the shadow of a bird
> Flying, and then a fawn; and his eyes closed.
> And since he loved all maidens but no maid
> In special, half-awake he whispered, 'Where?
> Oh! where? I love thee, though I know thee not.'"

Despite the unhappiness of burning ferns into emeralds, the first part of this scene shows Mr. Tennyson in his wonted strength as an objective painter of landscape; and the latter part, with the youth lying in vague love-languors and longings, is a good specimen of the poet's other and usual method of making nature subservient to his particular purpose. To Pelleas, thus dreaming, suddenly comes an appropriate waking:

> "And glancing through the hoary boles, he saw,
> Strange as to some old prophet might have seemed
> A vision hovering on a sea of fire,
> Damsels in divers colors like the cloud
> Of sunset and sunrise, and all of them
> On horses, and the horses richly trapt
> Breast-high in that bright line of bracken stood."

This company was the retinue of Ettarre, who had lost her way as she was riding to Caerleon to the jousts, and whose beauty strikes Pelleas speechless:

> . . . "And Pelleas, gazing, thought,
> 'Is Guinevere herself so beautiful?'
> For large her violet eyes look'd, and her bloom
> A rosy dawn kindled in stainless heavens;
> And round her limbs, mature in womanhood,
> And slender was her hand, and small her shape,
> And but for those large eyes, the haunts of scorn,
> She might have seemed a toy to trifle with,
> And pass and care no more. But while he gazed
> The beauty of her flesh abashed the boy,
> As though it were the beauty of her soul."

Her soul, however, had little beauty. But Pelleas, amid the significant smiles of the young ladies and the three knights who followed Ettarre, rode by her side to Caerleon, and there, being made a knight, he won for her, "while rang the shouts his lady loved," the prize of the tournament. He follows her as she rides home, but is debarred from attendance on her, and is kept among the waiting-maids, for the mistress despises him. When the lady's castle is reached, the portcullis falls between her and her worshipper, and he is "left in open field."

> "'These be the ways of ladies, Pelleas thought,
> To those who love them, trials of our faith.'"

So he watches faithfully outside till Ettarre loathes and hates him and his constancy, and sets her knights on him, whom easily he overthrows, one after another; but, on hearing Ettarre's voice commanding him to be brought in, he joyfully suffers himself to be bound. She scoffs and rails at him, and this also he endures in his infatuation, and, when he is thrust out again, he watches, day and night, till she orders the minion-knights to set on him all at once. Gawain, passing by, sees this, and wishes to help, but Pelleas will not permit him.

> "So Gawain, looking at the villany done,
> Forbore; but in his heat and eagerness
> Trembled and quivered, as the dog withheld
> A moment from the vermin that he sees
> Before him shivers, ere he springs and kills."

The rest of the story tells how Sir Gawain meets Sir Pelleas after he has again been driven forth by Ettarre, and how, craftily borrowing the other's armor, he goes before the lady, and wins her with a tale of his having killed her obstinate lover, and with his easy gallantry; and at last it tells how Pelleas, entering the castle, surprises his false friend and Ettarre. The scene in which the discovery is made is powerfully managed, and we are made to see the natural effect of an unsuspecting heart's first awakening to the wickedness and perfidy of one wholly trusted and loved. After this, however, Mr. Tennyson must take his flesh-and-blood lover and use him for the purposes of the "Idylls of the King," so at once he dissolves into air more or less thin. But the first part of the poem is intrinsically worthy of a place beside Elaine's ill-fated love, and is proof enough that the poet's hand has not forgot its cunning.

Of the minor pieces in this volume there is none that requires particular mention, except the version of a story from Boccaccio, which is beautiful with all the beauty of intense passion—and intense passion seemingly half-justified in seeking its gratification—curbed by magnanimous generosity and self-control that reaches heroism. "The Northern Farmer" is a picturesque figure; but the personage drawn contains no depths or intricacies; every characteristic is salient, and not to be missed, so that we do not understand the praises given to the artist for this success. The "Flower in the Crannied Wall" is commonplace, though not trivial, and would not have been thought worth printing by a poet who had not, for most of his life, confined his attention to the moral sentiments, and to what, for want of a more exact term, we shall call the sensuous enjoyment of nature and life, and the very elaborate, skilful literary reproduction of his impressions.

THE RISE OF THE SECOND EMPIRE.*

Louis Napoleon had been pretender and revolutionist, imperialist and socialist, before the Revolution of February, 1848. On its outbreak, he hastened to write to the Provisional Government, and place himself "under the banner of the Republic, just proclaimed." Elected president in December, he not only takes the oath "in the presence of God and of the French people," "to remain faithful to the democratic Republic and to defend the Constitution," but voluntarily adds: "I shall consider as enemies of the country all those who may attempt illegally to change the form of government." In his message of Oct. 31, 1849, he already declares himself the representative of a whole system made triumphant by his election, "for the name Napoleon is in itself a programme," but still reassuringly adds: "I will try to be worthy of the nation's confidence by upholding the Constitution to which I have sworn allegiance." On his tour through the provinces, in August, 1850, he thus speaks to the people of Lyons: "Rumors of coups d'état have possibly reached you, but you have not believed them, for which I thank you. Surprises and usurpation may be the dreams of parties which have no support in the nation; the elect of six million votes executes, but betrays not, the will of the people." Ill-received in Strasbourg, he repudiates the faintest idea of an attack on the Constitution, and assures his hearers that the highest aim of his ambition is the title of "honest man;" that he knows "nothing above duty." In "Napoleonic" Cherbourg he is again entirely Napoleonic, loudly demands the aid of the people to enable him to complete the works of "the Emperor," and hints at the necessity of making the institutions of the nation agree with "the exigencies of its political situation and of its material interests." To efface, in part, the impression made by these words on the Legislative Assembly, he assures it, in his message of Nov. 12, that to it exclusively belongs the right of modifying the Constitution. "I alone," he adds, "I hold myself within the limits it has drawn, bound as I am by my oath." And so he goes on until the oath and the Constitution are trampled under foot, and the defenders of the latter incarcerated or slain in December, 1851. Nay, as late as March 29, 1852, he still boasts, on a most solemn occasion, of not having assumed "a pompous title," and exclaims: "Let us preserve the Republic; it menaces no one; it is reassuring to all:" Then comes the Empire, and this kind of lying is at an end. The successive responses of the suffrage universel to the appeals of this noble saviour of order and society are these: For the constitutional president, five million four hundred thousand votes; for the ten years' presidential dictatorship, seven million four hundred thousand votes; for the Empire, seven million eight hundred thousand votes—the opposition vote gradually dwindling down to about three hundred thousand nons and blanks.

* "Histoire du Second Empire (1848–1869). Par Taxile Delord." Tome premier. Paris: Germer Baillière. 1869.

The principal abettors of Louis Napoleon: Fialin, alias Persigny, the great apostle of Bonapartist restoration, and for a time its martyr, but, when running as candidate for the Constituent Assembly, a loud-mouthed renegade; Morny, who mixed money-speculation with both love and politics, and whose relation to the son of Queen Hortense M. Delord cautiously explains by telling that he was born in one of the finest mansions of Paris, was taken to Versailles, received his name from a nobleman who adopted him, was educated by the mother of M. Flahault, was constantly patronized by this gentleman, and chose a hortensia as emblem for his escutcheon; Le Roy Saint-Arnaud, that "true Bohemian hero"—a hero of the stage, of the salon, and of the Algerian desert, where he emulated the fame of Pélissier by smothering Arabs with smoke; Magnan, Maupas, Carlier, Mocquard, Granier de Cassagnac, and others—they are all worthy of their chief and cause. M. Delord's delineations of character often remind the reader of corresponding sketches in Kinglake, "the eloquent, exact, and impartial historian"—our book dares to state it—"who has given us the first complete and detailed account of the days of December, 1851." M. Delord is himself more exact and impartial than this lavish praise bestowed upon his fellow-historian would lead us to expect. He is not at all eager to caricature, and in no way betrays an inclination to season his narrative with spicy anecdotes or inuendoes. He characterizes by public facts. His invectives are bitter generalizations. Could he speak freely, he would evidently strive to emulate Tacitus rather than Suetonius.

Few characters in this history cut a more pitiable figure than the cousin of the Man of December—Prince Napoleon Bonaparte—with his ultra-republican fervor, which yields to the "victrix causa" only when its triumph is fully established. How he repudiates his cousin, and how vehemently he assails his "deplorable policy" in 1849, declaring that he acknowledges "but one sovereign—the people!" His ardent republicanism survives even the 2d of December, 1851—by one day. On the 3d, he still intrudes into the secret reunion of some of his associates of the Left, learning their whereabouts from the domestic of Jules Favre, whom he deceives by a lie; lying to Mme. Landrin, in whose husband's house the reunion is held, and, as that noble and spirited woman is not to be deceived, forcing his entrance by pushing her so violently aside as to make her fall upon a chair. Received with astonishment and distrust, he advocates bold measures against the coup d'état. He then perceives Mme. Landrin, who, having entered, occupies a seat on a sofa, listening. "Who is that woman?" he asks, eyeing her through a quizzing-glass. "My wife, sir," answers M. Landrin; and the icy silence that follows makes the prince inclined to leave before others, soon to appear with altered mask, and in a different camp and sphere.

Nor do we find many attractive historical figures among the prominent opponents of the coup d'état—at least as seen in this period—though they are incomparably superior in character. Cavaignac—the most imposing figure—is a sincere republican, and calm in the storm, but stiff, unable to lead a party, and almost entirely passive. Changarnier, who holds his African sword in readiness to draw it against the usurper, has unfortunately offered it, in the first days of the Republic, to the Orleans princes, against it, and is not undeservedly suspected by the republicans of meditating the part of Monk in favor of a Bourbon-Orleans fusion monarchy. Lamoricière, who is equally ready to fight for the Constitution, is in heart a legitimist; his past has shown it, his future will show it more clearly. Thiers, the writer of the "Consulate and Empire," who has boasted of having given Louis Napoleon, the presidential candidate, two hundred thousand votes, though considering his election a disgrace to France; Berryer, who continues to be in communication with the Count de Chambord; Odillon-Barrot, who, as minister of Louis Napoleon, has defended the expedition against Rome—they, the champions of reaction and constitutionalism at the same time, are all great in speeches, but ridiculously insignificant as defenders of the Republic; they allow themselves but too long to be led by Montalembert, who, in his anti-revolutionary passion, does not stop short of imperialism. The Left—with its Mountain, "an imitation volcano," whose petty smoke eruptions serve only to frighten the bourgeois into the opposite camp—is full of formulas, as Carlyle would say, intermixed with pompous vanities à la Victor Hugo. In speaking of the Socialists, our author shows himself in his bitterest vein:

"There were, on the benches of the Left, Jacobins, Girondists, Robespierrists, Dantonists, and so on. Jacobins, Dantonists, Robespierrists, Girondists—all these parties, divided among themselves, had the Socialists for adversaries. The Socialist looked down upon the Jacobin. He found him ridiculous, ignorant, backward, poor in ideas. Himself, on the contrary, was full of them. Religion, philosophy, political economy—he thoroughly knew all the problems. He had their solutions. Each solution was represented by a head of school. So many schools so many parties. The Socialists, not content with insulting the Jacobins, incessantly insulted each other. Fierce in discussion, black with ink, red with hatred—resembling the furious scholastic disputants of old—they drown in floods of ire and prose the few ideas they happen to have."

The old stupid or criminal Napoleon-worship of the French peasantry and French literature; the nebulous and reactionary romanticism created during the Restoration, and fostered by writers like Hugo; the religious anarchy and office-seeking servility which poisoned the reign of Louis Philippe; the unscrupulousness of party-scribblers during and after the Republic; the servile heartlessness of the more or less bloody tools of the Man of December; the shameless corruption introduced in all spheres by the new Empire—are all depicted in true and lively colors. In telling "how the Empire was made," the history is full enough. It is less satisfactory in explaining what ought to or could have been done to prevent it, or whether it was a fatality. M. Delord's retrospects are excellent as far as French history is concerned; but the teachings of universal history, ancient or modern, he almost entirely ignores. The events of the period which took place beyond the limits of France—including the Crimean war, with the conclusion of which the volume ends—are incompletely told, and some mistakes—such, for instance, as he makes, not only in words, when loosely talking of Beust and Von der Pfordten, "la grande Allemagne, Gross Deutsch," "la petite Allemagne, Klein Deutsch," etc. (pp. 472–474), or when he calls the Prince of Vasa a son of Charles XIII. (p. 484)—betray an inadequate familiarity with foreign affairs. This and a certain chronological disorder which pervades parts of the work are its greatest, yet, in comparison to its merits, very slight defects.

The Queen of the Adriatic; or, Venice Past and Present. By W. H. Davenport Adams, author of "Buried Cities of Campania," "Records of Noble Lives," etc. (Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. 1869.)—This book, "purporting to be at once a record and a description—a manual for the young student, and a series of sketches for the general reader," is a tolerably well executed and neatly illustrated compilation. It is divided into three parts, containing respectively the "History," the "Fine Arts, Literature, Manners, and Customs," and the "Public Buildings and Memorable Places," of the sea-girt city. All are equally readable and interesting, without being exhaustive or marked by evidences of careful research. The style is throughout animated, often poetically colored, and occasionally somewhat bombastic—owing, in part, to the author's rather excessive admiration for his subject, that is, for the glories of its past. This past he sketches in brief, loosely connected historical and semi-historical fragments, drawn from well-selected sources, and enlivened by quotations in prose and poetry, but here and there marred by signs of defective criticism and hasty elaboration. The dates are generally correct, and some of the exceptions may be attributable to oversight in the revision. To these exceptions belong several slightly conflicting dates of accession, as given in the "Chronological List of Doges" and in the text of the narratives, respectively; 1570 instead of 1571, as date of the battle of Lepanto; and 421–52, as marking the time when the Venetian lagoons were peopled by fugitives from the mainland seeking shelter before the destructive wrath of Attila (page 28). The last-given, compound date refers to two distinct events, each separately and correctly dated elsewhere—the foundation of the first government on the Rialto (in 421) and the invasion of Attila (in 452), and the author also contradicts himself by making each of these events the starting point of the history of Venice (pp. 17 and 28.) Still greater inaccuracies he commits in giving (pp. 4 and 17) the duration of the sovereign power of Venice, and of each of the two great periods into which he divides, after Ruskin, the history of the Republic. "Andrea Contarini (died 1367)" (p. 320) stands for "Andrea Contarini (elected 1367)."

The Three Bernices; or, Ansermo of the Crag. By Mrs. A. M. Bright. (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1869.)—We are not, we think, indulging in that "mockwise censure of primped-lip presumption" so earnestly deprecated by the author in her preface to this volume, when we say that we find her intention in writing it to be by odds better than her execution. To tell the exact truth, we are not so firmly convinced, either, of the wisdom of the intention. To ensnare youthful devotees of light literature and then drag them into a knowledge of Ancient History by means of a novel in which historical events are distorted and historical characters represented without any regard to actual truth of portraiture, is not an undertaking which seems to us to promise any very good results. If prophecy were permissible, we should say that as a historical novelist Mrs. Bright is not destined to do very good work. Indeed, when does a writer of this sort do good work?

"He had no respect for the colubrine nature of Domitian, whose hands were already cruentate, and whose rampancy of vile practice had well-nigh severed his father's heart entirely from him." Again she says:

"Attend, O ye gods! and thou, Supreme of all, and, holding all in thy mysterious palm, hear! for thou art present! and do thou by thy mightiest links bind our beings, body and soul, into an eternal one, despite of man's decrees, or fate, or death! beyond even thine own awful power to unknit! To this end we devote us! By all things known and unknown, material and immaterial—by men and gods, and by infinitude and thyself, essence and indweller thereof! hear thou, and ratify that this is my wife—for ever and for ever!"

Better still is the soliloquy put into the mouth of the Emperor Vespasian, as he stands beside the death-bed of Agrippina, the mother of Nero, whose life is prolonged by Mrs. Bright for some years beyond the term assigned it by graver historians, and who is converted into a "lowly follower of the Nazarene," and, under the title of Mother Antonia, becomes a soup and tract distributer to the primitive Christian poor.

Three Seasons in European Vineyards. By William J. Flagg. (New York: Harper and Brothers.)—A work of merit, written by an intelligent American, perfectly familiar with vine culture in the United States before his visit to the vineyards of Europe. Rich in practical suggestions and valuable experience, Mr. Flagg talks very pleasantly throughout his very readable chapters in a vein at once entertaining and instructive, and treats knowingly of viticulture, wine-making and wines, both red and white. Of the 310 pages, 73 are taken up with the translation from the French of a treatise on the remedy for the oidium, or vine disease, commonly known in this country as the grape rot. This remedy is the sulphur cure, and it is represented by Mr. Flagg to be entirely efficacious against the disease of the vine in all its many forms. The book is not merely the story of a run through the vineyards, but gives intelligent explanation and instructive report of what a competent observer has seen and learned during months of sojourn among the vine-growing districts of Burgundy, Epernay, the Rhine, Switzerland, and Italy. It should therefore receive a good deal of attention in this country, when in so many districts the cultivation of the vine is already an important industry, and where, if our wine-makers are not too sanguine, there is to be the greatest grape and wine region in the world.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Alden (Rev. J.), The Natural Speaker.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Beecher (Miss C. E.) and Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), Principles of Domestic Science.....
(J. B. Ford & Co.) $2 00
Bierbower (A.), Principles of a System of Philosophy.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Bourne (W. O.), History of the Public School Society of the City of New York.....
(Wm. Wood & Co.)
Godwin (W.), Adventures of Caleb Williams, swd.....(Harper & Bros.)
Gouge (H. A.), New System of Ventilation.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Harrington (Prof. C. S.), T. Macci Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens.....
(Harper & Bros.)
Hirell, a Tale, swd..... " " 0 50
Hunt (L.), A Day by the Fire, and other Papers..... (Roberts Bros.) 1 50
McDonald (J. S.), Vital Philosophy.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Mills (L. E.), Gen. Pope's Virginia Campaign of 1862, swd....(Robt. Clarke & Co.)
Morris (W.), The Earthly Paradise, Part III.: a Poem. .....(Roberts Bros.) 2 25
Mrs. Jerningham's Journal, a Poem .....(C. Scribner & Co.) 0 75
Orton (Prof. J.), The Andes and the Amazon.....(Harper & Bros.)
Prendergast (T.), Manual for Learning Spanish.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Red as a Rose is She: a Tale, swd..... " " 0 60
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.), The Maiden Widow: a Tale..(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part xxiv., swd.....
(Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
Story (W. W.), A Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem: a Poem, swd.....(Loring)
Winthrop (Hon. R. C.), Eulogy at the Funeral of George Peabody, swd...(Boston)
Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. II., No. 1.....(L. W. Schmidt)

Valuable Publications.

MAN
IN GENESIS AND GEOLOGY;

Or, The Biblical Account of Man's Creation, tested by Scientific Theories of his Origin and Antiquity. By Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., LL.D., of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. 12mo, 150 pages, $1.

Among the subjects treated are the following: Outline of Creation—Origin of the Universe—Meaning of the Word Day—Ancient Cosmogonies: The Creation of Man—Man the Image of God—The Head of the Creation: The Origin of Man—Progressive Order—Successive Creations of Species—Characteristics of Man—Man Distinguished by the Brain—The Dignity of Man: Man's Dominion over Nature—Serial Progression not Evolution—Links of Development—Laws of Nature—Instinct not a Reasoning Intelligence—A Typical Man—Owen on Species: The Antiquity of Man—Did the Human Race begin in Barbarism?—Antiquity of the Negro Race—Man the Latest and Highest Work—Some Recent Works on Man: The Sabbath Made for Man—The Glory of the Heavenly Host—Rest, the Suspension of Creative Energy—The Sabbath a Sanitary Provision: Woman and the Family—Marriage a Primeval Institution—Sex Fundamental in Human Society—The Family Founded in Love—Mutual Adaptation of the Sexes.

The Emphatic Diaglott;

Or, The New Testament in Greek, with a Literal Interlinear Translation, and a New Version in English. Muslin.....$4 00
The same work in fine binding..... 5 00

New Physiognomy;

Or, Signs of Character—as Manifested through Temperament and External Forms, and especially in the Human Face Divine. With more than 1,000 illustrations. By S. R. Wells. One large volume, handsomely bound. Muslin....$5 00
Heavy calf, with marble edges, very fine..... 8 00
Turkey morocco, full gilt, an elegant present.. 10 00

Oratory, Sacred and Secular;

Or, The Extemporaneous Speaker. With a Chairman's Guide..... 1 50

Wedlock;

Or, The Right Relation of the Sexes—Disclosing the Laws of Conjugal Selection—Showing Who Should and Who Should Not Marry. Plain Muslin..... 1 50
The same, in fancy gilt binding, fine..... 2 00

For sale by all Booksellers, and sent by mail post-paid by the Publisher,

S. R. WELLS,
389 Broadway, New York.

NOW READY, WITH PROFUSE ILLUSTRATIONS,
THE FEBRUARY PART
OF
The Sunday Magazine,
Good Words for the Young,
AND Good Words.
FOR SALE BY ALL PERIODICAL DEALERS.

Just Published:

The Student's Manual of Oriental History. A Manual of the Ancient History of the East. By François Lenormant and E. Chevallier. Crown 8vo, extra cloth, $3.

The Bible Text Cyclopædia. A Complete Classification of Scripture Texts in the form of an Alphabetical Index of Subjects. By Rev. James Inglis. Crown 8vo, fine cloth, $3.

Words in Season. A Manual of Instruction, Comfort, and Devotion for Family Reading and Private Use. By Henry B. Browning, M.A. 16mo, extra cloth, $1.

The Manor Farm. A Tale. By M. C. Phillpotts. Illustrated. 16mo, tinted paper, extra cloth, $1.

Askaros Kassis, the Copt. A Romance of Modern Egypt. By Edwin De Leon, late U. S. Consul-General for Egypt. 12mo, toned paper, extra cloth, $1 75.

True Love. A Novel. By Lady Di Beauclerk, author of "A Summer and Winter in Norway." 12mo, toned paper, extra cloth, $1 25.

Mysteries of Masonry. Being the outline of a Universal Philosophy founded upon the Ritual and Degrees of Ancient Freemasonry. By L. E. Reynolds, P.M., P.H.P. Illustrated. 12mo, extra cloth, $2.

For sale by Booksellers generally. Will be sent by mail on receipt of price.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia, and 449 Broome Street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1870.

The Week.

After strenuous debate, when debate was surely superfluous, the bill to admit Mississippi was passed on Thursday by the Senate, as it came from the House, by a vote of 50 to 11. The President deferred signing it, at the request of the Senators elect from that State, until Congress should remove the disabilities of some of the Representatives elect. This was done in effect on Monday; but the House had a batch of 2,000 names to add to the Senate's 400, so that there has been further delay in putting Mr. Revels in Jefferson Davis's seat. Almost nothing else has been accomplished by the Senate. On Monday, Mr. Patterson reported a bill to abolish the Freedmen's Bureau, and divide its powers and effects between the War Department and the Bureau of Education—for which last there is some chance of a new lease of life. Fitzjohn Porter's case was reviewed the same day by Senator Chandler, to whom we are not accustomed to look for judicial temper; but we share his and the common opinion that the stigma which a court-martial fixed upon that general will not be removed, and ought not to be removed. Senator Wilson offered a joint resolution to suppress the costly nuisance of printing undelivered speeches in the Globe, and we trust the House will promptly concur, since it is the chief and almost sole offender in this respect. It did, on Saturday, do something towards reforming another abuse—the mode of deciding contested election cases—by altering its rules, at General Garfield's instance, so as to make the Elections Committee consist hereafter of fifteen members—the chairman to assign each case to three of the members, and this sub-committee to report immediately to the House. It was agreed that there should be ten Republicans and five Democrats in the general committee, and two Republicans and one Democrat in each sub-committee. This change is good so far as it facilitates the despatch of business, but, of course, it fails to remove politics from the decisions. Little short of a constitutional amendment could do this, as Mr. Dawes has shown. Mr. Garfield stated that thirty-five contested election cases for the present Congress had come before the committee; that eleven had been decided; and that the printed testimony in the case of eight had occupied nearly 3,000 pages. On Monday the Committee on Military Affairs made a report on the sale of cadetships, and General Logan attempted to expel a guilty Southern member on the spot. Mr. Loughbridge's inflation resolution, which we mentioned last week, was renewed, and carried by 110 to 73.

The Georgia muddle grows more complicated, and now forms a kind of puzzle which would have delighted the schoolmen. The present Constitution was approved by an Act of Congress at the same time as those of Alabama, Louisiana, South Carolina, Florida, and North Carolina. A Legislature and Representatives were elected under it, and Senators were elected under it; the Representatives took their seats, but not the Senators. The Reconstruction Committee of the House advised General Meade that the Legislature was the sole judge of the qualifications of its members, even as regarded their eligibility under the Reconstruction Acts; Messrs. Wilson, Boutwell, Farnsworth, and Paine gave the same answer, in like case, to the Governor of Louisiana. Such indeed is the rule of parliamentary law from time immemorial, and there was nothing in the Act of Congress gainsaying it. The Georgia Legislature was, in short, a legal and valid legislature, if there be such a thing at the South. After electing its Senators, it expelled the colored members; Congress had not prohibited its doing so, but it forthwith proceeded to act as if it had; and, more than this, treated this expulsion as invalidating the previous acts of the body, amongst others the election of the Senators—an exploit for which, we venture to say, there is no parallel in political history. What is more singular, however, is that the Republican papers all over the country, with a few exceptions, began talking of Georgia's "breach of faith" and "violation of conditions"—the fact being that she had violated no condition at all, nor assumed any power legally denied to her. What she had done was to violate an abstract rule of right existing in the breasts of individual Congressmen, but nowhere to be found on paper; and if it be admitted that Congress can, for a reason of this sort—we will not say overturn a State Government—but treat its own acts as null and void, and what was done under them as of no force or validity, there is no reason why it should not indicate its will by three cheers and "a tiger," without taking the trouble to put it into sections, and having it engrossed, and printed, and numbered, and bound, and lodged in libraries.

Since then another Legislature has been elected, which has been "purged," like the Long Parliament, by a military officer, and it has elected Senators, too; so that there are now four Senators in the field. The situation, then, is this: If the first pair were not legally elected, then the Act of Congress of June 25, 1868, had no force and effect; if they were legally elected, then Congress, by its subsequent action, overturned a lawful State government because the State Legislature took upon itself to judge of the qualifications of its own members. The two new Senators have gone to Washington astride of the second horn of the dilemma; and this, added to the Bryant-Bullock contest, makes a little problem of which we wish the Senators joy. We doubt whether it can be solved by purely human means. The Judiciary Committee are hard at work over it. Some members don't like the military "purge" of the Legislature; others don't like other things; and Governor Bullock and the other State officials now claim that the time they have been in office under the bad Legislature shall not count, but that they shall all start fresh under the good new Legislature, without any new election; and the committee are said to be composing an answer to the question, Why not?

The enquiry into the sale of the Congressional nominations to the West Point cadetships has resulted in the detection of at least three Representatives from Southern States. We doubt if all this has surprised anybody who is familiar with the mental and moral status of the great body of the delegates whom the peculiarities of the Reconstruction process have forced on the States lately in rebellion. But, then, it ought, in justice to them, to be said that the practice of selling these nominations is not a new one; at least, if one may judge from the fact that they have been advertised for sale in the papers of this city for many years. It ought also to be said, that in one of the cases now under examination, the money received appears to have been used for party purposes, or a large portion of it, at least, paid over to the party treasury. Nor do we see how those who hold that the nomination to places in the public service is party "plunder," or "spoils," can well object to this. Everything a Congressman or other official officer has to bestow, or can get, he owes either to himself or his supporters; and why not anything he can make by giving a boy admission to West Point? We believe that this doctrine has been carried so far, that Republican Committees, in raising money for campaign expenses, assess, not the salary an official can honestly claim, but all he can make from the office, or that his predecessors have been in the habit of making, honestly or dishonestly. If this be not true, we should like to have some "faithful man" deny it. What we should like to see now, is a movement on the part of those who are making a fuss over this West Point business towards the only effectual remedy, and that is the removal of these nominations from Congressional hands altogether, and the bestowal of them by competitive examination, open to all comers. Why should a poor boy have either to pay a Congressman, or toady him, in order to get even a chance of admission to a school supported by the nation for national uses? Here is a chance for doing a little real democracy, of which we hope some of the gentlemen who talk so much about "the poor man's rights" will avail themselves. No doubt the amount of corruption among Congressmen is exaggerated; but that there is some corruption nobody can deny, and as the detection and punishment of offenders must, with the existing machinery, be always well-nigh impossible, the only effectual remedy is, to leave as little temptation as possible; in other words, give them as little to sell as possible. Of votes they cannot be deprived, but to the distribution of offices they have not a shadow of right.

One of the traders in the West Point nominations was Mr. Whittemore, of South Carolina, and the case against him has gone so far that he has, at the present writing, been given time to show cause why he should not be expelled. He appears to have sold an appointment to the Naval Academy for "$500," to be devoted to "the relief of the poor" of the district; and an appointment to the Military Academy, for $500, "for the political campaign down there." The absence of any personal interest in the money has evidently softened the hearts of many members of the House towards him, or, at least, furnished them with a good excuse for feeling merciful; and there is an evident disposition to let him off easily. Should he not be expelled, it is easy to see how his case might be made the narrow end of a very terrible wedge. If offices begin to be sold in order to provide money for "the poor," we fear "the poor" will become a term of wonderful comprehensiveness. In some senses, we are all "poor." Why not eventually sell the Presidential nomination, and give the money to the Board of Foreign Missions, or to a struggling college? It is curious to see how all these little things work to increase the weight of mere wealth in politics.

An interesting letter from the Washington correspondent of the New York Times represents the relations of the Administration with the Republican party in Congress as very unsatisfactory, as not only not friendly, but not far removed from hostility, and the condition of the party itself in both branches as one of great disorganization. That the influence of the Administration over the majority was small, and getting gradually smaller, has been easily inferred for some time from the way in which the Presidential recommendations have been treated in the case of Virginia and of Judge Hoar's nomination, and from the amount of approval and encouragement bestowed on Mr. Dawes for his attack on it. At the bottom of all the trouble is that cause of nearly all the troubles of the country—"offices." There were two courses open to General Grant when he entered the White House: one was to exercise his own discretion absolutely in the distribution of his patronage, and totally disregard party claims and interests; the other was to follow in the beaten track, and consult nothing but party claims and interests—that is, let the "managers" make all his appointments and dismissals for him. If he had followed the first, he would have had the support of the people; if he had followed the second, he would have had the support of the politicians. He followed neither the one nor the other. The result is, that he is in danger of falling down between two stools. He had a chance to break up a bad system, which is eating what is good in the Government away like a cancer; but, partly owing to the force of circumstances, and partly to an over-modest estimate of his own strength, he let it go by, and tried a compromise, which is having the fate compromises in the construction of Cabinets usually have. He took Mr. Boutwell in by way of throwing a tub to the party whale; but Mr. Boutwell is no longer accepted as a financial guide. His funding system and his theories are being scornfully rejected, and each member of the party is constructing a financial policy of his own, partly by way of showing the folly of Boutwell's, and partly with a view to paying the national debt and restoring specie payments. He chose an Attorney-General for his honesty and ability; but the politicians hate him like poison, and would like nothing better than to be perpetually rejecting his nomination to high and lucrative offices. The foreign policy of the Government is apparently being taken out of the Secretary's hands altogether. Some treaties are being left unratified because Senators don't like Seward, others because they don't like Fish; and it will be well if we do not find the belligerency of Cuba recognized by the House of Representatives before the State Department even gets sight of the belligerent.

As regards the disorganization of the party, there is no question that, with the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment, a great many persons who have hitherto acted with it will feel that its part is played, and withdraw from it, or at least feel themselves open to enlist under other standards. Congressmen have extremely keen eyes for anything like the prospect of "fresh combinations," and, accordingly, are naturally a good deal disturbed in their minds, and consequently mutinous in temper, and disposed to form marauding parties. Then, the excesses of the protectionists have brought about a change in public feeling which the arguments of the free-traders would probably never have effected, and those who are looking about for "new issues" find one ready to their hand. The press of the West has nearly gone bodily into the free-trade camp, and the tariff bids fair to furnish materials for a tremendous fight during the next two years. But it is hardly possible that the Republican party can totally disappear as an organization till the Reconstruction process is fairly over; and it will not be fairly over, and the results of the war fairly secured, until we have seen what happens at the South when the States pass, as they must before long, under the control of the real force of the Southern community. Their present government is purely an artificial contrivance, which in the nature of things cannot last long.

Among other expedients of the Pennsylvania Legislature to neutralize the Democratic supremacy in Philadelphia besides the ill-fated Metropolitan Police Bill, a Trust Bill had been passed which put all the city trusts, including Girard College, Willis's Hospital, and a dozen lesser charitable foundations, in charge of one board, appointed by the Judges, the Mayor, and the Councils, thus superseding the separate boards or committees heretofore chosen either by the Councils or a part of them. This measure was contested as unconstitutional, but the Supreme Court of the State, in spite of the objection that it was disqualified from entertaining the case because its members were part of the appointing power named in the bill, decided in its favor. The actual appointments, however, do not promise much improvement in the management of the trusts. It is true, there have been complaints as to Girard College, but in other cases there have been none; and to get control of the former seems to have been the chief aim of the framers of the bill. Moreover, the new Board, as a political creation, has been filled with men of both parties, who have seen all there is to be seen "inside politics," in a State where that is saying a great deal; and they are expected not only to deal justly and walk humbly, but to administer, with as much skill and fidelity as their predecessors, trusts as diverse as the education of orphans, eye and ear infirmary, winter alms-giving, loans to young men, tree-planting throughout the city, etc., etc.

The Chicago Tribune calls attention to one possible and, indeed, we may say, not at all improbable, result of the decision of the Superior Court of Cincinnati on the "Bible in the schools" question, which has been too generally overlooked; and that is, that the ground taken by the majority of the Court must suggest to Catholics not only the expediency, but the propriety, of using the schools to inculcate their views of truth wherever they happen to be in a majority. All that Judge Storer, for instance, claims for Bible-reading as an agency in influencing conduct and character, Catholics claim for religious instruction imparted by a priest; and for attendance at the sacrifice of the mass they claim far more. Now, if it be right for a Protestant majority to sow the seeds of religious truth as they understand it in the minds of the children of the State, whether parents like it or not, why should not a Catholic majority—say in Baltimore, or New Orleans, or New York, where there is one—in like manner do their duty, as they understand it, by having the schools opened by religious exercises of their own; nay, even have the schools taught by priests or nuns? There is only one answer to this question, and it is an answer which, in a country where there is no state church, is simply ridiculous, and that is, "My truth is the true truth; while your truth is no truth at all." We do not regret the Cincinnati decision, however, as we are satisfied the more the matter is discussed, the more clearly will Protestants perceive the dangers of the path on which they are entering in keeping up this discussion at all. Catholics could hardly do better, in defence of their attempts to get separate endowments for their schools here and elsewhere, than print and circulate Judge Storer's opinion.

The United States Supreme Court has pronounced an Indiana divorce valid; but then the decision has no bearing whatever on the general question of Indiana divorces by which the public mind has been recently agitated. In the case before the Court, the validity of the divorce was disputed, on the ground that the Court had not jurisdiction, one of the parties residing out of the State; but this point was disposed of by the fact that the husband, who raised it, had entered an appearance in the suit, and (presumably) defended it. The point on which the public needs enlightening, and which this case does not touch, is, whether Indiana divorces are valid in other States, when the plaintiff acquires a residence for the simple purpose of bringing the suit, and when the party residing out of the State only gets constructive notice by an advertisement in an obscure local paper. What the public of other States finds scandalous in Indiana procedure is, the almost absolute discretion allowed to the judges in deciding what is sufficient cause for a divorce, and the exceeding looseness with which the Courts allow "bona-fide residence" to be proved, and the disgusting frauds which are practised even in the publication of the legal notice.

The remainder of the Sickles correspondence, of which there has been so much talk, and which, some months ago, scared the English press out of its propriety, has been communicated to Congress, but there is nothing particularly new in it. General Sickles offered the good offices of the United States, and proposed an armistice; then withdrew the offer of good offices, but not the note containing them, and which also contained remonstrances. He was assured by the Spanish Ministers that they were prepared to give Cuba representation in the Cortes, and commercial freedom, and to abolish slavery, as soon as the insurrection was suppressed; and that the antiquated colonial policy of the Bourbons was at an end for ever. At the close of December, General Sickles reported general despondency about the winter campaign, and the war in general, except in the official circles. The closing letter of the correspondence is one from Mr. Fish, dated January 26, in which he says some very sensible things about our Cuban Junta, and which it is not too late for the Junta to lay to heart. The first is that it would have been well if they had expended their money in shipping arms and munitions to Cuba, which they might always have legally done; they would in this way have helped the cause much more effectually than by getting up hostile expeditions on American soil, contrary to law. He adds one other cruel suggestion, and that is, that the members of the Junta themselves should have laid down the reins of government here, and gone to Cuba to take personal part in the fray. This view of their duty, strange to say, has presented itself to various other minds.

The news from France is not important, except that it reveals the existence of considerable hostility to the Ollivier Ministry in the ranks of the moderate radical party, since the arrest of Rochefort. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the expediency of prosecuting Rochefort at all, there is none as to the recklessness of the way in which he was arrested. Instead of taking a favorable opportunity for the purpose, when he was alone, they seized and carried him off at a public meeting, in the presence of an excited crowd, and, of course, disturbances at once began. Gustave Flourens, who is another statesman of the madcap school, thereupon fired his revolver in the air and "rose in insurrection," as he was pleased to term it, commencing hostilities by dragging along through the street an unfortunate Commissary of Police with a sword at his throat. Then small barricades of omnibuses were erected here and there during the ensuing forty-eight hours, and feebly defended, and easily stormed by the police and troops without burning powder, but with much bloodshed and, as in all these cases, needless cruelty. The affair was a very small one compared to the émeutes of Louis Philippe's day, or of that of the Republic, but it was made serious by the fact that it was a Liberal Ministry newly installed which had to deal with it. Enough has occurred to show, however, that this régime cannot be got rid of readily by force, and that anybody who proposes to put an end to it by a coup de main will have some serious work before him. Gustave Flourens, after "rising in insurrection," stayed only a very short time up, and is now in Belgium. A correspondent writes to us that we do not take into account, in judging Rochefort, that he, such as he is, is a product of imperial rule. We do take it into account; but of what moment is the consideration? Napoleon himself is the result of the Republic, and the Republic was the result of Louis Philippe, and the whole state of France is the result of feudalism and divine right, and of the conquest of Gaul by the barbarians. But what have we got to do with all this? When a man is making an ass of himself, and plunging a whole state in disorder, he has no right to excuse himself by saying that his antecedents are to blame, and that if what went before him had not been what it was, the conditions necessary for making an ass of himself would not have existed, and he would have either not appeared on the scene, or have behaved sensibly.

In the meantime, however, Jules Favre, who is certainly a moderate and able man, is a good deal disgusted with the procedure of the Government, particularly in the matter of Rochefort's arrest and the story of a conspiracy, which has been used as a justification of a good deal of violence. But the main ground of offence is that the majority which supports Ollivier does not represent the country. The Chamber was elected under the old régime that was returned largely by the intrigues and intimidation of the prefects. The scandalous conduct of these functionaries was fully exposed in the elaborate examination of the qualifications of members, which the French call "vérification des pouvoirs;" but though a good many of them have been dismissed, the men they helped to elect remain. Jules Favre, therefore, in behalf of the "Left Centre," calls for a dissolution and new election, in default of which he threatens that he and his friends will vote with the "Left," which, being interpreted, means that the moderate and extreme radicals will unite their forces. Press prosecutions continue on a great scale, even under the new rule laid down by M. Ollivier, that only "outrages"—that is, insults, libels, and incitements to insurrection—are to be prosecuted; expressions of opinion or criticism of the ministers, however wild, are to be let pass.

There appears to be no doubt that a Socialist conspiracy has been discovered in Russia, having for its object the establishment of a clandestine revolutionary government like that of the Poles during the late insurrection. It was discovered through their having murdered a recalcitrant member to get him out of the way. The land question still seems far from satisfactory settlement, and is rapidly becoming the same bone of contention there as in other parts of the world. The communistic tenure by which the villagers now hold their land, and which seems to be the earliest form of land tenure, is eagerly upheld by the fanatical Panslavists, who treat it as the basis of Slavonic civilization, and the only true protection against the disorders which are afflicting Western society, while the other party are anxious for the institution of individual property as soon as possible, so as to bring the empire into the stream of Western progress. A pamphlet has appeared in St. Petersburg calling for the payment by the Government instead of by the peasants of the remaining compensation due to the nobles, the funds to be provided by cutting down the army one-half.

Mr. Gladstone has brought in his Irish Land Bill, of which a muddy summary reached us, by telegraph, some days ago. The main features seem to be "security of tenure," which, we suppose, means the suppression of eviction for anything but non-payment of rent, and the provision of compensation for tenants' improvements, and the establishment of a Court of Arbitration. The Irish members, it is reported, express themselves satisfied with it, but the Fenians refuse to take any comfort from it, which is not surprising. There is a long interval between independence and limited interest in a farm. The long promised Educational Bill has also been brought in. England and Wales are to be divided into educational districts, and schools and inspection to be provided, partly supported by Government and partly by local taxes upon parents who are able to pay something; those who are not, to have tickets entitling them to send their children free. Mr. Fawcett asks to have a compulsory clause inserted, but the success of this is very unlikely.

THE CENSUS IMBROGLIO.

The ordinary practical work of legislation, entirely distinct from active partisan warfare, is something in which the public can hardly be expected to feel any deep interest, and, indeed, as the public has private affairs to attend to, there seems to be no reason why it should concern itself about matters for the special charge of which it has taken the trouble to make an elaborate selection of some three hundred or more of its fellow-citizens. If the Government is fit to exist at all, it may surely be trusted to perform, to the best of its ability, the mechanical part of governing. Yet every now and then there comes some exhibition of legerdemain or gymnastics in the way of this apparently mechanical legislation, for which one cannot help feeling a certain curiosity to account. There is no actual proof that the present difficulty about the census is the result of any intentional mystification on the part of any one. All that appears to the world is only a rather remarkable legislative miscarriage. Whether the causes of the disaster are organic, or whether they are accidental, is a subject for deeper discussion than we can afford at present to give; but the facts, so far as they can be ascertained, are as follows:

It appears that the law of 1850, under which the census has been twice taken, came into force again, by its own terms, on the 1st of January, 1870, unless superseded by other legislation. In view of this fact, the House of Representatives at its last session appointed a committee to examine the subject of the census of 1870, and report whether further legislation was required. Unfortunately, the House seems here at the very outset to have made a mistake. The Senate was not consulted. That such small considerations should have any real weight may be matter of surprise; but it is true, and not only true, but perfectly natural that, in the first place, one House of Congress is slightly jealous of the other, and, in the second place, that a bill which every one knows to be wholly the production of one or more members of the lower House is not likely to find any large number of senators ready to be responsible for it. Had the Committee on the Ninth Census been a joint committee of both Houses, the result would have been different. Nevertheless, organized as it was, the committee was a strong one, and did its work with the utmost faithfulness. Perhaps its earliest conclusion, unanimously arrived at, was that the law of 1850, though an excellent law in its time, had in twenty years become somewhat antiquated, and that some improvements in it were needed in order to place it on a level with the development of the country and the rapid advance of statistical science. One can scarcely conceive how any other conclusion was possible, and at all events there was not even a doubt felt on the subject by the different members of the committee.

After an elaborate investigation, and after examining a host of experts, the committee agreed to report a bill which contained several new and important peculiarities. Some of these were in the schedules, which were framed with the idea of gaining greater accuracy in details. As the United States Government, unlike most foreign governments, has no permanent statistical bureau, details must either be obtained in the decennial census or not at all. Some of the old schedules were laid aside, some were greatly altered, and in some cases new schedules were introduced. But the most radical change was that which the committee made in the machinery of the census. Under the old system the work had been performed by the marshals. The new bill created an entirely new organization, independent of all other Government machinery, and arranged for a division of the work according to the system of congressional districts.

General Garfield, who had charge of the bill, carried it triumphantly through the House, after a long and careful debate, lasting some two weeks, and on the 17th of December it went to the Senate. Here it was referred not to a special committee, but to the standing Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which Mr. Conkling was chairman, and Mr. Sumner, Mr. Carpenter, and two other senators were members. There is humor in everything—even in the fate of a census bill—and the humor in this case consisted in the composition of the committee. Mr. Conkling has a mind of so peculiar a turn that he rarely supports any measure except it be for the purpose of objecting to some other. This is frequently embarrassing in the despatch of business, and it is the more so as this is not Mr. Conkling's only peculiarity. He is as weak in constructing as he is strong in obstructiveness, and, while he often prevents bad measures from passing, he does not so often assist good ones. Add to this a strong and, we admit, not ill-founded confidence in his own opinions, and not altogether unjustifiable contempt for those of some of his colleagues, and it will be evident enough that difficulty was in store for the Census Bill. When such a character is brought in contact with Mr. Senator Sumner, the consequences are plain. Two Jupiters may not exist together on any Olympus. Yet, to do Mr. Sumner justice, it is not his nature to resist merely for the pleasure of resisting. On indifferent matters, of which he is totally ignorant, he usually attempts to aid honest legislation rather than to display his own critical ingenuity in objections. But, as fate would have it, the Senate had during this session been little more than a prize-ring in which Mr. Sumner and his brother senators had fought out their private quarrels with extraordinary ill-temper, and the Census Bill happened to come at a moment when senators thought it time that Mr. Sumner should be snubbed.

After a considerable delay the Committee met, and as its members knew nothing whatever about the subject, and as in such a company agreement would have been miraculous, they concluded their deliberations of half an hour or thereabouts by deciding to disagree. As a matter of course, Mr. Conkling disapproved the House bill. As a matter of course, Mr. Sumner thought Mr. Conkling too hasty, and, as any one might have expected, the other members took part against the House of Representatives and against Mr. Sumner. The matter then went before the Senate. Mr. Conkling in an admirably clever speech conclusively proved that there were difficulties in the way of every census, and that this special census was not without difficulties of a grave nature; that no census could possibly be perfect, and that this particular census would be imperfect; that there were objections to all bills for taking the census, and that there were several objections to the House bill; but that, in his own opinion, the law of 1850 was the best law that ever had been or ever could be framed, and that he was opposed to any other law. Mr. Sumner thereupon made a speech to prove that the law of 1850 was twenty years old, and that in the interval the world had moved forward; but the Senate was determined that Mr. Sumner should be mistaken, and Mr. Conkling enjoyed a triumph. The House bill was incidentally laid upon the table.

One point, it is true, remained in the background. That it had any influence on Mr. Conkling's mind is out of the question; and that it had any effect on other senators is not to be suspected. Yet it is a very curious coincidence that the machinery adopted by the House bill would, owing to the organization by congressional districts, have thrown all the patronage into the House of Representatives, while the marshals are usually nominated by senators. Little attention was publicly called to this fact, but it is supposed to have had a decided influence on the fate of the bill. Nor is it in any way improbable that the Senate may have had this motive among others in rejecting the House bill, since in the course of its history the Senate has seldom been known to surrender willingly anything that had value; and as for this eternal matter of patronage, there seems to be as little reason why the Senate should give up to the House any perquisites which it had once succeeded in stealing, as there is reason why the House should be obliged to leave the Senate in undisturbed possession of its plunder. In this kind of contest the House has but a poor chance of success, however; and in the present case many members who have pledged all their expected patronage in advance, are inclined to suspect that Mr. Conkling's speech was even more clever than is commonly thought, inasmuch as even where it was silent it was most convincing.

What is to become of the census meanwhile is not a matter of anxiety, since Mr. Secretary Cox happens to be an excellent officer, and will manage to have his duties well performed. In some manner, too, Gen. Garfield will no doubt save the best parts of his bill, and his work will not be wholly lost. But as to the practical working of the public business, the story thus told is interesting, because it illustrates the peculiar condition of politics this winter, when the only rule at Washington seems to be that every one, from the President and Chief-Justice Chase and Mr. Boutwell, down to the Senate and the House and each individual senator and member, shall be actively employed in governing the country from an independent stand-point, according to each individual's idea of his own wisdom, and with sublime independence of every one else. "Let every man drag out his own corpse," was an expressive figure of speech lately used by Mr. James Fisk, jr., in his evidence before Gen. Garfield's committee on the gold panic. For the public service, it is nearly time that our statesmen should begin this operation in earnest, or a great many political corpses will be left on the field by weary constituencies at the first chance offered them.

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS A POUND ON IDEAS.

We said something last week of the movement to have a specific duty of from ten to twenty-five cents per pound put on foreign books, without regard to the nature of their contents, the American publishers who are also importers—Messrs. Scribner & Co. at the head of them—having issued a pamphlet, of which we spoke, showing that the effect of such a measure would be to increase the cost of all imported books an average of about 96 per cent.—those of general literature absolutely 162 per cent.; and that American reprinters of foreign books have now all the protection they need in a virtual protection of twenty-five per cent.; that the English interlopers here, so far from receiving "the larger part of the books imported," only receive ten per cent. of them; and that not over one in a hundred of English books would pay to reprint here, not because American publishers are not properly protected by the tariff, but for want of a market. There is, indeed, only one excuse for the change which will bear examination, and that is the extent to which the American trade is cheated by fraudulent invoices. This can be met by a specific duty; but it need not be, and ought not to be, an enormously increased duty.

Our main object, however, in recurring to the subject is to draw attention to the state of mind on the part of some persons which has led to the discussion. An elaborate article in advocacy of the change appears in the March number of Old and New, which contains, all things considered, the most remarkable application of the doctrines of protection it has ever been our good fortune to meet with, and we commend it to the attention of all students of political economy as an excellent illustration of the oddity of the situations of which the protectionist theory is full. The writer, in the first place, ascribes the rise of American literature from the low condition in which it was at the beginning of this century mainly to the tariff, or, as he calls it, "the introduction, by a fortunate freak of South Carolina politicians, of the national policy into the revenue system." As soon as he had written this, a faint sense of the nature of the proposition seems to have stolen over him, for he qualified it thus in the next sentence:

> "Of course, we would not say baldly, that a protective tariff created the brains and the intelligence which have built up in fifty years an American literature. But it is the simple truth of history that gradually, as the other arts began to flourish in America, the arts used in book-making flourished also, and under the same laws."

It is thus evident, when he is talking of literature, that what he really means is the mechanical art of book-making, not the ideas put on paper by authors. Here we get at the key to the whole argument. Literature, in this sense, is not a means, as so many people consider it, to the cultivation of the human mind, and through this cultivation to the improvement of human character and the promotion of human happiness, but an end in itself. Its mission is not to spread thoughts, but to keep printers and typefounders going; and a people is well off in regard to letters not in proportion to the quality of the books within its reach, and which it is in the habit of reading, but to the number of mechanics employed in manufacturing books. When a country produces a great many bound volumes every year, it has done its duty; what they contain is a matter of secondary importance. Better there should be few or no native readers than that there should be few or no native printers. In short, the reader exists for the sake of the printer, not the printer for the reader. If the reader refuses to support our printer, let him have no reading. This may sound oddly; but we have really been here doing what the author apparently omitted to do for himself—divesting his reasoning of its extraneous matter, and exhibiting it in its naked simplicity.

The pamphlet in which this article has been reprinted contains also three other letters addressed to the Boston Advertiser, signed "An Author," which are equally deserving of examination, and for the same reason. He urges a new reason for piling up the duties on foreign, and especially English books. We shall describe it in his own language:

> "I have all along treated of books as merchandise, for thus must they be considered, rightly to understand the agencies at work changing the old condition of things. It is time to treat books with more respect, as bodies of idea. . . . It is not possible to measure the comparative force of English and American ideas, and it is to be said that the impinging of American life upon English has been by politics and not by literature; but the fact remains indisputable that literature is the very mercurial expression of national life, and a current that flows through the veins of humanity. Look for a moment at my figures: In 1869, importations of foreign books, $1,607,201; in 1869, export of American books to England, £7,387.
>
> "Are we prepared, then, to accept, as a real good, popular literature, born of English life, for American readers? I answer unhesitatingly, no. We are not yet rid of that terrible conflict, waged on battle-fields from 1861 to 1865, in which the victorious forces were inspired by American ideas, and the oppugnant, hardly-beaten forces were reinforced time and again by English ideas, silently sympathetic or openly contributed; the instinct of literary and aristocratic England made it Southern from the start, and the exceptional courageous men, journals, and books of Democratic England, that as instinctively sided with our nation, were stigmatized as American. American they were, for not in vain had the republic lived, and it was the existence of the republic that called out England's hatred, though no American abolitionists of divine right of kings had fomented English society. And the fact that the English literature of the day, with few notable exceptions, was anti-American, is my reason for thinking it a grave evil that this literature, bearing the seeds of antagonistic ideas, should be the household literature of our country.
>
> "Men laugh and ask if American ideas, so lately triumphant, have not vigor enough still to preserve national life against English ideas. Have they so soon forgotten the combat with Southern ideas, and is it over? For a generation and more, Southern leaders had with marvellous skill excluded Northern literature from their section; they were wise in their generation, the result proved it. No ally on their side was so mighty as the ignorance of their people of a literature bright with freedom. When the enterprise of the London publisher and the short-sightedness of our Government have turned America into a magnificent market for English literature, new conflicts will find our right arm shrivelled, and by the same process the sturdy voice of Americanism in England will have become a whisper."

Here we see foreign books (English books are specially mentioned, but the proposed change in the tariff would of course affecct all foreign books), treated as "bodies of idea," and not simply as articles of commerce, and their exclusion called for through governmental interference, on the express ground that American men and women will be injured by their perusal. It is assumed that the attachment of American citizens to the ideas which lie at the basis of American polity, and to the institutions in which these ideas are embodied, can only be maintained by rigidly guarding them against external influences. English literature is "antagonistic" to American ideas; it is, therefore, to be met not with an American literature created by American thinkers, fighting for all they hold dear, but by an import duty of twenty-five cents a pound avoirdupois. The writer, however, candidly acknowledges at this point—and we can readily believe him—that "men laugh" when he expresses his fears lest American ideas have not vigor enough to preserve the national life against "English ideas." He then, with a perfectly grave face, however, and as if in reprehension of their levity, proceeds to cite, in proof both of the expediency and feasibility of his proposal, the example of our Southern brethren, in excluding "ideas" from their territory in defence of the peculiar institution. See, he says, how successful they were; why should not we imitate them? We are afraid "men will laugh" here again; but we ask for composure and solemnity for one minute while we give "An Author" one or two reasons for thinking that his plan for protecting American ideas is inexpedient and foolish.

The first is, that it has been tried thoroughly. What he proposes to do by the custom-house, many governments in many ages have tried to do, in just as conscientious a spirit as his, by the aid of the dungeon, halter, and thumb-screw, and utterly failed. Particular ideas were never kept out of any country in this way; even the attempt to keep them out cannot be made except by inflicting enormous damage on all thought, and on civilization itself, which is a product of thought. Various European powers have tried to protect their peculiar ideas by a censorship of foreign publications at the frontier, which is a much more sensible plan than taxing them so much per pound, because in that way what they thought the good ideas were let in and only the bad ones kept out; under the specific duty all would suffer equally, and the bad ones would get in more or less. The South, which our "Author" holds up as a model, could never have protected its ideas so long by a specific duty. The anti-slavery men would have paid the duty, and flooded the country with incendiary documents. The slaveholders went to work much more effectively by prohibiting postmasters from circulating obnoxious printed matter, and "running off" any bookseller who sold it. This is what must be done at the North if we mean to preserve our babes from contamination. But this involves, also, a slight imitation of the Pope. We must have an index expurgatorius for the use of the custom-house officers, and a permanent board to superintend it.

The second is, that ideas which cannot hold their own without material protection are not worth saving. They ought to perish, and the sooner the better. Any idea which is fit to live will live, no matter who assails it; and if it have no root in human nature, or in the order of the universe, the Committee of Ways and Means can never save it. The destroyer will reach it through all the custom-houses on the globe. Human thought goes through tide-waiters like lightning. All systems, whether civil or ecclesiastical, in our day, must stand or fall by their own inherent vigor.

The true way to enable American ideas to resist European influences is one which, strange to say, is not so much as hinted at in the pamphlet before us. It is to raise up and foster not custom-house officers, but hardy and strong thinkers and scholars for their defence. It is the hosts of these he has at his back which makes the European publisher formidable to his American rival. But they must be met on open ground, with improved weapons and discipline, and not in the Chinese fashion, by building a big wall along the frontier. For this purpose, what we need is not fewer foreign books, but more. Books are not an end—they are an instrument. The dearness and scarcity of them is exercising a most injurious influence on American culture; the universities are suffering from want of professors and libraries; poor students—and the mass of American students must always be poor—are suffering from the difficulty of access to the enormous wealth of learning which Europe is every year producing. Our scientific men and investigators, in all fields, can accomplish nothing without constant contact with their fellow-laborers in other countries. They know well that God, in his great mercy, permits even Germans and Englishmen and Frenchmen to find out things from year to year, which American thinkers will be the better of hearing of; but, so far from being helped by our legislation and public opinion, they are hindered. The guardianship of American ideas is all committed to their hands; on their labors it depends what the result of this great experiment will be; whether the civilization of this continent will be a hardy and vigorous tree, in whose shade the weary of all nations can find an assured rest, and on which the storms of ages will beat in vain, or a sickly custom-house plant, kept alive by a close covering of tariffs and tests, drawing all the vitality it possesses from the feeble surface tillage of half-taught magazine and newspaper writers and platform orators. The protection American authors need, as one of them pointed out a year or two ago (Jan. 9, 1868) in our columns, in an article entitled "The Great American Novel," is protection "from being undersold in their own market by the stolen brain-labor of other countries." Let us have an end to stealing. Let no American author any more have to compete with foreign authors who have received nothing for their work. This would be true protection, for it would rest on what is as everlasting as the hills—justice—the right of every human being to the product of his own labor. The absence of international copyright is, like slavery and all other embodiments of wrong in national policy, defeating the very ends it was expected to serve. It enriches a few; but it is repressing the growth of the national literature and enfeebling the national thought.

THE NEW HAMLET.

It is said by some persons that Shakespeare cannot be played nowadays. If by this is meant that, of his dramas and of the personages who move through them like the figures of a vivid dream, uttering thoughts and feelings intensely human, and yet sublimed as much above the experience of everyday humanity as the language which they speak is above that of daily conversation, we have an ideal so high that no acting can approach it so near as not to leave a great gap that must be filled by the imagination, the judgment that would exclude Shakespeare from the stage is somewhat reasonable. But opposed to it is the pregnant fact that Shakespeare was a playwright, with an interest in a theatre, and that, writing his plays only that they should be acted and bring money to the treasury, he succeeded in this purely theatrical and business project far better than any other of the many gifted dramatic poets of his time. One reason why the performance of Shakespeare's plays was so satisfactory to the London public, and therefore so profitable to him, when he played in them, and why the performance of them now is generally so unsatisfactory and unprofitable, is that then they were regarded merely as new plays, in the personages, the entanglements, the progress, and the issue of which the audiences for which they were written found themselves, they hardly knew why, deeply interested. They went to hear The Tempest, and Hamlet, and King Lear, untroubled by the consciousness that they were listening to the greatest literary productions, as well as the finest dramatic conceptions, the world had known, or would know, for centuries. The play was good and the acting was good, and they were satisfied. But since it began to be discovered, about a century ago, that the Stratford rustic and London player wrote with an inspiration that has hitherto been given to no other mortal, the world has been pondering his work, and analyzing it, and falling down before it in adoration, until one of his plays, and particularly one of his tragedies, is raised in our minds upon a high ideal plane, into a sublime ethereal atmosphere that places it apart and far above the mere theatrical place and purpose for which it was written.

This is as it should be. The influence of a really grand ideal work, when it is thus looked up to with a humble, teachable admiration, is wholesome, purifying, elevating. And of all the few works worthy of such admiration, the first and highest are Shakespeare's. But one consequence of this attitude of actors and public toward the works of any dramatic writer is the falling into a hard, formal, exaggerated, conventional style of performance, which is looked upon as ideal only because it is unnatural. From this, how much have we of this generation all suffered from our youth up! Because of this, how many of us have kept ourselves violently away from the theatre when the play-bills threatened what they called a Shakespearean revival!—revivals in which were extinguished both Shakespeare and Nature, who, lovely in their lives, in their deaths were not divided, and whose stiffened corpses were fitly buried under tombs of painted canvas and cotton velvet.

To relieve us from this incubus upon our Shakespeare, Mr. Fechter has appeared—a man of vivid histrionic intuitions; an actor who, whether he does right or wrong, holds the attention of his audience; who, whether his conception of character is correct or incorrect, is, for the time being, the personage whom he represents, and who is a gifted and a finished exemplar of the realistic school of French acting.

Mr. Fechter's Hamlet at once pleases and dissatisfies, interests and repels. We are disappointed with it, and yet we are glad to have seen it. So much has been written about it in England, and so unqualified was Mr. Dickens's eulogy of his talent, that mere curiosity was sure to bring him the success of crowded houses in a tour through the United States. If, instead of being a gifted and accomplished actor, he had been a learned gorilla, he would have been no less secured against pecuniary failure And yet, with few exceptions, all of the more intelligent part of his audiences are disappointed with his Hamlet; while at the same time nearly all of them confess to having received a certain degree of vivid pleasure from its performance. The reason of this double condition of their minds is that his conception of the character is utterly at variance with the just ideal of it, while his performance is in many respects a refreshing contrast to the false-ideal style in which it is usually presented. "Ah!" said the Frenchwoman, as, heated with dancing and candlelight, she drank a glass of cold water, "ah! quel dommage qu'il ne soit pas un péché!" Now, we are more fortunate than she, for Fechter's Hamlet is cool fresh water to our parched palates, but it is a sin. It is a very lively, vigorous, coherent performance; very natural and very real; as real as the action of any butcher-boy that swaggers through Washington Market, and therefore—the play being what it is, one the life of which cannot be extinguished by any treatment—very interesting. But it is not Shakespeare's Hamlet—no more like it than Hamlet was to Hercules—indeed, much more like Hercules.

The Hamlet that Mr. Fechter puts before us is a real man; a man full of life and vigor, and, above all, of purpose and resolution; a man of simple common sense, a very practical way of looking at things, and a prompt, decided way of treating them—a fellow who will stand no nonsense, and one whom, therefore, Shakespeare omitted from his "Hamlet," for the very good reason that, if he had not done so, the play would have come to a swift end in a single act. Shakespeare's Hamlet muses, and dallies, and procrastinates, making excuses for others and condemning himself, excusing himself and condemning others, analyzing his own motives and seeking after those of others; ever fearful that he may be precipitate in action, nevertheless ever conscious that, with intellectual epicureanism, he is shuffling away from what he feels is a hard, unpleasant duty, and suffering from this conflict of conviction and vacillation until his excited brain brings up, by an optical delusion, his father's ghost before his mind's eye (for the ghost in the "Queen's" chamber is not the real ghost of the castle platform) to reprove him for his inaction, yet meeting his father's murderer again and jesting with him; coming back from England, where, as he finds, he was sent by that murdering usurper to be put to death, and yet musing and philosophizing in a churchyard; then accepting a challenge to a fencing-match, and finally killing his guilty uncle, not to avenge his father's death, but on an impulse of the moment. This is Shakespeare's Hamlet: Mr. Fechter's Hamlet, after his interview with the Ghost, would have gone straightway to the palace and, taking the King by the throat wherever he could have found him, would have cut his heart out and flung it in the face of his mother, and immediately have given orders for his own wedding with Ophelia. With him it would have been a word and a blow, and the blow would have come before the word. The Hamlet he shows us is one of the most vital, coherent, clearly conceived, perfectly embodied creations ever presented on the stage. Therefore the interest it has even for those whom it offends; for it is a real man, and one of a kind not too uncommon: a man inflexible in purpose and prompt in action, a kind of man who always enlists the sympathies and generally wins the approval of those around him. But the other Hamlet was, with all his subtlety, his thoughtfulness, and his good intentions, a shilly-shally sort of fellow.

To ensure consistency in his Hamlet, Mr. Fechter does not hesitate to make changes in the text. He omits, of course, what all modern actors omit, the fine soliloquy in the fourth act, which Hamlet speaks after meeting young Fortinbras, and in which he himself gives the key-note of his character:

> "Now whether it be > Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
> Of thinking too precisely on the event,
> A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
> And ever three parts coward—I do not know
> Why yet I live to say, This thing's to do."

Omitting this soliloquy is very much like enacting the old joke of omitting the character of Hamlet from the tragedy; but still all actors do it. Mr. Fechter also leaves out another, almost equally important—that in the third act, in which Hamlet, finding the King at prayers, when "he might do it pat," shuffles away from his purpose again, under the plea that, if he should kill the King then, he would but send his father's murderer to heaven! Again he changes the last scene of this act, as indeed he must to have his Hamlet in keeping. He enters his Queen mother's apartment, after the astounding development produced by the play, and, promptly marching up to her, says with a jaunty, good-natured, bantering impudence, "Now, mother, what's the matter?" much as a lad of the period, our period, might address his old lady when he expected her to scold him for staying out too late at night. All through this sad and deeply moving scene he, in marked manner, shows the colloquial, realistic style in which he has chosen to deliver the speeches of this most poetic and ideal of Shakespeare's conceptions. At the close of the scene he not only cuts out all that passes between Hamlet and his mother, after he has told her to refrain herself from his uncle's bed that night, which includes a reference to his feigned madness, and the well-known passage about "the engineer hoist with his own petard," but he transposes the line,

> "Thus bad begins and worse remains behind," and makes it close the scene. Worse yet, and characteristic of the low, literal tone in which he pitches his conception of the tragedy, when he says, "Thus bad begins," he points with his forefinger behind the arras to the dead Polonius, and, pausing a moment, concludes the speech, "and worse remains behind," pointing with his thumb over his shoulder to his mother, who has left the apartment. A more absurd and debasing perversion of the author's purpose it would be difficult to imagine. But it is in entire keeping with Mr. Fechter's conception of the character of Hamlet, which has a self-poise and rounded perfection quite marvellous. As Shakespeare wrote this line, it is one of those general reflections on men and things with which Hamlet diverts his mind, even in the most important crisis of his life: it has no particular reference to any thing or act, and only a general pertinence to the situation. Mr. Fechter—or, if not he, some one else—cuts it out of its setting, transposes it, and brings it down to bald reality by violently applying it to the killing of the old courtier and the conduct of the Queen.

But although there is such a consistency between Mr. Fechter's conception of Hamlet and the text he gives us, that the conclusion as to a proposed formation of that text is warranted, it seems more probable, so amazing is his ignorance of the character of Shakespeare's prince, that he is entirely unacquainted with the tragedy as Shakespeare wrote it, and has studied only the old mutilated stage copy in vogue in the early part of this century.

To say much more of this performance would be superfluous, even were there room and time in which to say it; but it is worth while to notice the shifts to which the actor is put in his effort to be both colloquial and original. He continually startles the ear by an accent thrown in an unusual and generally an improper place; as thus, to the Ghost, "Go on, I'll follow thee," the consequence of which is a distinction between Hamlet and his companions which is entirely out of keeping with the purpose of the scene. And again: "Thou com'st in such a questionable shape that I will speak to thee;" but no one has forbidden or even entreated him not to speak to the Ghost. And again, as to Polonius being at supper, he says, "Not where he eats;" the sense being merely that Polonius is at a supper, not where he eats, but where he is eaten! Such extravagance is, however, the almost inevitable consequence and punishment of an effort to be original for the sake of being original, and to read an ideal drama colloquially. Of the latter fault, the scene with the Clown in the graveyard is a very glaring and offensive example. Mr. Fechter, instead of entering at "a distance," and communing with Horatio apart until he addresses the Gravedigger (Shakespeare indicates a palpable break in Hamlet's speech, and an approach to the Clown), plumps right down upon the man, stands at the foot of the grave, and speaks out his thoughts without reserve or hesitation, and then sits down on a gravestone, raises one leg upon the other knee, nurses his foot, and falls a-chaffing with the fellow, as if he were a New York politician courting popularity with a gentlemanly barkeeper. In brief, in spite of the middle-age illuminated manuscript on which the speech is written which he hands the "First Player" (he might just as well hand him a leaf of the Nation), Mr. Fechter's Hamlet is quite such a colloquial, everyday, dégagé prince as any one of our first families in the Fifth Avenue might ask to drop in without ceremony and take a family dinner, or ask him even without knowing that he was his mother's son, and learn after his departure, to their wonder, delight, and vexation, that they had entertained a prince unawares.

For the pronunciation of this spirited actor constant and large allowance must be made; and in criticising him, that trait of his elocution must be passed over with tolerant good-nature, in grateful consideration of his peculiar merits. But one of his lapses in this play was so characteristic, so annoying, and so provocative of laughter that it should be mentioned. He said—

> "I'll call thee Hamlet, > King, father, rawldane: O answer me!"

But Mr. Fechter's performance, however intolerable it is as a representation of Shakspeare's Hamlet, is full of instruction. Napoleon said to Talma that he would make him play to a theatre full of kings. Mr. Fechter should play Hamlet to a theatre full of actors. By a thoughtful study of his performance, they might learn what it is that makes tragedy in itself so distasteful nowadays to cultivated people; and they might perhaps seize and take to themselves the secret power by which Mr. Fechter gives to this, as well as to all his impersonations, that vividness, unity, and picturesque vitality which ensure him his constant hold on the attention of every individual in his audiences, even when he fails to attain their approval. "What do you think?" said one to another, after his first performance here of the "Prince of Denmark." "Well," was the reply, "a very lively piece of acting; but it is hard to tell whether it is Hamlet playing Ruy Blas or Ruy Blas playing Hamlet."

Correspondence.

THE PROPOSED DISMISSALS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I respectfully ask your influence in behalf of the army officers before whom the prospect is now opening of speedy and relentless decapitation. I am well aware that the opinions of any military officer regarding army legislation will be attributed to personal motives, and therefore excite less interest or examination into their justice than might be expected did they emanate from some uninterested authority. Therefore, I ask your voice in our behalf. I have searched the leading daily journals for some evidence of a disposition to defend our cause on the ground of justice, but no success has rewarded my investigations. On the contrary, I find the subject of army reduction discussed with sneers, abuse, and sarcasm; all considerations of justice involved in the question utterly ignored, or referred to as presumption; and in the least vindictive journals leniency in our behalf urged only on the ground of charity, So much for the leaders of public sentiment. Turning to Congress, I find no indication of a desire to fairly and justly discuss the question. No voice is raised in our behalf, and recommendations of the President and heads of Departments favoring us are passed by in silence.

In the House Military Bill recently reported, no allusion is made to the portions of the above official reports referring to insufficiency of pay, miserable quarters, and suggestions as to army reform. All such considerations are ignored in the eager desire to get rid of us, on the ground of retrenchment. It is called economy to discharge an officer, with the present of a year's pay and allowances, when the fact exists that at the expiration of the year the same officer, if retained on the rolls, would be "absorbed," having previously earned his pay on detached service as Indian agent, recruiting duty, College Military Professor, and other positions where his services are now, and can be, made available. I have tried to take an unprejudiced view of the subject, and am confident of the existence of considerations not to be ignored. If it were an outrageous breach of faith for five hundred officers (more or less) to offer their resignations on the eve of hostilities with a foreign nation, surely the unjust discharge from the service of those same officers must be a proceeding equally open to disparaging criticism. Permit me to briefly call your attention to some of the reasons that impel me to ask your protest against our summary muster-out.

On the 28th of July, 1866, Congress passed an act for the "permanent" organization of the army. In compliance with its provisions, applications for appointments were made, examinations passed, and all requirements of Congress complied with by a large number of those who had faithfully served in the volunteer service during the late war. As evidence of their compliance with the provisions of the above act, they have the commission issued to them. Relying upon the permanency of their positions, they no longer sought civil positions, and assumed, by marriage, responsibilities utterly unwarranted under other circumstances. They allowed the best years of their lives to glide away, increasing in military knowledge, but losing all opportunities of again commencing life outside of their professions. Suddenly the prospect opens to them of being turned adrift, by muster-out, at an advanced age, and forced to begin life anew trammelled by responsibilities assumed in blind confidence, with no resources except a present of one year's pay and allowances (which would be consumed by arrearages contracted in trying to "keep up their positions"), and rendered unfit by their profession to obtain a foothold. If the absence of all reliance upon the permanency of public positions, which is the curse of the civil branch, is to pervade the military branch of the Government, how can superiority of discipline and training be expected? It is humiliating to compare our troops on the northern frontier with those of the English army on duty in Canada. It is impossible for an officer to take the same pride in the military instruction of those under his command so long as he feels that Congress will legislate him out of the service, consolidate the company on which he has expended hours of labor, transfer him to a different regiment by entirely "wiping out" his old regiment with all its associations, or in some way suspend and interfere with the efficiency of the service. An approaching session of Congress is, under the circumstances, anticipated with a feeling of uncertainty that must impair the zeal and energy so necessary to the effectiveness of an army. Not desiring or presuming to expect the publication of this letter, I respectfully ask your charity for all errors and omissions, and trust the facts I have stated may justify my request for your plea in behalf of the officers of the army.

Respectfully yours,

Regular Army.

February 9, 1870.

[This is undoubtedly a fair subject of complaint. A good many honest and able men in Congress are acquiescing in this piece of injustice, through an unthinking though praiseworthy zeal for retrenchment; but they are not the persons whom the victims have most to fear, or have most reason to complain of. The army (and we include the navy) is the one branch of the public service, as Mr. Jenckes showed in his reports last year, which has preserved the spirit of honesty, self-sacrifice, and fidelity which should animate all branches of it, but does not. Army officers have their faults, like all men, and like all professions, but cheating, shirking, and intriguing are not amongst the number. They do not steal the Government funds; they do in the most efficient manner all work set them to do; they are faithful in all circumstances, even unto death; they love their calling more than money; and they are the only class of men in Government employ who see behind the party in power "that yet auguster thing," the whole country, for whose glory and prosperity parties ought to exist, which was before all parties, and will survive them all. Now, we confess, we think if it be allowable for the community to tax itself for any purpose except the payment of the bare expenses of preserving order, the maintenance of a body of this sort is not by any means a bad thing to tax ourselves for. We believe the existence of such a body is at least as useful to the country as any "interest" which now has to rely on protection for its existence. We would far rather have a boy grow up in sight of a batch of men in the public service doing faithfully the work given them to do, through good and evil report, and without expectation of much other reward than the approval of their own consciences, and in faithfulness to traditions of honor and duty, of which they had made themselves the guardians, than of any mill that ever was built. Now we have no hesitation in saying that their very virtues, their thoroughness, their efficiency, their honesty, their hatred of quackery, charlatanry, and self-seeking, make the army officers intensely obnoxious to a certain set of politicians who are just now very influential in the House, and are by no means powerless in the Senate. We shall not mention names, but it would not take a very shrewd guesser to guess at least one of the persons of this kind, in the House, whom we have in our eye.

But even if it be admitted that it is no part of the business of Government to provide examples of virtue, it has to be remembered that in the case of a large proportion of the officers whom it is now proposed to dismiss to private life, we are under solemn and binding obligations, of which this dismissal will be a most discreditable and heartless evasion. Their case as against the Government is stated in our correspondent's letter. They were given to understand, when they were offered positions in the army at the close of the war, that these positions would be permanent, and in dependence on these promises they relinquished their chances in private life. "Where," as Paley says, "the terms of promises admit of more senses than one, the promise is to be performed in that sense in which the promiser apprehended at the time that the promisee received it." There is no doubt about the sense in which the promisees in this case received the promise. They understood that they were offered a permanency; in consideration of this permanency in a profession they had learned to love, they refused to return to civil life, at an age when openings in civil life would still have been easily found by them, and devoted themselves to a service of unusual hardship and danger at low wages. The turning of them out now without compensation, or on half-pay, is therefore not only a breach of faith, but one of a kind which we regret to say has of late become somewhat alarmingly common, and against which the public ought to set their faces. It springs naturally out of a doctrine which a certain class of politicians sometimes preach with boldness, but at all times act on, namely, that a nation has no conscience, and is bound by no moral law; that it may cheat its creditors, if it pleases, by putting a new construction on the bargain under which it borrowed their money; or may outwit foreigners by treating the different branches of the Government, not as parts of one political system, sharing in a common responsibility, but as isolated and independent agencies, for whose sayings and doings no other branch is in any way answerable; or may play false, as in the present case, with its own servants, by treating each Congress, or Administration, as inheriting the constitutional power, but not necessarily the moral obligations, of those that have gone before. Nay, in the Reconstruction matter, Congress has repeatedly treated its own laws, passed in the most solemn manner, and after much deliberation—laws, too, in the nature of a contract—as of no force or effect, as soon as it became inconvenient to obey them, and set them aside at once, without taking the trouble to repeal or amend them. The effect of these performances on the public mind every thinking man must regard as very mischievous, and likely to prove more so; and the gradual admission of large bodies of ignorant persons to a share in the government, which is now going on, and likely to go on, renders more necessary than ever the cultivation of respect for plighted faith. This may be said to be as near an approach as there is to the soul of a people. A people which wants it may have the tongues of angels and of men, immeasurable corn, wine, and oil, and yet they will all profit it nothing. The case of the army officers is no more important than other cases, but it has in it an element which appeals strongly to human sympathy. There is no victim so pitiable, because there is none so helpless, as the victim of national injustice; and it ought to be remembered that the sum saved by defrauding these men is scarcely noticeable in the public accounts, and that the strongest advocates of the wrong know well that by reforming the Civil Service they might save in a single year a quarter of the revenue, but would not raise a finger for the purpose. Moreover, one very large proportion of the men who are now to be dismissed are actually engaged in the performance of civil duties, and their places will have to be filled by the ordinary political "rotators."—Ed. Nation.]

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN THOUGHT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Will you yield me space to express my entire dissent from your views in relation to the proposed increased tariff duties on books, as expressed in your literary notes of the 17th instant? Let me premise that I am a protectionist of the H. C. Carey and Horace Greeley school, dyed, I may say, in the wool. The Nation, I regret to see, is inclined to free trade. Though differing from you in toto, I cannot at all sympathize with my friends of the Tribune, or with Mr. Congressman Kelley, who weaken a good cause by raising against their opponents a cry of "British gold," or calling them "Arnolds" or "Traitors." Mr. Wells and his friends are, I believe, wrong, and inflicting on our country great injury, but I do not question their honesty, and cannot but recognize their capacity.

Let me, however, come to the point. The difficulty with the proposed tariff, as regards literature, is not that it is excessive, but that it is based on a wrong principle. For years we have been looking and longing for a distinct American literature; we have asked for book-writers, and get only book-makers. Why is this? Is it not because American authors have hitherto had no protection at all? You free-traders are always talking of the law of supply and demand. I, as a protectionist, accept all you say, but ask you in return, Does not nature abhor a vacuum? If you want a supply, must you not first create a demand? What demand is there for the results of American thought and literary development while the whole intellectual cravings of the country are satisfied with the works of foreign writers? Do we not compel our authors to compete with those of all Europe? Are not our writers undersold and driven from the market by the hacks of every European Grub Street? I write with some feeling on this subject, for I am myself an author, and wholly fail to see why pig-iron, and salt, and calico, and coal producers should be protected, and, I allow, very properly protected, while my books lie unsold on the counter because the reading public is sufficiently supplied with American reprints of foreign writers. How can we expect an American literature—a literature tasting of the soil, racy—while this state of things continues? I, for one, have too much knowledge of my country people to doubt, for an instant, of their latent literary capacity. It needs but the demand to create the supply. During the late war, did we not see great military talent, the existence of which, but for that war, would never have been imagined—did we not see this wealth of talent spring forth in response to an artificial demand of but three years' continuance? So would it be in literature could the same demand be created. I am painfully conscious that I am myself no Dickens, or Tennyson, or Mill, or Froude; but I cannot doubt, could the works of these admirable authors be shut out, and wholly excluded from America, but for one single ten years, we should soon boast of writers of our own superior to any of those I have named. We have but to make the demand for intellectual, as for physical, nutriment, and the supply will surely follow.

This is the position taken by Mr. Greeley in his recent economical writings, and I go with him to its full length. He argued only in relation to his paper—the admirable Tribune. I have not my thumb-marked copy of his work now at hand, but I remember well the argument. He maintained that, as against the London press, his paper needed no protection, for both dealt in news, and the ten days' difference in time between England and this country gave him a monopoly of the home market. But for this, he claimed that he would have a right to and should receive adequate protection. We American authors have no such advantage; we are ceaselessly exposed to hard, killing competition, and work; for the booksellers can steal the works of foreign writers, but have to pay us some pittance for ours. Our nativity is absolutely an additional burden imposed upon us!

What this country now needs is that the protective system should not only be sustained as regards all material productions, but that it should be extended over the regions of thought. The defect in the proposed tariff is that it recognizes book printers and ignores book makers. Both should be regarded. The cry should be for American thought printed in America! A heavy protective duty and internal revenue tax should be placed on the works of all foreign authors, living or dead, whether printed in Europe or in this country. I love my Shakespeare, but gladly would I shut him out when by so doing I knew that he would soon be replaced by an American Shakespeare all our own. Gladly will I close my Macaulay when by so doing I shall convert our Motley into something his like. Let the country but give to its authors for a few years the same protection it has so long and so generously afforded to its spinners, its founders, and its miners, and no Sydney Smith will ever again demand, "Who reads an American book?" Is not intellectual dependence at least as degrading as material dependence? The Nation, knowing from whom this communication comes, will at least vouch for me to its public, that it comes from one who, for mere want of the protection afforded by our Government to all others of its citizens, is, though not an unsuccessful, still

A Poor Author.

Boston, February 22, 1870.

[We have discussed this subject elsewhere, in an article written before the receipt of the above letter. We confess, however, we look on the letter as a very powerful statement of the case—far more powerful than that of "Author" of the Boston Advertiser. The plan of shutting out dead foreign authors as well as living ones, and thus, so to speak, cutting completely loose from past ages, is a bold and striking conception, which we recommend to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means. Shakespeare does weigh on native dramatists; Milton weighs on native epic writers; we know it; we see cases of it every day. We do incline to free trade, as our correspondent says; but we are not narrow, and trust we are open to conviction. A distinguished American poet has, however, suggested to us a plan of protection for native authors, which seems to us, in many respects, better than any yet hit upon. It makes little difference to him, he maintains, whether foreign poetry is kept out of the country or not if the natives won't buy the home article. "Therefore," says he, "let the collector of taxes be directed to ask every head of a family to produce once a year a copy of my poems (complete edition), or else pay so much. This would ensure my genius real encouragement; the mere exclusion of Tennyson and Arnold would not."—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have in preparation a work which we are very glad to announce: "An Introduction to Anglo-Saxon, Semi-Saxon, and Early English Reading. With a Grammatical Glossary and Notes, Philological and Explanatory. By Hiram Corson, A.M., Professor in St. John's College, Annapolis." The collection opens with an Anglo-Saxon version of the Gospel according to St. John, and then follow selections from the Homilies of Aelfric, from King Alfred's versions of the History of Paulus Orosius, and of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ; from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; from the Ormulum; the Proclamation of King Henry III., 18 Oct., 1258; Selections from Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle; from the Vision of William concerning Piers Plowman; from Pierce the Ploughman's Crede; from the Wycliffite versions of the Bible; from Gower's Confessio Amantis; and other extracts which we have omitted to enumerate. There are added notes, and an outline of Anglo-Saxon grammar, and a Glossary. Such a text-book will do much to stimulate the study of our mother-tongue both in and out of colleges; and we trust it will have the secondary effect of procuring the hundred or so subscribers yet lacking to enable Prof. Corson to undertake publishing his "Thesaurus of Archaic English down to the time of Milton." This enterprise is in some sense a test of American culture, and we shall rejoice to have it sustained.

—One frequently has to go away from home to get home news, and so it happens that we must copy from Trübner's Literary Record verses taken from "Poems by Rachel Bahn" (York, Pa.: H. C. Adams & Co., 1869), in the Pennsylvania Dutch; for which we trust we shall be excused by the interest manifested in our recent article on this dialect. Miss Bahn has been an invalid for many years, and, as such, writes feelingly of nature:

"Guckt yusht mol selle Baehm dort draus,
Wie bluehe sie so schoe!
Ihr suesser g'ruch mei Hertz erquickt,
In fact, ich muss sell g'steh."—p. 179.

This stanza will easily be interpreted by those who understand German, unless the first five words trouble them: Look-at just once those trees (selle, Ger. dieselbe, selbige). More pathos has this "mus sell g'steh"—this reluctant avowal—in the following connection:

"Die voegel singe ah net meh,
Sie sin now fort, sell muss mer g'steh,
Wu sie die climate suhte duht,
Doh singe sie mit frischem muth."—p. 183.

Ah net meh, Ger. auch nicht mehr; mer, Ger. wir; wu, Ger. wo; suhte, Eng. suit; duht, Ger. thut (does); doh, Ger. da. After the birds, we have the trees again:

"Die Baehm sie stehne bloss yetzt doh,
Sie hen abglaegt ihr suht,
Gar nix so schoe un' herrlich guckt,
Als wie 's im summer duht."—p. 185.

Abglaegt, Ger. abgelegt. In one line of a piece called "Vocal Music," Miss Bahn draws sparingly on her native tongue:

"Wie soothing vocal music is!"

and hardly less so in the last line of a stanza following the declaration:

"Mei fav'rite leeder hab ich ah," and which reads thus:

"'Angels welcome' is aehns dafun,
Laes [read] yusht a' mol sell leed,
Wie troestlich sin die worte doch!
Der tune is ah complete."—p. 199.

We may mention here that one or two historical blunders crept into our article on "Pennsylvania Dutch," of which the one connecting Count Zinzendorf with the Mennonites was the most obvious.

—We see mentioned as in the English press or as already published a large number of works in philology, and in history and biography, which will interest the general reader as well as the specialist engaged in study. Professor Max Müller has written another volume of his "Chips from a German Workshop." The ancient and modern literature of France, Germany, and England is his theme in this third volume of the set. The same writer has translated the "Dhammapada," the earliest extant canonical book of the Buddhists, and will publish it conjointly with the "Buddhaghosha's Parables," translated from the Burmese by Captain H. T. Rogers, of which we have previously given some account. "The Families of Speech" is by the Rev. F. W. Farrar, who treats his subject historically, and discourses upon the bearing of the latest philological researches on the facts of history and ethnology. The Rev. Mr. Coxe, well known for his labors in the field of classical mythology, has in press a book on the "Mythology of the Aryan Nations." Professor Edward Maetzner, of Berlin, brings out "A Copious English Grammar," which is described by its translator—"a member of the Philological Society of London"—as being "a methodical, analytical, and historical treatise on the orthography, prosody, inflections, and syntax of the English tongue, with numerous authorities cited in the order of historical development." It is in three volumes, and, as Professor Maetzner already has the praise of the best authorities as a very admirable scholar in Old English and Anglo-Saxon, it may be that here at last we have the English grammar that, since ever there was an English tongue, everybody has been waiting for. Dr. R. G. Latham's great English dictionary, based on Johnson's, is now, after many years, completed in two heavy quarto volumes. "A Dictionary of Norman French," by a M. Melivier, of the Isle of Guernsey, is announced by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, who also publish "An Old Norse or Icelandic Grammar," by the Rev. G. Bayldon. There was to be an age of critics, Professor Wilson prophesied, when once the men of the Byronic age had passed away and left the field of English literature to the small men—necessarily small, the Professor thought, with the Scotch modesty that is so pleasing—who would follow the giants of his own time. We have had more or less criticism, to be sure, but not so very much was required for duly commenting on Macintosh and Moore and Byron and Scott and Wilson himself and Wordsworth and Coleridge; and perhaps it would have been as good a prophecy if Kit North had announced that the age succeeding his own would be an age of ana, and, further, that neither the collection of ana nor the criticising of our immediate predecessors—interesting as they are in many ways—would engrossingly absorb the mental activity of this generation. At all events, we are just now getting a good many volumes of memoirs whose chief value is in the stories that they tell of the distinguished men and women of the close of the last century and the beginning of this. "Crabbe Robinson's Diary;" the "Life of Landor;" "The Life of Jane Austen;" the "Life of Wilson" himself; all the talk about Byron; the "Memoirs of Miss Mitford;" the "Life of the Misses Berry"—all these sufficiently prove by their existence the interest which we take in the personalities if not in the works of the famous of the last generation.

—To these books that we have named, and the countless others similar that we have omitted, there are now to be added, of new ones, two volumes of the correspondence of the Right Hon. William Wickham, and a volume of "Autobiographic Recollections of the late Professor Pryme," whose reminiscences extend over a period of seventy years and contain a great many anecdotes. The same character may probably be ascribed to the expected "Life of Palmerston," by Sir Henry Bulwer. We may, we suppose, put under the double head of history and biography Sir W. Dennison's "Varieties of Viceregal Life," and Earl Russell's Selections from his Speeches (1817–'41) and Despatches (1859–'65). The selections are in two volumes, and each volume has an introduction. It is as historical and biographical, also, that we are to count Mr. Spedding's fifth volume of his "Life and Letters of Bacon." Of history pure and simple is Mr. Adlard's "Amy Robsart and the Earl of Leycester;" Viscount Milton's "History of the San Juan Boundary Question;" the first volume (out of five) of Professor Creasy's "History of England from the Earliest Times;" Mr. Robert Sewall's "Analytical History of India from the Earliest Times down to 1858," and the Rev. George Rawlinson's "Manual of Ancient History"—Chaldea, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judea, Egypt, Carthage, Greece, Macedonia, Rome, Parthia—all in an octavo of six hundred pages. An octavo likely to be more useful is one by Mr. Edward Freeman, entitled "The Historical Geography of Europe," and well filled with maps, whose use is to show how the Roman empire broke into pieces, and how, after its disintegration, the states of modern Europe gradually were formed. No one will deny that this is a work much wanted, and on Mr. Freeman's own account, also, it is permitted one to rejoice that it is done; and that, probably, it will be read and studied; and that hereafter in the Saturday Review Mr. Freeman will be able to possess his soul in more peace than has been his for several years. A man more critic-troubled by his own knowledge and other people's ignorance of mediæval geography and ethnology and history, certainly never existed—never, at any rate, carried on his painful existence in public. Other works belonging to history are a "Historical Account of the Neutrality of Great Britain during the American Civil War," by Professor Montague Bernard, of Oxford; "Selections from the Correspondence of the late Earl of Elgin," by Mr. T. Walroud; and "The Letters of the late Right Hon. Sir George Cornewall Lewis," edited by his brother, the Rev. Sir G. Lewis.

—No book has recently appeared in England of such weight or interest as to elevate its class into an importance greater than that which theological and religious works have, in virtue of their number, and the number of the people whom they address. The Œcumenical Council fills the newspapers with letters—letters that have now become as tiresome as those letters always get to be which harp on the events which newspaper men think "important"—but as yet there has not appeared more than one book upon the subject. That is to say, there has appeared not more than one English book. "Janus" perhaps has satisfied the English reading world, outside of Catholicism; and as for the Catholics, they naturally are wait ing to see what will be done at Rome. The one English book we speak of is by the new Earl of Crawford (Lord Lindsay), and is entitled "Œcumenicity in its Relations to the Church of England." The Hon. Colin Lindsay, a recent convert from Anglicanism to Romanism, is the author of what may be called a legal treatise, with the title of "The Evidence for the Papacy, as derived from the Holy Scriptures and from Primitive Antiquity," which is different from most of the other works of the same class if it does not displease those whom the writer has left, please well enough those to whom he has gone, and find and leave the rest of the world indifferent. The Rev. Orby Shipley has, doubtless, made of his new edition of "The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola" an exceedingly pretty volume, for, so far at least as concerns the appearance of a book, he is perfection as an editor. It is not always, however, that he exercises his skill and taste on books of intrinsic importance. Archbishop Manning is the editor of a third set of essays by various authors, entitled "On Religion and Literature." "The Church and the Age" is a volume of essays by Dean Hook and others of the Anglican Clergy, in which is set forth the present position of the English Church. More interesting than any of these works is a second letter by Dr. Pusey to Dr. Newman. It follows in the track of the "Eirenicon," and enquires, "Is Healthful Reunion Impossible?"—a question which one would think had been answered so far as Dr. Newman can answer it. Mr. Spurgeon offers "The Treasury of David," which is said to be "an original exposition of the Book of Psalms," and, besides, "a collection of illustrative extracts from the whole range of literature," as well as a series of "homiletical hints upon almost every verse," so that preachers should find it useful. So, probably, would they find a periodical called "The Christian," which is a weekly record of Christian life, testimony, and experiences. For teachers and pupils in theological schools, there is the Rev. Dr. Waterland's "Critical History of the Athanasian Creed:" a school edition of a new translation of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History;" Melia's "History of the Persecutions of the Waldenses;" and "A Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology," by various writers, which the Rivingtons are publishing in eight volumes, which are carefully written, "with a view to modern thought as well as a respect for ancient authority," and which are designed to be safe reading for the clergy and laity of the Church of England. Dr. Newman's "Sermons on Subjects of the Day" appear now in one volume, uniform with the eight volumes of the "Parochial and Plain Sermons"—nine volumes of model discourses for preachers who address audiences at once cultivated in mind and religiously disposed. All, we think, were composed while Mr. Newman was still a Protestant.

—Of poetry in England the crop of the next season promises to be light; there are but one or two of the forthcoming volumes that will be worth much attention. There is a rumor, how well founded we do not know, that Mr. Dante Rossetti will gather into a book the poems of his which hitherto have had only a private circulation, and those, fewer in number, which have seen the light only in out of the way periodicals; but which have procured him almost as many admirers as he has had readers. The New Path, we think it was, that reproduced in this country his "Blessed Damosel" and some other pieces which stamp him an unmistakable poet; though one can imagine some of them disliked by people who do not care to see spiritual things treated passionately. Still, when all allowances have been made, it may be doubted if there are in England two persons more genuinely poetical in cast of mind and temperament than Dante Rossetti and his sister Christina; and both have given expression more or less adequate and beautiful to their gift. Their brother, Mr. William Rossetti, who also is busy in literature and has tried verse as well as criticism, has ready a new edition of Shelley. It is in two volumes, the old poems are carefully revised, and some new ones are now first printed, and a life of the poet is prefixed. A good life of Shelley, setting down naught in malice, and not extenuating anything either, is a thing to be desired. Rather to be desired than hoped for, perhaps, from Mr. Rossetti, who should be a good admirer, one would say. The rabies biographica must certainly be among the capacities of a man who can admire Walt Whitman and find a deal in Swinburne, and that, if we do not forget, is Mr. Rossetti's case. Mr. Swinburne, as we have already recorded, is to give us "Bothwell" this year, and he now announces a new volume called "Songs of the Republic." Quite as promising as either of these is the work of an anonymous compiler, with the title of "The Epigrammatists," containing a selection of English, French, Latin, and Greek epigrams, and accounts of the authors—the accounts short, as indeed they should be, the men being few whose epigrams are many; and to give biographies to the writers of simple epigrams is to count on very great gentleness in readers. We think we have not mentioned before, though it is two or three months old, a one-volume edition of the plays of Massinger, after Gifford's text, but containing also the tragedy "Believe as you List," not in Gifford. We think there is no edition of this fine dramatist that is accessible to the American reader which is so cheap as this five-shilling edition. Messrs. F. Warne & Co. are the publishers.

—Among late or forthcoming English books of interest which may be classed under the head of Miscellaneous are these: "An Essay on the Origin of Civilization and the Primeval Condition of Man," by Sir John Lubbock; "Primitive Culture, or Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Art, and Customs," by Mr. E. B. Taylor; "Ireland, Industrial and Social," by Mr. J. N. Murphy; a volume of Letters on Ireland by the gentleman who has recently been the Special Correspondent of the London Times in that country; a "History of Gambling in all Ages," by Mr. A. Steinmetz; a Monograph, by Harriet Parr, on Eugénie and Maurice de Guérin; a "Handbook to the Knowledge of the British Constitution;" a new edition, almost entirely rewritten, of Dr. Acton's book entitled "Prostitution considered in its Moral, Social, and Sanitary Aspects;" a series of colored prints representing the British soldiers of the various arms of the service; a series of colored prints in a folio entitled "Chronological Pictures of English History, from the Ancient Britons to the time of Victoria;" "2,700 Mottoes and Aphorisms from Shakespeare, with an Index of 8,000 References to Words and Ideas," published by Hogg & Son; "The City Friends of Shakespeare," by J. B. Orridge; "Shakespeare and the Emblem Writers, an Exposition of their Similarities of Thought and Expression," by Mr. H. Green; a complement to Sir C. W. Dilke's "Greater Britain," in the shape of "Travels in Russia," by that gentleman; a new English version, with notes, of the "Travels of Marco Polo," published by Mr. Murray. We may say here that the class or classes of miscellaneous books which constitute the gift-books of the holiday season had but a bad sale during the season just gone, and that the English publishers are reported by Mr. Charles Welford as being in something of a quandary over the question what to do about next year's Christmas literature. We do not know why it is not much to be wished that they should do nothing at all. It is rather pleasant than otherwise to find that the publishers, as well as literature, have been suffering from the custom that has latterly prevailed.

—No one could have been more gratified than ourselves if the recent controversy between Prof. E. P. Evans and Prof. Gustavus Fischer had resulted favorably to the former. We had a direct interest in the matter, owing to the praise bestowed by the Nation on the "Abriss der Deutschen Literaturgeschichte," which has been under dissection; and we should have been glad if the literary judgment which we adopted, from our faith in Prof. Evans's character, as well as in his attainments, had been, if not confirmed, at least not seriously impaired. However, both parties have now been heard, and more than once, and it is possible to decide between them without injustice. The papers which have already attempted to do so have shown either a theological bias, on the one hand, or a "Know-Nothing" bias on the other. It is needless to say that we sympathize with neither, but purpose making an unprejudiced presentation of the facts in the case. As we write, the whole of what has been published on both sides, by the author and his critic, is to be found in the American Educational Monthly for January, February, and March, and the Chronicle (of the University of Michigan) for January 29 and February 12. Prof. Fischer's charges are of three kinds: (a) that the Abriss is not what it (negatively) purports to be, original; (b) that it is mainly made up of notes taken at a series of private lectures by Prof. Wm. Müller, of the University of Göttingen, in 1859–60; (c) that it is so full of errors, misapprehensions, omissions, and confusion, as to be worse than worthless to students or scholars. To this Prof. Evans replies in general, that (a, b) he had prepared a preface which was not printed with the first edition (for use in his own classes), acknowledging his indebtedness to a great many German professors, Müller included, whose lectures he had attended; that he did not use his notes of any of these lectures in preparing his Abriss, but that they were inextricably mingled in his mind with ideas derived from authors, to be named in the preface, whose works he had read, making notes which he did use; that he heard a portion only of Prof. Müller's lectures, and in 1858–9 (not 1859–60); that his notes on these covered scarcely three sheets of paper, and to them he owed only "a few hints as to the general division of the subject into periods;" finally (c), that "competent critics, both in America and Europe, have pronounced a very different judgment" on the Abriss from that pronounced by Prof. Fischer. The latter's proofs of plagiarism consist in, (1) the style of the Abriss, which he recognized as unmistakably that of the German professor; (2) correspondences (in detail, for about sixty pages; in scheme or outline, throughout) with notes made at the same lectures by a Mr. Wiemann, procured by Prof. Fischer, and endorsed as genuine by Prof. Müller; (3) discrepancies due to misunderstanding the lecturer; (4) disproportion in treatment of periods and authors, incongruous and incoherent judgments and descriptions, and errors of a sort incompatible with originality or research. On the second point, Prof. Fischer's exact words are: "In the arrangement of the periods and their subdivisions, and in the scheme of the whole, there is a complete identity" between the two sets of notes. Prof. Evans replies: (1) Naturally he has caught the professor's style; (2) he doubts the existence of Mr. Wiemann. To (3) and (4) he replies not in general terms—for they were not formulated as we have put them—but according to the several instances alleged by his critic. Prof. Fischer begins his citations of parallelism at page 9 of the Abriss, and places eleven (with one gap not indicated) consecutive paragraphs, making nearly the whole of page 10, against Wiemann's notes as they run; in each instance the German text only. Prof. Evans appears, from this comparison, to have made one omission, two insertions, a few insignificant and some very significant alterations, but on the whole to have followed Müller, pari passu, in thought and order of thought. To clear himself of this imputation, he asserts that he has merely used what are now axioms in the history of literature, and explains on this ground the likeness of seven of the ten agreeing paragraphs, citing both his own and Wiemann's, and then from well-known authorities passages embodying the same ideas; but, "out of tender regard for the infirmities of the general reader," rendering all the quotations into English. To be sure, he gives occasionally the German word in parenthesis, but this only when it makes for his side, and sometimes with the effect of diverting the reader from the point of resemblance. And he neglects entirely to account for the order of ideas in each paragraph (which does not always reappear in his confirmatory citations), and for the order of the paragraphs themselves within the compass of a single page. That Prof. Fischer might have produced similar parallelisms in the subsequent pages as far as p. 60, when Wiemann's notes ceased to be full, is rendered probable (besides his word for it) by extracts from pp. 11–40, showing important misconceptions of, as well as continued agreement with, Müller's remarks as reported by Wiemann. When they contain an error of fact, Prof. Evans generally replies with an emendation; when they involve nice shades of meaning—the nuances which are the test of proficiency in a language not one's own—he is silent. But emendations and silence alike fail to account for such a composition as the paragraph which analyzes "Faust," or that other on "Thiersagen," in Prof. Fischer's second article, which we have not space to allude to further. We have verified all his citations from Prof. Evans, and have even detected in them an error favorable to the latter, and we conclude the Abriss to be wanting in originality, and to be more the echo of Prof. Müller than of any authority within our knowledge, though probably made up from other sources—from one of which, Weber's "History of German Literature," Prof. Evans is taxed with having "almost literally copied" his review of Latin poems of the ancient period. While disposed to allow him the full benefit of his intended preface, as if it had been printed, we cannot think that it gives a fair account of the nature of his book.

AUSTEN-LEIGH'S MEMOIR OF JANE AUSTEN.*

The walls of our cities were placarded, the other day, with an advertisement of a new sensation novel, the flaring woodcut of which represented a girl tied down upon a table, and a villain preparing to cut off her feet. If this were the general taste, there would be no use in talking about Jane Austen. But if you ask at the libraries you will find that her works are still taken out; so that there must still be a faithful few who, like ourselves, will have welcomed the announcement of a Memoir of the authoress of "Pride and Prejudice," "Mansfield Park," and "Emma."

If Jane Austen's train of admirers has not been so large as those of many other novelists, it has been first-rate in quality. She has been praised—we should rather say, loved by all, from Walter Scott to Guizot, whose love was the truest fame. Her name has often been coupled with that of Shakespeare, to whom Macaulay places her second in the nice discrimination of shades of character. The difference between the two minds in degree is, of course, immense; but both belong to the same rare kind. Both are really creative; both purely artistic; both have the marvellous power of endowing the products of their imagination with a life, as it were, apart from their own. Each holds up a perfectly clear and undistorting mirror—Shakespeare to the moral universe, Jane Austen to the little world in which she lived. In the case of neither does the personality of the author ever come between the spectator and the drama. Vulgar criticism calls Jane Austen's work Dutch painting. Miniature painting would be nearer the truth: she speaks of herself as working with a fine brush on a piece of ivory two inches wide. Dutch painting implies the selection of subjects in themselves low and uninteresting, for the purpose of displaying the skill of the painter, who can interest by the mere excellence of his imitation. Jane Austen passed her life in the society of English country gentlemen and their families, in the last century—a society affluent, comfortable, domestic, rather monotonous, without the interest which attaches to the struggles of labor, without tragic events or figures, seldom, in fact, rising dramatically above the level of sentimental comedy, but presenting, nevertheless, its varieties of character, its vicissitudes, its moral lessons—in a word, its humanity. She has painted it as it was, in all its features, the most tragic as well as the most comic, avoiding only melodrama. "In all the important preparations of the mind, she (Miss Bertram) was complete; being prepared for matrimony by a hatred of home, restraint, and tranquillity; by the misery of disappointed affection and contempt of the man she was to marry: the rest might wait." This is not the touch of Gerard Douw. An undertone of irony, never obtrusive but everywhere perceptible, shows that the artist herself knew very well that she was not painting gods and Titans, and keeps everything on the right level.

Jane Austen, then, was worthy of a memoir. But it was almost too late to write one. Like Shakespeare, she was too artistic to be autobiographic. She was never brought into contact with men of letters, and her own fame was almost posthumous, so that nobody took notes; and she had been fifty-two years in her grave when her nephew, the Rev. J. E. Austen-Leigh, the youngest of the mourners who attended her funeral, undertook to make a volume of his own recollections, those of one or two other surviving relatives, and a few letters. Of 230 pages, in large print, and with a margin the vastness of which requires to be relieved by a red rubric, not above a third is really biography; the rest is genealogy, description of places, manners, and customs, critical disquisition, testimonies of admirers. Still, thanks to the real capacity of the biographer, and to the strong impression left by a character of remarkable beauty on his mind, we catch a pretty perfect though faint outline of the figure which was just hovering on the verge of memory, and in a few years more would, like the figure of Shakespeare, have been swallowed up in night.

Jane Austen was the flower of a stock, full, apparently, through all its branches, of shrewd sense and caustic humor, which in her were combined with the creative imagination. She was born in 1775, at Steventon, in Hampshire, a country parish, of which her father was the rector. A village of cottages at the foot of a gentle slope, an old church with its coeval yew, an old manor-house, an old parsonage all surrounded by tall elms, green meadows, hedgerows full of primroses and wild hyacinths—such was the scene in which Jane Austen grew. It is the picture which rises in the mind of every Englishman when he thinks of his country. Around dwelt the gentry, more numerous and, if coarser and duller, more home-loving and less like pachas than they are now, when the smaller squires and yeomen have been swallowed up in the growing lordships of a few grandees, who spend more than half their time in London or in other seats of politics or pleasure. Not far off was a country town, a "Meryton," the central gossiping place of the neighborhood, and the abode of the semi-genteel. If a gentleman like Mr. Woodhouse lives equivocally close to the town, his "place" is distinguished by a separate name. There was no resident squire at Steventon, the old manor-house being let to a tenant, so that Jane's father was at once parson and squire. "That house (Edmund Bertram's parsonage) may receive such an air as to make its owner be set down as the great landholder of the parish by every creature travelling the road, especially as there is no real squire's house to dispute the point, a circumstance, between ourselves, to enhance the value of such a situation in point of privilege and advantage beyond all calculation." Her father having from old age resigned Steventon when Jane was six and twenty, she afterwards lived for a time with her family at Bath, a great watering-place, and the scene of the first part of "Northanger Abbey;" at Lyme, a pretty little sea-bathing place on the coast of Dorset, on the "Cobb" of which takes place the catastrophe of "Persuasion;" and at Southampton, now a great port, then a special seat of gentility. Finally, she found a second home with her widowed mother and her sister at Chawton, another village in Hampshire.

* "A Memoir of Jane Austen. By her nephew, J. E. Austen-Leigh, Vicar of Bray, Berks." London: Richard Bentley. New York: Scribner, Welford & Co.

"In person," says Jane's biographer, "she was very attractive. Her figure was rather tall and slender, her step light and firm, and her whole appearance expressive of health and animation. In complexion, she was a clear brunette, with a rich color; she had full round cheeks, with mouth and nose small and well formed; bright hazel eyes (it is a touch of the woman, then, when Emma is described as having the true hazel eye), and brown hair forming natural curls close round her face." The sweetness and playfulness of "Dear Aunt Jane" are fresh after so many years in the memories of her nephew and nieces, who also strongly attest the sound sense and sterling excellence of character which lay beneath. She was a special favorite with children, for whom she delighted to exercise her talent in improvising fairy-tales. Unknown to fame, uncaressed save by family affection, and, therefore, unspoilt, while writing was her delight, she kept it in complete subordination to the duties of life, which she performed with exemplary conscientiousness in the house of mourning as well as in the house of feasting. Even her needlework was superfine. We doubt not that, if the truth was known, she was a good cook.

She calls herself "the most unlearned and uninformed female who ever dared to be an authoress;" but this is a nominal tribute to the jealousy of female erudition which then prevailed, and at which she sometimes glances, though herself very far from desiring a masculine education for women. In fact, she was well versed in English literature, read French with ease, and knew something of Italian—German was not thought of in those days. She had a sweet voice, and sang to her own accompaniment simple old songs which still linger in her nephew's ear. Her favorite authors were Johnson, whose strong sense was congenial to her, while she happily did not allow him to infect her pure and easy style; Cowper, Richardson, and Crabbe. She said that, if she married at all, she should like to be Mrs. Crabbe. And besides Crabbe's general influence, which is obvious, we often see his special touch in her writings:

"Emma's spirits were mounted up quite to happiness. Everything wore a different air. James and his horses seemed not half so sluggish as before. When she looked at the hedges, she thought the elder at least must soon be coming out; and, when she turned round to Harriet, she saw something like a look of spring—a tender smile even there."

Jane was supremely happy in her family relations, especially in the love of her elder sister, Cassandra, from whom she was inseparable. Of her four brothers, two were officers in the Royal Navy. How she watched their career, how she welcomed them home from the perils not only of the sea but of war (for it was the time of the great war with France), she has told us in painting the reception of William Price by his sister Fanny, in "Mansfield Park." It is there that she compares conjugal and fraternal love, giving the preference in one respect to the latter, because with brothers and sisters "all the evil and good of the earliest years can be gone over again, and every former united pain and pleasure retraced with the fondest recollection: an advantage this, a strengthener of love, in which even the conjugal tie is beneath the fraternal." It was, perhaps, because she was so happy in the love of her brothers and sisters, as well as because she was wedded to literature, that she was content, in spite of her good looks, to assume the symbolic cap of perpetual maidenhood at an unusually early age.

Thus she grew in a spot as sunny, as sheltered, and as holy as the violets which her biographer tells us abound beneath the south wall of Steventon church. It was impossible that she should have the experiences of Miss Brontë or Madame Sand; and without some experience the most vivid imagination cannot act, or can act only in the production of mere chimeras. To forestall Miss Braddon in the art of criminal phantasmagoria might have been within her power by the aid of strong green tea, but would obviously have been repugnant to her nature. We must not ask her, then, for the emotions and excitements which she could not possibly afford. The character of Emma is called commonplace. It is commonplace in the sense in which the same term may be applied to any normal beauty of nature—to a well-grown tree or to a perfectly developed flower. She is, as Mr. Weston says, "the picture of grown-up health." "There is health not merely in her bloom, but in her air, her gait, her glance." She has been brought up like Jane Austen herself, in a pure English household, among loving relations and good old servants. Her feet have been in the path of domestic and neighborly duty, quiet as the path which leads to the village church. It has been impossible for strong temptations or fierce passions to come near her. Yet men accustomed to the most exciting struggles, to the most powerful emotions of parliamentary life, have found an interest, equal to the greatest ever created by a sensation novel in the little scrapes and adventures into which her weakness betrays her, and in the process by which her heart is gradually drawn away from objects apparently more attractive to the robust nature in union with which she is destined to find strength as well as happiness.

With more justice may Jane Austen be reproached with having been too much influenced by the prejudices of the somewhat narrow and rather vulgarly aristocratic, or rather plutocratic, society in which she lived. Her irony and her complete dramatic impersonality render it difficult to see how far this goes; but certainly it goes further than we could wish. Decidedly she believes in social caste, in gentility, and in its connection with affluence and good family; in its incompatibility with any but certain very refined and privileged kinds of labor; in the impossibility of being at once a gentleman and a trader, much more a yeoman or mechanic. "The yeomanry are precisely the order of people with whom I feel I can have nothing to do; a degree or two lower, and a creditable appearance, might interest me; I might hope to be useful to their families in some way or other; but a farmer can need none of my help, and is, therefore, in one sense, as much above my notice as in every other he is below it." This is said by Emma—by Emma when she is trying to deter her friend from marrying a yeoman, it is true, but still by Emma. The picture of the coarseness of poverty in the household of Fanny's parents in "Mansfield Park" is truth, but it is hard truth, and needs some counterpoise. Both in the case of Fanny Price and in that of Frank Churchill, the entire separation of a child from its own home for the sake of the worldly advantages furnished by an adoptive home of a superior class, is presented too much as a part of the order of nature. The charge of acquiescence in the low standard of clerical duty prevalent in the Establishment of that day is well founded, though perhaps not of much importance. Of more importance is the charge which might be made, with equal justice, of acquiescence in somewhat low and coarse ideas of the relations between the sexes, and of the destinies and proper aspirations of young women. "Mr. Collins, to be sure, was neither sensible nor agreeable; his society was irksome, and his attachment to her must be imaginary; but still he would be her husband. Without thinking highly either of men or matrimony, marriage had always been her object; it was the only honorable provision for well-educated young women of small fortune; and, however uncertain of giving happiness, must be their pleasantest preservative from want. This preservative she had now attained; and at the age of twenty-seven, without having ever been handsome, she felt all the good-luck of it." This reflection is ascribed to Charlotte Lucas, an inferior character, but still thought worthy to be the heroine's bosom friend.

Jane's first essays in composition were burlesques on the fashionable manners of the day; whence grew "Northanger Abbey," with its anti-heroine, Catherine Morley, "roving and wild, hating constraint and cleanliness, and loving nothing so much as rolling down the green slope at the back of the house," and with its exquisite travestie of the "Mysteries of Udolpho." But she soon felt her higher power. Marvellous to say, she began "Pride and Prejudice" in 1796, before she was twenty-one years old, and completed it in the following year. "Sense and Sensibility" and "Northanger Abbey" immediately followed; it appears, with regard to the latter, that she had already visited Bath, though it was not till afterwards that she resided there. But she published nothing—not only so, but it seems that she entirely suspended composition—till 1809, when her family settled at Chawton. Here she revised for the press what she had written, and wrote "Mansfield Park," "Emma," and "Persuasion." "Persuasion," whatever her nephew and biographer may say, and however Dr. Whewell may have fired up at the suggestion, betrays an enfeeblement of her faculties, and tells of approaching death. But we still see in it the genuine creative power multiplying new characters; whereas novelists who are not creative, when they have exhausted their original fund of observations, are forced to subsist by exaggeration of their old characters, by aggravated extravagances of plot, by multiplied adulteries and increased carnage.

"Pride and Prejudice," when first offered to Cadell, was declined by return of post. The fate of "Northanger Abbey" was still more ignominious: it was sold for ten pounds to a Bath publisher, who, after keeping it many years in his drawer, was very glad to return it and get back his ten pounds. No burst of applause greeted the works of Jane Austen like that which greeted the far inferior works of Miss Burney. Crevit occulto velut arbor ævo fama. A few years ago, the verger of Winchester cathedral asked a visitor who desired to be shown her tomb, "what there was so particular about that lady that so many people wanted to see where she was buried?" Nevertheless, she lived to feel that "her own dear children" were appreciated, if not by the vergers, yet in the right quarters, and to enjoy a quiet pleasure in the consciousness of her success. One tribute she received which was overwhelming. It was intimated to her by authority that His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent, had read her novels with pleasure, and that she was at liberty to dedicate the next to him. More than this, the Royal Librarian, Mr. Clarke, of his own motion apparently, did her the honor to suggest that, changing her style for a higher, she should write "a historical romance in illustration of the august house of Cobourg," and dedicate it to Prince Leopold. She answered in effect that, if her life depended on it, she could not be serious for a whole chapter. Let it be said, however, for the Prince Regent, that underneath his royalty and his sybaritism, and at last entirely stifled by them, there was something of a better and higher nature. His love for Mrs. Fitzherbert was not merely sensual, and Heliogabalus would not have been amused by the novels of Miss Austen.

Jane was never the authoress but when she was writing her novels; and in the few letters with which this memoir is enriched there is nothing of point or literary effort, and very little of special interest. We find, however, some pleasant and characteristic touches.

"Charles has received £30 for his share of the privateer, and expects £10 more; but of what avail is it to take prizes if he lays out the produce in presents to his sisters? He has been buying gold chains and topaz crosses for us. He must be well scolded."

"Poor Mrs. Stent! It has been her lot to be always in the way; but we must be merciful, for perhaps in time we may come to be Mrs. Stents ourselves, unequal to anything and unwelcome to everybody."

"We (herself and Miss A.) afterwards walked together for an hour on the Cobb; she is very conversable in a common way; I do not perceive wit or genius; but she has sense and some degree of taste, and her manners are very engaging. She seems to like people rather too easily."

Of her own works, or rather of the characters of her own creation, her Elizabeths and Emmas, Jane speaks literally as a parent. They are her "dear children." "I must confess that I think her (Elizabeth) as delightful a creature as ever appeared in print, and how I shall be able to tolerate those who do not like her at least I do not know." This is said in pure playfulness; there is nothing in the letters like real egotism or impatience of censure.

At the age of forty-two, in the prime of intellectual life, with "Emma" just out and "Northanger Abbey" coming, and in the midst of domestic affection and happiness, life must have been sweet to Jane Austen. She resigned it, nevertheless, with touching tranquillity and sweetness. In 1816, it appears, she felt her inward malady, and began to go round her old haunts in a manner which seemed to indicate that she was bidding them farewell. In the next year, she was brought for medical advice to a house in the Close of Winchester, and there, surrounded to the last by affection and to the last ardently returning it, she died. Her last words were her answer to the question whether there was anything she wanted—"Nothing but death." Those who expect religious language in season and out of season have inferred from the absence of it in Jane Austen's novels that she was indifferent to religion. The testimony of her nephew is positive to the contrary, and he is a man whose word may be believed.

Those who died in the Close were buried in the cathedral. It is therefore by mere accident that Jane Austen rests among princes and princely prelates in that glorious and historic fane. But she deserves at least her "slab of black marble in the pavement" there. She possessed a real and rare gift, and she rendered a good account of it. If the censer which she held among the priests of art was not of the costliest, the incense was of the purest. If she cannot be ranked with the greatest masters of fiction, she has at least delighted many, and none can draw from her any but innocent delight.

HAGENBACH'S MODERN CHURCH HISTORY.*

Dr. Hagenbach is an exceedingly prolific writer in the field of Protestant theology. Of his numerous productions, his ecclesiastico-historical works are the most important and deservedly popular. His scholarship is comprehensive, his tone genial, his delineations—whether of character, of periods, or of systems—attractive, his diction animated and clear. He is not too profound for the great mass of the educated public, nor too shallow for the learned and reflecting reader, though the latter might here and there desire greater precision, a profounder scrutiny, and a bolder and more independent criticism. Tolerant and rather timid in judgment—though orthodox to a degree—he almost always pleases, though he often fails to satisfy. A native of Basle, a principal seat of German Protestantism in Switzerland, and thoroughly German by education and study, he, in his histories, likes mainly to dwell on the developments and achievements of German thought, and his great familiarity with it and its productions in every field, renders his sketches of the spiritual movements of Protestantism additionally attractive as being at the same time—we should, perhaps, say in the main—pictures of German literature.

This is particularly the case with the "History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries"—the concluding part of the author's "Lectures on the Essence and History of the Reformation"—a very small portion of which only is devoted to things and men beyond the limits of Germany and Switzerland, such as the persecution of the Camisards and the execution of Jean Calas, French and English deism and naturalism, Voltaire and Rousseau, Swedenborg and the Church of the New Jerusalem, Wesley and Methodism, Shakers and Irvingians, the abolition and restoration of the order of Jesuits, Napoleon and the Concordat—and the principal themes of which are the oscillations of the German spirit between scepticism and pietism, illuminism and orthodoxy, rationalism and supernaturalism, philosophy and faith. And the character of the history appears the less theological and the more literary as those varying oscillations are represented, not in transformed dogmas, resolves of synods, hierarchical dictates, or reformatory negations, but chiefly in the lives, theories, and action upon the Church of the literary and philosophical representatives of all shades of religious and irreligious German opinion; such as, to mention only the more prominent, Christian Wolf, Rabener, Wieland, Semler, Lessing, Basedow, Nicolai, Haller, Gellert, Lavater, Herder, Kant, Schiller, Campe, Pestalozzi, Hamann, Jacobi, Fichte, Jean Paul, Goethe, Schelling, Novalis, F. Schlegel, Werner, Schleiermacher, Steffens, Hegel, and Strauss—around whom the pure theologians, excepting only Zinzendorf, are grouped in comparative shade.

This way of writing church history must not be attributed to the author's desire to make his book or subject attractive to a larger circle of readers than generally claimed by works of this kind, but to a correct appreciation of the ages he treats of. The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, in their religious development, are entirely different from the ages of Christianity that preceded them. In them the Church no longer creates new beliefs, shapes new societies, transforms empires, or struggles with fanatical heresies, as in the first periods of its existence; it no longer converts and civilizes nations, rules and judges princes, or carries on crusades, as it did in the Middle Ages; it no longer offers the spectacle of gigantic religious combats or of bloody civil wars fomented by creeds, as in the times of Huss, Luther, Knox, Coligny, Alva, Gustavus Adolphus, and Cromwell. The church, in all its branches, has become passive, or holds itself on the defensive against assailants who have themselves no centre, no chief, no banner with a positive device, but constantly harass it with desultory attacks. It lives in state and society, but rules them no longer. It has ceased to be creative and revolutionary, and has become conservative. It borrows weapons from strange camps, accepts aid from partial opponents, yields to impressions from without, and, instead of moulding, is constantly moulded. Even within its own camp, the crosier and the cross yield precedence to the pen, the pulpit is closely allied with the cathedra, and the theologian has assumed the garb of the littérateur. The fluctuations of the religious movements of the last two centuries are best mirrored in the history of their literature.

Dr. Hagenbach's own standpoint can, perhaps, best be characterized by stating him to be a follower of Herder and Schleiermacher, but somewhat more orthodox and conservative than either. His "Protestantism is the spirit which contends for progress and greater freedom and clearness, and courageously pursues this, its own course, in spite of all the animosity and jealousy of ignorance; but in the very midst of this progress it always looks about with great care for the safe ground once laid. It does not take pleasure in wild protestation, but greatly prefers to cultivate and develop rather than destroy; and for this reason it prudently opposes, as far as it can, all stormy and violent reform and revolution." Of this Protestantism his favorite representative in the eighteenth century is Herder, of whom he says: "Herder is strictly orthodox, in opposition to the innovators and illuminists, while he is a bold innovator in opposition to the rigidly orthodox. Vulgar rationalism makes him a mystical supernaturalist, and vulgar supernaturalism declares him to be a dangerous rationalist. . . . There will always be people to whom true Protestantism will appear too broad, and others to whom it will seem too narrow." And with reference to Schleiermacher, he remarks:

* "History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries. By K. R. Hagenbach, D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Basle. Translated from the last German edition, with Additions, by Rev. John F. Hurst, D.D." 2 vols. New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1869.

"The vibrations of history are not like the oscillations of a pendulum, which is always forced from its equilibrium, yet ever strives to regain it. Whenever a period of torpid faith arrives, and the light of science is placed under a bushel, the demand of the thinking mind is made in a manner calculated to injure faith; whenever knowledge is puffed up in vain theorizing, and unbelief ascends the throne, the power of faith again arises, assigns limits to pride, hurls even the masters of knowledge from their usurped seats, and then, at the proper time, can prescribe for fortune its appropriate limits. It is permitted to only a few to preserve this equilibrium amid such vibrations, and to restore it to their contemporaries. Only a few have the art, as Schleiermacher once said of himself, to place the foot on the side of the boat which needs a counterpoise; most people seek the centre of gravity with the majority and in the majority."

And so far is Dr. Hagenbach from going unreservedly "with the majority," the liberal thinkers of his time, that he has no hesitation to call it "a mistaken liberalism to carry toleration to such a length that confessional differences should have no influence on political rights; that every man, Catholic and Protestant, and, finally, Jew and Mohammedan, should take equal parts in the management of public affairs." He is severe—though without attempting a serious analysis of any one of them—upon all the metaphysical systems of German philosophy from Kant to Hegel—without concealing a predilection for the latter as against Schelling, the master of Schleiermacher, and for Fichte as against the Königsberg philosopher, whom he treats altogether in a decidedly unfriendly manner—and as a Protestant firmly clings to the Scriptures, and knows "Christ only in and by the Scriptures."

The translation may be said to be good in general, and here and there to do full justice to the author's manifold merits of diction; but it is not entirely free from obscurities—as even our short quotations may testify—or from inexact or false renderings. We not only find such expressions as "physico-theology," "sound understanding" (for common sense), "Siebenburgen" and "Siebenburgers" (for Transylvania and Transylvanians), "Karnthen" (for Carinthia), "Palgrave" (for Count Palatine), "Gellert's Praying Sister" (for Gellert's Devout Woman—"Betschwester"), and quite a number of other Germanisms; but also "the exode of the Salzburgers," "the hangman Von Plozk" (meaning the hangman of Plock, a town in Poland—"der Scharfrichter von Plozk"), and the well-known "Thut nichts [No matter]! der Jude wird verbrannt" of the Patriarch in Lessing's "Nathan" translated thus: "Do nothing; the Jew shall be burnt!"

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

Mr. W. J. Widdleton deserves no little credit for his equally handsome and correct republication, in eight volumes, of Milman's "History of Latin Christianity." This edition is uniform with that published by the same house of the author's two other main works, his "History of Christianity to the Extinction of Paganism in the Roman Empire," and the "History of the Jews." In a certain sense, the three form a connected—though not complete—whole, of which the last named is the beginning, as it is the earliest of the author's histories, and also the least mature of them. The "History of Latin Christianity" is justly acknowledged to be the most valuable of the series, embracing, as it does, a period in the treatment of which the Dean's scholarship and criticism were least embarrassed by dogmatic shackles. His natural candor is, however, perceptible in all his writings, not excepting those which had for their avowed object the refutation of the errors or exaggerations of scepticism. And it is chiefly this candor which explains why his works, though breathing throughout the breath of little-questioning faith, and distinguished less by research and depth than by warmth and elegance, are still far from being consigned exclusively to the shelves of the pious. Without a claim of rivalling the scholarship of an Ewald, a Munk, or a Grätz in the Jewish field, or of a Baronius, a Mosheim, or a Neander in that of Christianity, Milman still fully deserves to occupy an honorable rank among ecclesiastical historians, and, owing to the amenities of his chaste and lucid diction, he will probably remain a favorite with the English reading public, even when English literature will have produced in the same fields more independently and profoundly critical books than his.

So far as we have read his books, we should say that Björnson first became known to the American public in his best. Certainly neither "The Fisher Maiden" nor "The Happy Boy" is equal to "Arne" in the interest which they excite, in poetical beauty, in the distinctness of their pictures of Norwegian village life, or in construction. Perhaps there is nothing better in the way of delineation of character in "Arne" than is to be found in one or two of the minor characters in the "Fisher Maiden;" but, on the whole, "Arne" stands easily at the head of such of its author's works as have been translated into English; for, even were it deficient—as it is not—in good character drawing, there would still remain to say that Björnson's works are not in the stricter sense novels—that, at least to us foreigners, a principal charm of them is freshness as respects their sentiment, and the circumstances of the life which they depict, and their poetry—couched sometimes in idyllic prose, and now and again in verses, which, even in translation, are true lyrical poetry. "The Happy Boy" is a love story, as simple as possible in plan. The poor peasant boy, who, from childhood, has played with the daughter of the well-to-do farmer, cannot have her in marriage, because, as the tight-fisted old man thinks, he has not money enough. So Oeyvind goes to school, and makes himself a scientific farmer; and by and by the old man has to relent, and Oeyvind and Marit become man and wife. But Björnson's sympathy with youth and innocence, and perhaps his experience of the wiles of young girls, and of the torments which these cause in the male bosoms, enable him to fill up the familiar outlines with a thousand little strokes which are all significant and very pleasing. And then, too, besides this skill of the writer's, in these northern countries—where spring comes with such tenderness, and yet, when once it comes, with such sudden perfectness; where the grass, loth to appear, is to-day a streak of green on the edge of the snow, while to-morrow it may be full of blossoms—nature herself seems to furnish a fit setting and frame for pictures of the courtship of first lovers. It is thus, perhaps, that Björnson's skill in describing the natural scenery of his country stands him in such good stead in his capacity as a story-teller; for it is a country of whose year the striking event is the budding of the new life when the winter is broken up, and Björnson always has to tell of love springing in two young hearts. Messrs. Sever & Francis, Boston, have given us, with this story, a picture of the author. It gives him a face in which strength and delicacy are agreeably joined.

Mr. W. C. Wilkinson's "Dance of Modern Society" (New York: Oakley, Mason & Co.) was printed some year or two ago in one of the quarterly reviews, and now appears in book form at the solicitation of friends who concur with him in his conclusions. These are, that dancing, as practised by the public in general, is unhealthy; that it wastes money; that it is an unsocial amusement if we give to the word social its truer and better meaning; that it prevents the improvement of the dancers' minds; and, finally, that it is immoral. The dance is unhealthy, Mr. Wilkinson would say, because it has prescribed midnight hours, tight lacing, paper-soled shoes, late suppers, and the exposure of heated people to cold air. It is wasteful, because it leads to extravagantly expensive dressing. It is to be called gregarious rather than social, because it precludes conversation; and the statements that in learning and practising dancing one learns to carry the body well, and thus fits himself for social intercourse with persons of refined manners, may be dismissed as of little importance; for there are other ways of learning this accomplishment. Finally, the dance is immoral. Men and women dance together; they would not dance alone, men with men and women with women; therefore, the dance promotes unchastity of mind, and unchastity of mind may easily become the parent of bodily unchastity. Of course, it is on this last point that Mr. Wilkinson's argument mainly turns; for other amusements than dancing are costly, and yet are worth the money expended upon them. Keeping late hours, and wearing thin-soled shoes, and eating out of due time are done by people ignorant of the art. Dancing might be abolished, and the art of conversation would still be out of the reach of attainment by seven or eight men and women out of ten; and the two or three who now can talk do not often dance. All things considered, the dance may stay, then, Mr. Wilkinson would be inclined to allow, if it were not immoral—if sexual passion were not at the bottom of the amusement. This would seem to be one of those cases where all is everything, and a little may be nothing at all. But apparently Mr. Wilkinson admits of no degrees. "Passion," he says, "passion transformed, if you please, never so much, subsisting in no matter how many finely contrasted degrees of sensuality—passion, and nothing else, is the true basis of the popularity of the dance;" and so it should be done away with. We confess to seeing some force in Mr. Wilkinson's objections to waltzing. It is pure to the pure, no doubt—until it begins to contaminate the pure; and all that sort of dancing we should be glad to see banished from society. But as for banishing sex altogether, as for saying that none at all of its influences—not "passion transformed never so much," not "passion subsisting in no matter how many finely contrasted degrees of sensuality"—shall be felt by men and women—that is another matter. It is his taking this extreme ground which vitiates Mr. Wilkinson's argument. We may add that his style also would be the better for a little more restraint, though on the whole his article, as an advocate's presentation of his case to persons of his way of thinking, is, if not really good, not to be called bad.

Both Harper & Brothers and Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. have published a cheap edition of "Caleb Williams," which thus is to have a generation of readers long after it could have been reasonably expected that any one but a curious enquirer into the character of William Godwin, or into the history of fictitious literature, would again turn over its pages. One great merit it has, and one that is secondary and, so to speak, accidental—incidental, at all events. The situation of the two chief characters, or, as we may say, the only two characters, is impressive, and is clearly and fully, if not powerfully, presented. The man whose possession of another's guilty secret puts him completely in that other's power; and the man whose pride makes him momentarily a murderer and for years a tyrant, while the natural goodness of his heart makes him hate his crimes and himself and pity his victim—the relation of these two to each other is a great subject for a novel, and "Caleb Williams" no doubt has value if one would understand how English country magnates of a hundred years ago could oppress their inferiors, and what brutes they might be in the society of their equals. But in other respects the novel is such—so tedious in detail, so wanting in life and motion, written in so unnatural a style—that the wonder is not great that it has come to us only by name, and that the play based upon it is alive while itself is dead; for the play puts in more effective form what is good in the story.

Mr. E. P. Whipple's "Age of Elizabethan Literature" (Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co.) is made up of critical essays on Marlowe, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Spenser, Raleigh, Sidney, Beaumont, Fletcher, Massinger, Ford, Webster, Chapman, Dekker, Marston, Heywood, Bacon, Hooker, and half a dozen other men of letters of that time. Much of what is said is good, though it is not stated in such a way that the student may not find it better to study the writers with whom Mr. Whipple deals, in the commentaries of many other critics, who get closer down to the subject and seemingly are more intent than he upon allowing the subject to make its own proper impression. In Mr. Whipple's original remarks we do not find any that appear to us to make a substantial addition to what was before known.

Mr. G. L. Craik's "English of Shakespeare," as exhibited in the play of "Julius Cæsar," is known to many of our readers as an excellent work, and such of them as have used the American edition of it know that Mr. W. J. Rolfe, the American editor, has increased its value by his additions and corrections. Mr. Edwin Ginn, of Boston, is the publisher. It is hardly a question for the class-room, but how is it, by the way, that neither of the editors has solved the question why "the foremost man of all this world" got from Shakespeare so inadequate treatment, while the chaotic, riotous Mark Antony seems to have engaged so much of his attention? The answer does not seem far to seek either, and would be not valueless in throwing light on the character of the poet's mind.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices
Andersen (H. C.), Wonder Stories told for Children	(Hurd & Houghton)
Bulletin of the Essex Institute, Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, swd	(Salem) $0 50
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, No. 22, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Gray (W. H.), History of Oregon, 1792–1849	(Am. News Co.)
Half-Yearly Abstract of the Medical Sciences, Jan. 1870, swd	(H. C. Lea) 1 50
Hall (Dr. W. W.), Health by Good Living	(Hurd & Houghton)
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Helen and Arthur: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Hyacinthe (Father), The Family and the Church	(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 50
Proceedings of Third Annual Convention of Am. Inst. of Architects, N. Y., Nov. 16, 17, 1869, swd	(Western & Co.) 1 00
Sand (George), Mauprat: a Tale	(Roberts Bros.)
Van Wart (I., jr.), The Golden Cross, and Other Poems	(Carleton)
Williams (N. M.), Notes on the Gospel of St. Matthew	(Gould & Lincoln) 1 75

READY THIS DAY.

GEORGE SAND.

MAUPRAT. A Novel. By GEORGE SAND. Translated by VIRGINIA VAUGHAN.

One volume 16mo, price $1 50.

"George Sand still lives and reigns—at sixty-five she continues to write romances, and is recognized as at the head of the literature to which she has devoted herself for nearly forty years. . . . The books themselves cannot but make a profound sensation in the reading public of America, and they will excite the most varied criticism."—Springfield Republican.

LEIGH HUNT.

"MATCHLESS AS A FIRESIDE COMPANION."—ELIA.

A DAY BY THE FIRE, and Other Papers Hitherto Uncollected. By LEIGH HUNT. Edited with Notes, by "Tom Folio."

One volume 16mo, bevelled cloth, gilt top, to match our edition of "The Seer." Price $1 50.

Sold everywhere. Mailed, post-paid, by the publishers,

ROBERTS BROS., Boston.

To be had in New York of FELT & DILLINGHAM, OAKLEY, MASON & CO., AMERICAN NEWS CO., and E. P. DUTTON & CO.

B. WESTERMANN & CO.,

471 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Have just published a new Wall Map of

PALESTINE,

Photo-lithographed from a relief by A. RAAZ.

AMERICAN EDITION, WITH ENGLISH LETTERING.

54 inches high, 32 inches wide. Mounted on muslin, varnished, and with rollers, price $6; in a neat black walnut frame, $12 50; packing box for same, $1 50.

The plastic effect of this map is surprising. It appears to the eye to be an actual relief, and it not only answers the same purpose, but is preferable because of its cheapness, durability, and more convenient material. It has been critically examined and found accurate and correct by many prominent Biblical scholars. As a most desirable help to Biblical teaching, it ought to be in every Sunday-school, as an ornament in every library. Send for a circular. B. WESTERMANN & CO.

NEW YORK, January, 1870.

THE CATALOGUE

OF

MR. JOHN A. RICE'S LIBRARY

IS NOW READY FOR DELIVERY.

The Sale will take place on MONDAY, MARCH 21, AND FIVE FOLLOWING DAYS, commencing at 4 o'clock P.M.

Catalogues will be mailed free, on receipt of $1, which may be remitted to

J. SABIN & SONS,
84 Nassau Street,

Or to BANGS, MERWIN & CO.,
694 and 696 Broadway, New York.

The Catalogue, forming a volume of over 500 pages, will be worth the possession of the collector. Many notes have been added to the books, illustrative of their bibliographical and literary characteristics, by Mr. Joseph Sabin.

How to Form a Good Library.

"If you'll go to the charge, let me alone to find you books."
Fletcher. N. W. Act II.

The sales by auction of Libraries and collections of Books, which frequently occur, afford opportunity for the purchase of books which the ordinary resources of bookstores do not offer. J. SABIN & SONS give their personal attention to orders on these sales, and use for their patrons the same discrimination as if buying for themselves. They have the satisfaction of being able to refer to the Library of Congress, New York State Library, Wisconsin Historical Society, Boston Athenæum, Chicago Historical Society, etc., etc., and also to private collectors in all the principal cities, for whom purchases have been made in this manner.

Charges, five per cent. on amount of purchases.

CHOICE GARDEN AND FLOWER SEEDS.

My Annual Catalogue, containing a list of many novelties, besides all the standard vegetables of the garden (over 100 of which are of my own growing), with a choice selection of Flower Seed, will be forwarded gratis to all. I warrant my seed shall prove as represented. I warrant it shall reach each purchaser. I warrant all money forwarded shall reach me.

Send for a Catalogue.

JAMES J. H. GREGORY,

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

FLORA. BOTANY.

THE LATEST, BEST, MOST POPULAR BOTANICAL TEXT-BOOKS.

BY ASA GRAY, M.D.,

Of Harvard University, and Botanic Gardens, Cambridge, Mass.

SALE GREATER THAN THAT OF ALL OTHERS COMBINED.

THEY HAVE NO EQUALS IN ANY RESPECT.

Gray's "How Plants Grow." $1 20.

Gray's Lessons in Botany. 302 Drawings. $1 40.

Gray's School and Field Book of Botany. $2 50.

Gray's Manual of Botany. 20 plates. $2 50.

Gray's Lessons and Manual. 1 vol. $3.

Gray's Manual, with Mosses, etc. Illustrated. $2 50.

Gray's Structural and Systematic Botany. $3.

Flora of the Southern States. $3 50.

Gray's Botanist's Microscope. 2 lenses. $2.

Gray's Botanist's Microscope. 3 lenses. $2 50.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO.,

47 and 49 Greene St., New York.

Publishers of the AMERICAN EDUCATIONAL SERIES OF SCHOOL-BOOKS,

And manufacturers of the celebrated

SPENCERIAN DOUBLE ELASTIC STEEL PENS.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1870.

The Week.

On Friday, Mr. Hiram R. Revels, who in 1854 was pastor of a colored church in St. Louis, and in 1868 of another in Louisville, was admitted to the U. S. Senate from Mississippi, by a strict party vote of 48 to 8. All the nice objections that had been raised against his citizenship vanished before the right inherent in each branch of Congress to determine the qualifications of its members. Besides discussing the Funding Bill, the Senate has done nothing else of importance during the week, except to set its face against inflation even more decidedly than the House had pronounced for it. On Thursday, Mr. B. F. Whittemore, of South Carolina, avoided expulsion by resigning, but the formal condemnation of the House attended him as he went. His example was followed on Monday by Mr. J. S. Golladay, Democrat, of Kentucky, and Mr. J. T. Deweese, Republican, of North Carolina, likewise implicated in the sale of cadetships. The General Appropriation Bill, under Mr. Dawes's good management, was finished in the House on Friday, and with so little variation from the original, as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, as to speak most favorably for the Committee's judgment and forethought. It is a spectacle with which our legislators might a little oftener indulge us. Mr. Schenck is the reputed author of the test of Democratic memory made on Monday, in the shape of a resolution copied from the Democratic Platform of July, 1868, and favoring incidental protection in a tariff for revenue. Six of the wilier Democrats saw the pitfall and shunned it; but the herd fell in, amid the merriment of the Republicans.

The most striking incident of the week's news is the fall in gold, which has reached 115, and may very probably have gone below it before this is received by our readers; and there is every reason to believe that the tendency will continue downward if Congress keeps its hands off. The late legal-tender decision has undoubtedly helped the movement; the gradual appreciation of the greenbacks, under the increasing demands of business, particularly at the South—where the growth of small transactions, owing to the rise of the negroes in civilization, has been very rapid—has helped it also; and of course, the incessant outpourings of the Treasury have helped it; and, above all, the growth of exports, which have, during the past seven months, exceeded those of a corresponding period of the previous year by over $28,000,000 from this port. An attempt was made in the House early last week, five leading members of the Committee of Ways and Means concurring, to resume the work of inflation by adding fifty million dollars to the currency—this being, it is said, part of an arrangement between the Western inflationists, who want more greenbacks, and the Eastern tariff men, who are opposed to a reduction of duties, by means of which both would be satisfied. We wonder whether this was to be done under the "war power." The fall in gold here, and a steadily growing comprehension in Europe of the exact weight and value of the debates in the House of Representatives—perhaps to most Europeans the thing in American politics most difficult of comprehension—is, of course, sending up the price of bonds abroad, and Mr. Boutwell is said to be very sanguine about converting the present debt into a new loan at five per cent. He has received, it is said, "assurances from abroad"—once more—which guarantee him at least $400,000,000 at this rate. The money market in England has not been so favorable to him for many years. There is a glut of idle capital, and investors are getting rapidly into that highly speculative, not to say gullible, state of mind through which the British public passes regularly about every ten years.

Prices of all commodities, and especially of foreign commodities, are of course declining, except meat, for the continued dearness of which a good and sufficient reason is to be found in the fact that the supply of sheep and cattle has been diminishing during the war, while the number of consumers, or would-be consumers, has been increasing; and beef and mutton cannot be produced in a day or in a year. We cannot look, however, for much further decline in anything without a reduction of taxation, the chances of which seem to improve. The press is calling for it loudly, and the President has thrown in a word in its favor—mentioning thirty millions as about the amount which he thought ought to be struck off—which is said to have made a good deal of impression on the Committee of Ways and Means.

The investigation of the Congressional Committee into the Gold Conspiracy of last summer has closed, and the upshot seems to be that Messrs. Gould & Fisk were the head and front of the whole affair. They got Corbin into it, as the President's brother-in-law, in the belief that they could thus get the President himself into it, or, at all events, his wife; and Corbin appears to have been nothing loth to go into it on this understanding. But Mrs. Grant declined to have gold bought for her, and wrote to Mrs. Corbin expressing the President's "distress" at finding that Corbin was engaged in gold dealing. Moreover, it appears that the President, in his interview with the trio on the Fisk boat, and elsewhere, was always very general in his remarks on financial affairs; and, when they attempted to bring him down to particulars, with the view of getting at the "policy" he would support with regard to Government gold sales, became very reticent. His letter to Mr. Boutwell, of which we heard so much at the time, written in September last, has been published, and proves to have been a warning to the Secretary that "a desperate struggle" was going on between the bears and bulls in Wall Street, and "that each party wanted the Government to help them out," and that he was, therefore, to be "on his guard;" and that, in the President's opinion, he ought to "move on without change till the present struggle was over." In fact, nothing could have been more sensible or upright than the President's course throughout the whole affair. He committed in it only one error, and that was accepting the hospitality of, and entering into conversation with, such people as Gould, Fisk & Co. were then known to be. Their Erie operations had rendered them unfit company for any respectable man who had no business relations with them, much more for the President of the United States. Is it true, by the way, that the Collector of this port has, within the last two or three weeks, also accepted Fisk's hospitality at his theatre and supper-table? The question is not impertinent, considering what has happened within the last six months, and considering that as long as men like Fisk find that they suffer no social damage whatever by any of their iniquities as long as they have any money, there is absolutely no check on them—neither God, man, nor devil having any terrors for them.

General Butterfield's account of his share in the gold conspiracy, as given before the committee, is that Jay Gould never "bought gold for him, with his knowledge, consent, or advice;" but that Gould did lend him $10,000 voluntarily, to meet some private debt, without security. But it appears that his broker, Mr. Joseph Seligman, did buy and sell bonds and gold (the latter to the amount of $700,000) for him during the panic week, and that the gold was sold on General Butterfield's express order, and at a profit. But he maintains that all his dealings, in gold and bonds, both during that period were part and parcel of a course of dealings begun before he took office, and which he felt under no obligation to relinquish after taking office, as long as he "took no advantage of information or knowledge derived from his official position." He did take advantage of his official knowledge, however, the committee report, having told Seligman beforehand that the Government was going to sell gold. He accounts for the leaking out of the Secretary's telegrams, by ascribing it to an old and faithless operator understanding the clicking of the instrument. It must be admitted, putting the most favorable possible construction on General Butterfield's doings, that the presence in the United States

Sub-Treasury in a high official position, at such a crisis, of an extensive operator in gold and bonds was a great scandal. General Butterfield's declaration that he did not think there was anything wrong in it, reveals a condition of innocent simplicity rarely found amongst operators.

The legal-tender decision is slowly beginning to be taken advantage of by creditors, the Government itself being open to suits, some of which are already announced. On the other hand, there are signs of confidence in a reversal of that decision as soon as the Supreme Court is enlarged; and it is probable that when the new judges are confirmed and have taken their seats, the question will be speedily renewed on some one of the cases still remaining on the list. Indeed, the railroads seem to regard this as their main hope, and those of Pennsylvania have despatched one of their attorneys to Washington to see that the issue is promptly brought before the Court. For want of an apparent disposition to obey the decision, the Pennsylvania Central is reported to have forfeited a chance to negotiate with a great German house for a loan to one of the Western feeders of the road, having the guaranty of the company. The officers of most of the railroads of that State, as of this, are Democrats, and in the present emergency are developing an unsuspected faith in paper currency.

What those States will do towards indemnifying their bond holders which have paid them hitherto in currency, is not so certain as, for our good name's sake, it ought to be. One branch of the Maine Legislature has manifested a desire to go back and fulfil the obligation of the original contract, and to start fairly and honestly with gold payments from this time on. The Senate, however, has tabled the former proposition, and will, at most, only begin now to cease repudiating the indebtedness of the State. In Pennsylvania, we notice that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have put forth the following manifesto, which reminds one of the way in which Mr. August Belmont once fared at the hands of the State Treasurer:

"Harrisburg, Feb. 24, 1870.—Resolved, That inasmuch as the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of legal tender was concurred in by only three Judges out of five in a Court composed of seven Judges, and the legislation of the State only authorizes the payment of her indebtedness in what is known as the legal-tender currency of the United States, it would not be advisable for the State Treasurer to make any change in the present mode of paying the obligations of the Commonwealth."

This resolution is, in itself, of no more value than the paper on which it was written, the Commissioners being simply clerks, under the direction of the Legislature; and the motive for their action must be sought in the probable effect of it upon that body—which we will not pretend to estimate.

The logic of the Commissioners, based on the bare majority of a Court numerically deficient, is as bad as the morality of their conclusion. It would justify the South in refusing to submit to a President who had been chosen, however fairly and constitutionally, by a minority of the people, as was Abraham Lincoln; or the Democratic party in declaring invalid every Act of Congress and every constitutional amendment passed during the war while its Southern seats were vacant, or after the war until the reconstructed States had been admitted. And if the Supreme Court of five is incompetent for a legal-tender decision, it is equally so for every case brought or to be brought under its jurisdiction. Such reasoning as this sheds light on the probable value of Mr. Trumbull's idea that all would go well if only two-thirds or three-fourths of the Court were held necessary for certain kinds of judgments, whereas it is obvious that, in times of public excitement, a majority in any court is likely to seem too small to bind the majority represented by this party or by that. The Commissioners, however, offer further evidence of the faith we just now alluded to as prevalent in certain quarters, that a full bench will reverse the decision of the Chief-Justice.

Mr. Whittemore, the South Carolina Representative who sold the cadetships, has escaped expulsion by resigning his seat, the Speaker ruling that the precedents would justify the House in refusing to accept his resignation; and two others have followed his example. General Logan pressed hard for conviction and punishment, and with great force and readiness and a most refreshing hatred of knavery, but the Honorable B. F. Butler, finding the atmosphere of the place getting disagreeable, threw off his character of member of the House, and constituted himself then and there counsel for the accused, and announced himself as responsible only to God for any course of conduct he might see fit to adopt. The confession by his client of all the material facts of the case rendered his services useless, however. We are sorry to see a disposition in some quarters to palliate Whittemore's offence. A more dangerous one, in the existing condition of our politics, it would be hard to commit, and its gravity is really rather increased than diminished by the fact that the money went not to himself personally, but to the poor of his district, and to the expenses of a political campaign, because this apparently unselfish use of it helps to disguise the real nature, and shut out from view the probable consequences, of this kind of traffic, and is especially likely to do so among the ignorant Southern constituencies, like Mr. Whittemore's, to whom the whole mechanism of politics is new and strange. We were sorry, therefore, to see a paper like the Boston Advertiser, which seldom or never loses its head, carried away, by the contemplation of Mr. Whittemore's labors amongst the negroes in South Carolina, into apologizing for him, and recommending the House not to push him hard, as his constituency will probably re-elect him. Perhaps they will, but they ought not; if they knew better, they would not; and the House was bound to stigmatize his fault in such manner as to impress them with a sense of its gravity.

The retirement of Whittemore was followed, we are glad to say, by a meeting of "the friends of General Butler," at which speeches were made highly eulogistic of him, and it was announced that he was to be candidate for the next Presidency. Amongst the orators who were announced—we are unable to say whether they appeared—were Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts; Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee; and Mr. Durant, of Louisiana. The proceedings closed with a procession to his house, where he was serenaded, and made a brief speech. The Washington correspondents whom he has reviled have, we are sorry to say, treated the affair with ridicule, and say the serenaders were soldiers and sailors who are waiting for New Orleans prize-money, to be obtained through his exertions. He was, by the way, the one member from New England who voted for the inflation resolution on Monday week, and if it were not for his late unfortunate outburst of hostility to the press, we should call him a rising statesman. The New York Tribune meanly insinuates that so far from being "superior to the newspapers" generally, as he says he is, he is only superior to those newpapers which supported him at his election last year.

It is not often that we get so impressive a reminder of the uncertainty of life as has been furnished us in Mr. Burlingame's death. He was near the crowning period of a singular career, and on the eve of completing an enterprise which, whatever its substantial value, had more of the picturesque and romantic about it than any that perhaps has fallen to the lot of anybody in the Western World. But it undoubtedly had intrinsic value, and was likely to mark the entrance on a new and fruitful stage of the relation between China and Christendom. That it should have powerfully impressed Mr. Burlingame's imagination was not wonderful—he would not have been worthy of it if it had not; and it was perhaps owing to a not unnatural excitement over it that he drew the glowing pictures of its probable results which brought down on the mission a great part of the unfavorable criticism it received. Mr. Burlingame undoubtedly believed all he predicted, and had he lived as long as we all had a right to hope, he would doubtless have seen many of his brightest visions realized. Besides the conspicuous part he played in Chinese diplomacy—and which, by the way, he owed in large part to the confidence of his European colleagues—he had won in a degree somewhat unusual for men of his age in political life the confidence of his own countrymen. Few men had had a more varied experience, and had developed so much of the peculiar talent necessary for political success, while retaining a steady hold on the esteem and respect of those who are least disposed to value it. The worst effect of his death on the Chinese question will be, however, his absence from Peking, where his presence would probably have done more to preserve good relations between China and the West than the treaties will ever do.

The bar of Philadelphia is petitioning the State Legislature for an increase in the number of judges. The city has a Court of Common Pleas, with four judges, who do all the criminal and equity and orphans' court, and some of the civil, business of nearly a million of people. The District Court tries civil cases only, and has three judges. It was created thus in 1811, and in 1820 there were 2,000 suits in it, while last year there were 8,000—a number for which the provision is palpably inadequate. Finally, there is a jury side of the Supreme Court, besides that court in banc for appellate causes, with five judges. Happily, a proposition to increase the judges of Philadelphia has not the same terrors as with us. The bench there enjoys the esteem of bar and people, and has no one to cast a slight on its ability and integrity. Its tendencies are regarded with anxiety by some who see it more and more involved in political legislation, as in the case of the Trust Bill referred to last week; but at this moment both bench and bar are noticeably diligent in trying criminals and punishing crime, and without distinction of party.

It is to be hoped that the Legislature will increase not only the number of the Judges, but the salaries along with them, these being as insufficient for decent support and the dignity of their profession as in most other parts of the country. A movement of this kind is on foot in Massachusetts, and is met by the singular objection that as the Judges, especially the newer ones, accepted their positions in full view of the small pay attaching to them, they have no claims to an increase. And "Warrington," the Boston correspondent of the Springfield Republican, and clerk of the Massachusetts House, further adds, that if any rich man suffers from the spectacle of an underpaid judiciary, he is at liberty to put his hand into his pocket and eke out the salaries to any extent. This ingenious remedy is only equalled by Mr. Greeley's panacea for those who object that the tariff enriches the manufacturers of pig-iron: "You can go and make it yourselves, gentlemen."

The Minnesota Legislature has provided for the submission to the people, women included, of an amendment to the constitution adopting female suffrage at all elections. Missouri and Kansas are permitting it in school matters, and an amendment to the constitution in favor of it is presently to be voted upon in Vermont. In Utah, the system is on trial, but out of 20,000 women in the Territory only six or seven voted at the last election. The cause of this abstinence was explained at a recent woman's rights meeting in this city, by ascribing it to the tyranny of the husbands, who would not let the women go to the polls. The experiment is also being made in Wyoming Territory; but the women there are but a handful, and, it is said, leave much to be desired, to use a very safe and convenient Gallicism, on the score of character, so that their use of the franchise will hardly shed much light on the general question. In England, the movement makes much progress, owing, we think, mainly to its exceeding sobriety. Its artillery is nearly all heavy; no firing is allowed till the guns are fairly in position, shotted, and sighted, and the gunners take off their hoops, and remove the flowers and birds-of-paradise from their hair, while in action.

The Woman's Journal has retracted the charge of "professional dishonesty" which it made against the Nation, apropos of the authorship of the articles which lately appeared in our columns on the Woman's Rights agitation; and its having done so will go far to reassure those who were led to fear that that paper was only adding one more to the list of unscrupulous party hacks, by whose service so many good causes have been brought into disrepute. We shall add one word more, before dismissing the affair, at the risk of seeming to bear down too much. The leaders must not be so impatient of criticism. They have not got a monopoly of this woman question. They are not prophets or apostles. They must not suppose that nobody has done any thinking about woman's condition in society who does not go about making speeches on platforms or does not edit "an organ." Some of the most valuable thought about it is not uttered at all, or is only uttered in private houses. Some of the richest experience touching its problems has never seen, and will never see, the light. Moreover, everybody knows that the platform spirit, useful as it may be for "putting things through," is not very apt in the lightening of dark places or the solution of deep mysteries; and, considering the depth of the mystery those engaged in this movement are undertaking to solve, it must be confessed their scorn of the decent people who stay at home, their loudness of utterance, their off-hand way of settling great questions, their ferocity in attack and defence, and their supreme confidence in the gong as an instrument of human regeneration, are sometimes afflicting to witness for those who take a sincere interest in the cause.

A meeting was held in this city last week, to make some provision for putting an end to what is a crying shame and disgrace—the spectacle of maimed and disabled soldiers begging their bread in the streets, or taking refuge in the Almshouse. There has been a soldiers' home in Albany, and Governor Hoffman says he asked the last Legislature to provide for its permanent support. Instead of doing so, they made a small appropriation for it, on condition that it should be closed in four months, and closed it was. The men had to be sent to asylums in other States, or turned out on the high road. The exceeding sensitiveness of the political world about providing men who in any field have faithfully served their country, whether it be as judge, or soldier, or civil servant, with any assistance in their old age, is an amiable weakness, which, considering the great calm with which they see the State swindled by the same parties when in full enjoyment of their mental and bodily faculties, they ought to try and get over. Every man, woman, and child in the community is disgraced by the presence amongst us of destitute soldiers; and there ought to be no rest as long as any well-behaved man, who has been disabled in the late war, and been honorably discharged, can say that he has no means of support.

There were rumors from Paris for some days that the Emperor was getting out of conceit with the Liberal ministry and the Liberal régime, and was disposed, as our politicians would say, "to go back" on Ollivier. These have now been contradicted—though they hardly needed contradiction—as nothing is clearer than that, no matter what comes of Ollivier, retreat is no longer possible for the Emperor. However, Ollivier is far from finding it all plain sailing; his announcement of his intention to give up proposing official candidates—that is, to allow the country to declare its will freely without guidance or direction—so excited the majority of the Chamber that they voted him down, most of them owing their own seats to the very system he was condemning. What importance he will attach to this kind of censure remains to be seen. Gustave Flourens' account of his "insurrection" has arrived, and it is exceedingly amusing—all the more amusing when we remember that he and Rochefort are the two statesmen who, if the revolt had been successful, would have had charge of the new "Republic" in its struggling infancy. His report of his military operations represents him as having disarmed two non-resisting soldiers, and on meeting with two others, who chased him with their bayonets, as having treated them with scorn and indignation as minions of despotism, and withdrawn from their presence. Finding that upsetting some omnibuses in the street produced no effect on the Imperial régime, and that the brutal soldiery were quite ready to shed blood, he took refuge in the house, and looked out of the window, apparently more in sorrow than in anger, and at last, seeing that Louis Napoleon was not going to leave France, he determined to leave it himself, and the poor young idiot is now in Belgium. The net result of the rebellion is, that a dozen or two workingmen have received sword-thrusts from the Garde de Paris, a veteran corps devoted to the Emperor, who appear to have been cruel. Luckily the Chassepot was not brought into play. Perhaps the most important item of French news is, that the new Ministry are determined to withdraw the troops from Rome. The result of this will be that—Austria and Spain being out of the way—the Italians will probably incur the pains of hell under the ninth caput of the Syllabus, one article of which makes doubts of the Pope's right to his temporal sovereignty a damnable error, and, à fortiori, an armed irruption into his territory a mortal sin.

THE TARIFF CONTROVERSY.

The most ardent and sanguine protectionist has to confess that somehow a great change has come over public opinion within the last three or four years about the tariff. One of the most striking and most trustworthy signs of it is the number of newspapers all over the country, and particularly in the West, which were, a short time ago, either protectionist or neutral, which have become decidedly free-trade. Another is the number of prominent men "outside politics" who, bred in protectionist principles, have formally abandoned them, and unblushingly avow their conversion. We mention these as signs on the surface. There are others less apparent which, doubtless, those actively engaged in free-trade agitation could produce in abundance. The vote in the House of Representatives, February 7, on the resolution of confining the tariff to the collection of revenues simply, which was defeated only by 91 to 80, was a very striking indication of the extent to which Congress is being affected by the feeling out of doors, and yet changes in public opinion rarely affect Congressmen, unless they have been revealed by actual contest at the polls. The average Congressman is naturally timid; he knows on what issue he was elected; and he knows what his party expects of him on one or two great questions, and about these he is faithful unto death. But of new ideas or movements arising after his election he is exceedingly shy. His letters from home are not, by any means, reliable indications of the way the stream is flowing, and he reads the newspapers with a distrust which we are sure will be forgiven him when he comes up for final judgment. It is this uncertain state of his mind which accounts for the facility with which audacious men, like Butler and Thaddeus Stevens, lead him into all sorts of desperate enterprises, including those amazing votes on currency, taxation, and reconstruction which, during the last five years, have so often startled the nation from its propriety. The decision and boldness of these men impose on him. He feels that they know what they are about, which is more than he does; he fancies they must have private information, or see the little hole at the end of the cave out of which the fox creeps, so he follows wherever they lead. Thus far, nobody has tried him in free-trade, and several newspapers of which he has a constitutional dread are on the protectionist side, so that the vote on the above-mentioned resolution may be considered a striking proof of the strength of the silent influence in opposition to protection by which the political atmosphere begins to be pervaded.

Now, if we said this change had been due to the arguments of free-traders, we should give them more than their due, and the protectionists less. It is mainly the work of the protectionists themselves. The enormous majority in Congress, of which the secession of the South left them in possession, and which they doubtless looked on as a great blessing, has proved, as large majorities are apt to do, an unmitigated curse. It apparently removed all necessity for caution and moderation. The enemy seemed so small and despicable that they broke ranks, and took to plundering in every direction, without order, discipline, or method. People could have borne contributions levied in a regular way and with some attempt at equality of distribution, but six or seven years of indiscriminate pillage have ended in raising the population against them. To Mr. Wells is undoubtedly directly due a large amount of the prevailing hostility; but Mr. Wells has not made himself a preacher of free-trade. What his reports have done is simply to show what the working of the tariff really is. His exposé would have been effective enough if protectionists had let him alone; but their attempts to prevent the circulation of his reports, and to vilify him personally, of course have immensely stimulated the popular interest in all that he said, and given him an opportunity of making some very telling retorts. Nor in accounting for the actual state of opinion on this subject must we leave out of sight the labors of our esteemed contemporary, the New York Tribune. That paper, owing to a variety of circumstances, is now the principal, indeed one might say the sole remaining, champion of distinction which the old protectionist cause has in the press; and it has two styles of treatment, which it applies to nearly every subject—the humorous and the vituperative.

One of the peculiarities of a protective tariff is, however, that it does not admit of being defended humorously. Like all highly artificial arrangements, it offers innumerable weak points for the assaults of the wit or satirist, while anybody who undertakes to defend it has to be solemn as a judge, and look as wise as an owl. He cannot afford to laugh; he has to assume an enormous weight of responsibility constantly pressing on him. The duty he advocates, for instance, he dare not treat as simply a matter of dollars and cents, about which it is permitted, even to a truly good man, to crack a joke. He has to regard it, and talk of it, as the means under Providence of protecting millions of artisans from the competition of foreign pauper labor, and enabling them to live happy lives, and making the nation a sure refuge of the oppressed, and keeping it constantly prepared for bloody wars with designing despots.

On the other hand, neither does protection admit of vituperative defence, though we admit that it now shares this characteristic with a variety of other great causes. Newspaper abuse, whatever it may have done once, now settles nothing and injures nobody. Probably in the conflicts in which Mr. Greeley passed his earlier days, and of which he has preserved the habits and traditions, calling an opponent names in "scathing editorials" damaged him; but those days have passed away. The country has greatly changed within the last twenty years. The public has grown old and grave and sedate to a degree of which Mr. Greeley and some of his brother agitators seem to have no idea. When the Tribune, therefore, says that Mr. Wells has been bribed with "British gold," he makes people laugh; Wells laughs himself, and we all laugh. "British gold" has become one of the cant phrases, the mere mention of which calls up a smile in any circle in the country. When it says he is a "Munchausen" and a "humbug," people laugh more, but their opinion about the tariff remains just what it was. In fact, they watch Mr. Greeley's operations with the same mixture of curiosity and amusement with which they would watch the exercises of a company of matchlock-men.

There is in the country undoubtedly a strong enough desire to be independent of Europe, a strong enough tendency to take the protectionist view of the duty of Government, to make it tolerably easy to frame a tariff that would stand. The protectionist theory is not wholly irrational. A law imposing a tax for the express purpose of building up a particular branch or branches of industry might offend against a good many men's theory of government, but no rational person would seriously consider it robbery. To denounce this with violence as under no circumstances within the province of Government, while conceding to Government the right to enter on wars, however unjustifiable or costly, is simply absurd. But then scientific protection—protection which is to produce very lasting results—which is to do more than enable a small body of men to make large profits for a few years—has, first of all, to be confined to a few articles. General protection for everybody's manufactures, such as we have been attempting for the last ten years, is as much of a chimera as trying to make mountains of water in mid-ocean. When everybody is protected, nobody is protected. Secondly, it must be the work of a government, independent of the people and of "interests," having a fixed policy of its own, and strong enough to carry it out for a long term of years in the teeth of clamor; because to produce any good effect on any branch of industry it must be steady. A tariff overhauled once a year is a positive curse to everybody, even on the protectionist theory of tariffs. Of course, if all this be true, it is more than doubtful whether a popular government will ever be able to establish any protective system which can be called really effective or will be anything better than a device for enabling large numbers of manufacturers and producers to levy contributions on each other and on the general public in a loose and slipshod way. No system of taxation requires such close and, indeed, scientific watching, because its indirect and remote results are often far more powerful than its direct and anticipated results, and it is the continual discovery of the former which makes it necessary to overhaul and readjust high tariffs nearly every year. There is a chance now, and we are glad to see there is some talk at Washington, of some compromise between the two parties, which will give us peace for a few years at least, and seal up one of the greatest fountains of corruption by which any people was ever afflicted; and if the high-tariff men are wise they will jump at it.

THE RATIFICATION TROUBLE.

We print elsewhere a letter on the power of States to withdraw their ratification of amendments, which puts strongly against the doctrine of irrevocability, which we have advanced, the argument ab inconvenienti, on which the World also has placed its main reliance in an elaborate criticism, of which it made the Nation's article the subject, a fortnight ago, and which more recently it brought into the field against Senator Conkling. The sum and substance of this argument is that, if we deny States the power of revoking, before proclamation, their ratification of amendments to the Constitution, we expose ourselves to the risk of having amendments hang over our heads for years, till the occasion which called for them has passed away and been forgotten, or until public sentiment about it has totally changed, and then seeing it suddenly adopted by the ratification of one or two States which had previously held back; and the result would be, as we understand the matter, something fearfully disastrous.

We admit that this might occur, and we admit, too, that even remote consequences of either acts or omissions are in politics always deserving of serious consideration; but then nearly all political questions are questions of degree. There are contingencies in this as in other fields of human activity which are very probable, and others only slightly probable. We cannot possibly concern ourselves about them all equally, or regulate our conduct with the same regard to them all; for some of them, let their existence be never so undeniable, we cannot make any provision at all without subjecting ourselves to great present loss and inconvenience. For instance, when I am walking down Broadway, a brick may fall from a scaffold on my head; but I would rather run the risk than wear a steel cap. So, also, admitting it to be possible that an amendment might hang over us for twenty years, till the States which had originally ratified it had changed their minds about it, and then be thrust into the Constitution by one other ratification, there are several reasons for not allowing the consideration of the contingency to affect our course now, of which the following are the principal—and they are reasons which go to the very foundation of all popular government: 1. It is very improbable—supposing there were forty States in the Union, and even twenty-nine had ratified an amendment—that any influences which had, after several years' consideration, effected a change of opinion in the ratifying States, would not also affect the non-ratifying States, and make them unwilling to force the amendment into the Constitution; it is still more improbable that any one State, finding itself in a position to do such a thing, would, in the teeth of a great pressure of opinion on the other side all over the country, spring any such trap. Exploits of this sort, when they occur, are the result of greater moral isolation than is to be found amongst us. The pressure of majorities is immense already, and increases. 2. Even if it did occur, putting a rule into the Constitution of the United States does not make it part of the order of nature. The Constitution is the work of human hands; if an amendment gets into it which people don't like, it can be got out again. Putting one into it to which the majority was violently opposed, and putting it in by a trick, too, would be a sure way of rousing strong public feeling against it. True, a fourth of the States can prevent the removal of an amendment, but they are very unlikely to do so in the teeth of strong and continuous pressure from the other three-fourths; and if more than one-fourth oppose the removal, this, while it would increase the difficulty of the change, would also show that the change was not plainly desirable, and that the Republic would not be seriously injured if it were not made. You have, in short, with regard to this as to many other matters, to trust to popular good sense and capacity for self-government. The people might refuse unanimously to pay any taxes or serve in the militia; they might refuse to elect members of Congress, or a President, and thus the Government would go to pieces. There is no provision in the Constitution which would afford us the slightest protection against such a calamity, but then the Constitution is none the worse on that account. It does not pretend to provide, and could not provide, for all possibilities. It provides for strong probabilities, and has been framed for the government of reasonable men. It would, therefore, be foolish for us to tease ourselves over the contemplation of the defects which might show themselves in it should the people who live under it cease to be reasonable.

Moreover, we affirm that the balance of inconvenience is on the side of the theory which allows States to withdraw their ratification before proclamation. Delay and deliberation are not undesirable in the adoption of amendments to the Constitution; nay, they ought to be encouraged. But, if any State might withdraw its ratification whenever it pleased, they would become very undesirable, because they would expose the sober judgment of the country on a great national question to defeat or hindrance for an indefinite period by the mere ups and downs of State politics. Local issues are constantly causing power to change hands in the State legislatures, and as party feeling grows stronger and the class of men who take charge of State affairs declines relatively in quality, the practice of undoing everything the other party has done, out of mere spite, and without any or very little regard to the public interest, grows commoner. So that we should constantly see ratifications of amendments to the Federal Constitution withdrawn, as a mere weapon of party warfare and from a desire "to smash things," by majorities which owed their existence to accident or fraud or some trifling convulsion in local opinion. Nobody, for instance, supposes the present New York Legislature represents the sober judgment of the State on Federal questions, or is likely to be of the same complexion a year hence. In short, it is pretty certain that amendments will rarely be ratified except after much discussion and consideration; while ratifications might and probably would often be withdrawn by a snap vote, or even as a practical joke. Besides this, when we come to have fifty or sixty States, the conversion of ratifications into a shuttlecock for the amusement of local politicians would create practical difficulties of a serious kind in the way of the adoption of any amendment. With the telegraph in operation, the Secretary of State might go to bed at ten o'clock thinking an amendment was adopted, and get up in the morning and find that a State had backed out in the night and left it high and dry; and there would be disputes as to whether he had or had not received the withdrawal of the ratification before the proclamation was issued, and he would be accused of lying and fraud, and the validity of the amendment would be questioned, and we should, every time one was proposed, have a fair chance of civil war before it was adopted. As to the horrors of having to live under an amendment adopted long after the required majority of the States had pronounced in its favor, and when they might in the interval have changed their minds about it, on which the World dwells with much solemnity, let us remind our contemporary that the whole Constitution is more or less open to that objection. This generation is living under an organic law which it had no hand whatever in adopting and about which it was never consulted, and some provisions of which it would certainly never have assented to; nevertheless, we are not so badly off after all. We marry and feast and buy and sell, and do all the other business of life with great comfort, though the Constitution was never submitted to us for our approval.

The World relies a good deal on the analogy drawn from the ratification of the Constitution itself, and derides Mr. Conkling for holding that there is a difference in the source of the right by which a party enters into a contract, and that of the right by which a State ratifies an amendment to the Constitution. It is quite true that the Union could not have been formed unless nine States had ratified, for the ratification of nine States was of the essence of the agreement; but it is not necessary for us to discuss whether any State had the power to withdraw its ratification then or not, or what effect the withdrawal would have had on the position of the remainder, because it is clear enough that the States, before the adoption of the Constitution, ratified it in a different character from that in which the States now in the Union ratify an amendment, and with different powers. They adopted the Constitution as perfectly free agents, in possession of independent authority, and the vote of each State therefore bound nobody but itself. They ratify an amendment now as members of a body politic already in existence, and derive their power of ratifying and the conditions of ratification from its organic law; and the proof is, that the action of three-fourths binds the other fourth, which, before the adoption of the Constitution, it could not do. Where do three-fourths get the right now to impose their will on the other fourth? Not from the law of nature, nor from conquest, nor from revelation; they get it from the Constitution. There is no place else to get it from, so that all arguments in defence of the right of withdrawal, based on the analogy of ordinary contracts, are fallacious and delusive.

THE SEXES IN COLLEGES.

THE admission of women to our colleges and universities is, if not the most important educational problem yet to be solved, at least the most pressing and the most clamorous for an immediate solution. It hangs closely together with the question of female suffrage, and, indeed, may almost be said to depend upon that; for, if women are once admitted to vote, there will be little likelihood of their being long excluded from college classes, and if, on the other hand, the suffrage is still denied them, it will be largely on grounds which will be equally weighty against the reform in question. Still, the separation of the sexes in education has nothing to do with any alleged inferiority of the one to the other—hardly, indeed, with any difference in "sphere;" for all agree as to giving women as good an education as men, and an identical one if they desire it. And in those institutions which are designed to complement college education, such as the university courses at Cambridge, no objection is made to the admission of ladies, and no mischief can result.

The subject of coeducation in colleges and universities must be regarded from two points of view—that of the character and demeanor of the students, and that of their intellectual training. In the courses just spoken of, intellectual considerations are the only ones, as the students are supposed to be old enough and mature enough to look after themselves. The lecturers have no responsibility but to give their best; it is for the hearer to determine whether it meets his or her wants. But the college has higher aims than mere intellectual training—to turn out well-developed men, in both intellect and character; and it is the essential feature of a college that it assumes the responsibility of the student's entire development. Any college, therefore, before making so radical a change as that proposed must satisfy itself that it is ready to assume this added responsibility; that it feels prepared to turn out as good members of society, men and women, as it could men alone or women alone. The assumption that it is "natural" or "right in itself" has nothing to do with it; the sole question is as to the results, and that not merely or mainly in securing good discipline and good lessons, but in producing manly men and womanly women, fitted to do the work of life in their generation. President Eliot, for the Faculty of Harvard College, frankly says that they are not prepared to assume this responsibility; and, so long as this is the case, the question of duty is settled for them.

The colleges are distinguished from those institutions of higher culture which are able to make a certain provision for women, by the fundamental fact that they take the young man at the most critical period of his youth, and retain the entire control of him for a period long enough to form his character, and give his mind the training he needs in order to prepare him for the work of life. This is what the American colleges undertake to do, and, with all their defects, they may claim a fair degree of success; the college graduates as a class are not unworthy of the pains and expense that have been bestowed upon them. There are two other classes of institutions which appear to possess a considerable analogy to colleges in this respect—the high schools and the normal schools—both of which, in very large proportion, are composed of students of both sexes, and of nearly the same age as college students. In what essential point do these differ from colleges? It seems at first sight that the normal schools especially present a complete analogy to them, and that the entire success of the experiment in these gives good reason to expect equal success in colleges. It will be found, however, we believe, that this analogy is not complete. The normal schools lack the essential feature of the colleges. They are not established to make men and women, but school-teachers; the students are, on the average, not far from the age of the higher college classes, but they go to the school with the definite purpose of fitting themselves for a special work, not with the vague desire of being disciplined into manhood. The school authorities, to be sure, have their rules, and maintain more or less supervision over the demeanor of the students; but this discipline is wholly subsidiary to the professional training, not itself an end. And as to the high schools, they are simply the last and highest grade of our mixed common schools, touching upon the lower edge of the college course, as the normal schools do upon the upper.

And what is more essential still, the scholars of the public schools live at home and are under the care and responsibility of their parents, looking to the school only for intellectual instruction. Now, it is precisely here, where the colleges differ essentially from the high schools, that we find the weak point of college discipline. It is right that a time should come when the boy shall leave home and learn to rely upon himself, leaving behind him the constant and watchful control of his parents, and having in place of it only the indirect and general influence of the college. This is just what he needs at the right time; but it is in the impossibility of knowing in each individual case just when the right time has come that the dangers of college life chiefly consist. The boy goes from home, passes four years in the comparative freedom of college life, and leaves the college walls a man. Are we prepared to have our girls do the same thing? Many a boy is wrecked in his course, many a one stumbles and recovers himself; but a girl cannot retrace a false step as her brother can. For her, once to fall is ruin.

It is here that the peculiar difficulties of coeducation in colleges appear to reside; and it was from a consideration of these, no doubt, that Horace Mann, as we are told, insisted so strenuously upon the dormitory system as essential to success in a mixed college. That is, the freedom which young men enjoy with safety and profit will not do for young women of the same age and on professedly the same footing. In this he was probably right; a college will not undertake this peculiar responsibility for girls away from home, except by retaining a much more constant control than they care to exercise over boys. But is not this really admitting that not only a real equality of the sexes in college education has never been tried, but we are afraid to try it? If every girl lived under her father's roof, it would be different. There could then be no objection to mixed classes—none, that is, from the point we are now considering; it is in the fact that the college assumes a responsibility which it has not adequate means of maintaining that the danger lies; for we see no more harm in girls and boys meeting in the class-room and lecture-room than in sleigh-rides and parties.

We have spoken only of the moral aspect of the question, and that side of it which has to do with the special dangers arising from the sexual relation; because this is the first and most essential point of view in which to regard it. We have seen that the analogies from other kinds of educational institutions do not apply here, for the reason that the aim and the circumstances differ. No experience can be conclusive except where these are the same; we must, therefore, fall back after all upon the limited experience of Oberlin and Antioch, and other less known institutions in the West. With regard to these, it must be admitted that the evidence of experience is favorable in this point; we believe that they have been as free from scandal and moral danger as the average of institutions for girls alone—certainly far more so than many girls' boarding-schools. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the community appears to have lost confidence in this feature of these institutions, as is shown in some interesting statistics lately given in a series of papers in the College Courant. We pass over those which relate to Antioch, for the reason that the financial embarrassments and suspension of that institution may be fairly presumed to have affected it in this respect. As to Oberlin, it is shown that the proportion of girls in the college classes has steadily decreased from one-fourth to one-fifteenth; that of the nine present members (against one hundred and thirty-five men), three belong to Ohio, all of these residents of Oberlin itself; while a separate "Ladies' Department" contains one hundred and seventy; and eight Ohio girls are members of the college classes of the distant and expensive Vassar College. These remarkable figures certainly seem to show a falling off of the demand for education in mixed colleges, from whatever cause it may be.

We suspect that the real cause is that the young ladies do not, after all, wish for the same education with young men; and while we fully believe that, if they do wish for the same, they ought to have it, we as fully believe that, in nine cases out of ten, they had better not have it. Very few girls can do, without breaking down physically, the intellectual work which their more robust brothers can safely undertake. And even if they could, we cannot but believe that a quite different training is required to fit the members of the different sexes for the diverse work that will necessarily fall to their lot. Where they feel called upon to undertake the same work, they should have the same training; but this is professional training, and we have already pointed out the wide distinction between the professional school and the college. In the professional schools we see no reason that much of the preparation for the same work should not be made in company.

We have not touched, however, upon a point which is made much of in arguments upon this subject—the mutual influence of the sexes in their coeducation. Apart from the serious moral dangers which we have already considered, there seems no doubt that, in regard to the demeanor of the students, the mixed colleges are under no disadvantage. More than this is often claimed—that the female influence is necessarily refining and elevating. But this depends upon other things. Nothing is more healthy for a young man at this critical age than the society of cultivated ladies. We do not know that we can say as much for that of school-girls. It is only by constant watchfulness that the intercourse of school-girls and boys can be kept from downright rudeness; so that we should say only that under good management the influence of the sexes may be good upon one another; under bad management, it will be unequivocally bad.

Intellectually, we should pass a different judgment. Girls as students are quick, faithful, and intelligent; but they have loose habits of thought, and are prone to be mere book-students. It is an unmixed good for them to be brought in contact with the freer and, at the same time, closer habits of reasoning of the boys; while their perfect knowledge of their lessons serves to stimulate their rivals to faithful application. Nor is there much danger of the influence being the other way, and each sex acquiring the bad habits of the other; for each recognizes the other's points of superiority, and the women especially feel that it is mainly from this masculine quality of mind the long supremacy of the male sex has resulted.

We have given the reasons which make us incline to the opinion that the experiment of mixed colleges is not likely to be a success. At the same time, it must be remembered that it is still an experiment, and whoever has real faith in it possesses so far a chief condition of success. We hope that trials will continue to be made, until it is an experiment no longer. We have so much confidence that it would be an intellectual benefit to women, that we should be sincerely glad if it should be found practicable to unite the classes so far as the studies cover the same ground. But whether this movement is to go on or is to die out by degrees, there is, we are confident, one condition to a successful union of the sexes in college classes—a policy of sympathy and trust rather than of suspicion. If it is safe for girls and boys to be together, let those who have the control of them be men who heartily believe so, and show that they believe it. If there is danger of mischief, the surest way to make the mischief come is to be constantly expecting it. Nobody expects girls to have the same freedom as boys when they are sent from home to be educated. They are of necessity subjected to rules and hours from which boys may safely be free; and this circumstance, while it shows the futility of expecting a real and genuine equality of the two sexes in the same institution, has also this evil effect, that the girls who are promised equality of treatment, and expect it—ignorant as they are of the dangers of their new life, and ambitious for their sex—chafe against restraints which they would not mind if they were by themselves, and by this again become unwittingly the instruments of their own disappointment.

ENGLAND.—THE QUEEN'S SPEECH—THE BISHOPS IN CONVOCATION.

LONDON, February 11, 1870.

PARLIAMENT has been opened, and speculations as to the probable character of the session are, of course, being everywhere indulged. Shall we have an exciting or a quiet time of it? In favor of the first view, it may be said that there never has been a period at which more important measures were coming up for settlement; and in favor of the second, that Government has so large a majority, and is encountered by so disorganized an opposition, that no serious fight can well take place. The last view seems to be the commonest, although I confess that my belief in the strategical powers of Mr. Gladstone's ministry is not quite so great as this opinion implies. There are, as I have frequently remarked, so many delicate points to settle that I think they can hardly avoid raising some exciting disputes. Prophecy, however, is not my business, and I will confine myself to the history which has already become historical. The debates, whatever their interest, will for a time be diminished in importance by the absence of two leading men. Mr. Bright, I regret to say, has been compelled by medical advice to leave London for a time, though I hope that he is not seriously ill; the House of Commons will, for the present, be without their one great orator. Lord Cairns is also obliged to go abroad in search of health, and in him the House of Lords will lose the ablest of Conservative leaders. He appeared on the opening-day of the session in the kind of oratorical parade which takes place on occasion of the Queen's speech, but will not appear again for the present. Perhaps I ought to say something on occasion of that remarkable document. I say remarkable, because, being the composition of some of the most eminent men in the country, it is about the most empty and uninteresting of all official papers. A President may, if he can, really put some matter into an inaugural address, because he really exercises an influence upon the politics of the country. But, as a Queen's speech expresses in theory the opinions of a sovereign who is supposed to be raised out of the sphere of party questions, it is compelled in dramatic propriety to express no opinion of any interest to any human being. Why it should also be generally ungrammatical, is a question which I am unable to answer. I suppose that it has been so carefully patched by different Ministers in the attempt to purge it of all undesirable excrescences, that it generally becomes at once incoherent and unmeaning, and that the language suffers in sympathy with the incompleteness of the contents. The Queen's speech, however, meaningless as it is, is supposed to lay down the programme of business intended by Ministers. The present performance tells us little in this respect; but it certainly is satisfactory as far as it goes. If anything like the list of measures thus proposed is actually carried into execution, we shall be able to say that the session has been far from fruitless. The whole speech may be summed up in a single sentence for these purposes: Parliament is to be invited to deal with the Irish land-laws; with national education; with the naturalization laws; with the constitution of the highest courts of law; with religious tests in the universities; with the transfer of land and the succession to real property; with certain questions about rating; with licensing the sale of spirits; with trades-unions; and with the laws about merchant shipping. A hint is also thrown out that it may possibly have to provide exceptional measures, such as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, for preserving order in Ireland. A word or two of comment upon this text will be sufficient. The question of religious tests in the universities has become one of those tiresome disputes on which all has been said that possibly can be said, and on which all reformers have come to be of one mind. Great doubts, however, have been expressed as to whether Government would or would not undertake a reform in the present session. The mention of it, therefore, in the Queen's speech is satisfactory, as indicating a probability that Government will adopt a more active policy than many people had supposed. The mention of the succession to real property is also of interest. Mr. Locke King has long brought on an annual motion providing that, in cases of intestacy, real property shall in future be equally divided. It appears that Government has decided, at last, to adopt this measure, and though the immediate practical importance is not likely to be great, it is an indication of a change of sentiment in such matters which may be noted for what it is worth. The attempt to deal with licensing public-houses is also remarkable as a step in advance.

What is not in the Queen's speech? is generally asked with as much interest as what is in it. In the present case, the only topic "conspicuous by its absence" is the existing distress and the proposals of state aid to emigration. The emigration societies, though they have made a considerable noise, do not seem to have taken root or to be flourishing very strongly. They have not collected money enough [to make them independent of help from the national funds, and the prospect of obtaining such help has perhaps been rather felt as a difficulty. The Government, it would seem, is not disposed to help them at all. Mr. Gladstone has said a few civil words, but then he is rather over-disposed to civility. To say the truth, these societies are not quite simple-minded enough in their efforts. They wish to do good to the poorer classes; but then they want to do good in their own way. They wish to combine charity with providing additional bonds for holding together the British Empire. There is that odor of patronage about them which is rather prejudicial to many benevolent institutions, and the Government are very properly shy of countenancing schemes which may lead to consequences of a very different kind from a mere extension of relief; or which, even if confined to relieving purposes, may take more unmanageable proportions than can be exactly foreseen.

I will not dwell longer upon a matter which has rather an official claim upon your attention than any great intrinsic interest. Another curious performance always accompanies the meeting of Parliament. That mysterious body, Convocation, meets and goes through certain forms of venerable antiquity. As you know, it is a century and a half since its existence, as a body exercising any real power, was effectually finished.

But it enjoys a sort of suspended vitality; the bishops meet in the upper chamber, and various lower dignitaries in the other. They talk for a time about matters of ecclesiastical interest, and they finally disperse after a day or two, leaving behind no traces of their action. Of late years, however, they have done a little more in the way of talking than was formerly permitted to them. The uneasy feeling which has been prevalent in the Church of England has encouraged them to make a few demonstrations of opinion, though they are tied, hand and foot, from real legislation. On the present occasion, they resolved to appoint a committee to enquire into the proper method of appointing bishops. It matters little whether they enquire or not, as it is very certain that Parliament would not in any way give effect to their conclusions. The election of an English bishop is one of the greatest of those anomalies of which we have so plentiful a stock. The Crown grants leave to the Chapter to elect a specified person; and the Chapter, having prayed to the Holy Ghost for direction, always proceeds to elect the person named. Various other ceremonies take place which preserve the memory, though not the reality, of the times when there was a bonâ fide election. There is something rather grotesque and something rather blasphemous about all this; but the practical effect of course is that the Prime Minister nominates bishops as much as he nominates a clerk in the Treasury. Moreover, it is clear that so long as we have a union between church and state, this will continue to be the case. The forms, however, might as well be altered, and the bishops may very properly wish for an enquiry. But the main object of the debate was to provide opportunities for going over once more the question of Dr. Temple's appointment to the See of Exeter. The scene was rather curious, though pretty much what might have been expected. All the bishops were anxious to define the degree in which they had protested or expressed an opinion about the election; and with great protestations of freedom from personal resentment, they succeeded in making a good many unpleasant remarks about their newly elected colleague. After they had all spoken, Dr. Temple arose and said a few words. Rather, as I should imagine, to the amazement of his hearers, they were words of deep gratitude for all the kindness he had received from his brethren. From another speaker the expressions might have been taken as comical; for mostly every bishop in the Church had done what he could to exclude Dr. Temple from the episcopate, or to force him to humiliate himself before admitting him to consecration. Dr. Temple, however, was obviously speaking in all earnestness, and, meanwhile, a more surprising circumstance was occurring in the lower house. There a motion, or as it is called, I believe, in ecclesiastical language, a gravamen, was brought forward, reflecting upon the appointment. It could, of course, have had no effect except as an expression of opinion. However, a friend of Dr. Temple's rose and announced that he was authorized to declare that Dr. Temple's essay would be withdrawn from any future edition of "Essays and Reviews." People are amazed that Dr. Temple should have taken such a step. It amounts to a confession that he has been wrong in permitting his essay to be published hitherto; for, of course, what is wrong in a bishop must have been equally wrong in a priest. So far, he justifies the attacks of his enemies, and admits by implication that he was guilty of an action of which they might rightfully complain, though not of an action which should disqualify him from the episcopate. The performance has, on the whole, left a very unpleasant impression upon Liberals. Dr. Pusey and his friends are of course delighted, and write to the Times to express their satisfaction and the withdrawal of their opposition. But Dr. Temple has lost ground with his old supporters. He both humbled himself unnecessarily before them in the speech, and made a practical confession of his errors by withdrawing the essay, which looks very much like a desertion of his old friends. Altogether, it is not a pleasant spectacle to contemplate, and proves that Dr. Temple is not so strong a man, though it may be that he is as good a man, as his friends had boasted. The practical inference is, that in the present state of ecclesiastical opinion in England, it is very hard for a man of Liberal views to be consistent as a bishop. The pressure on one hand, and the blandishments on the other, are too much for any ordinary strength of purpose. The result is, otherwise, not very important, except as proving that we have one more bishop than we knew of unimpeachable orthodoxy. There may be said to be now only one man on the bench of a type which was once the boast of the Church of England; I mean of the thoroughly liberal-minded, scholar-like, and independent men who were free from the ordinary clerical faults of bigotry and effeminacy. That one is Dr. Thirlwall, the Bishop of St. David's, whose clear good sense distinguishes him from his brethren no less than his profound learning. We have several very amiable and one or two very able prelates; but with this exception there is no man who has a reputation outside the ecclesiastical world.

Correspondence.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The Nation of January 27 enquired into the reasons "why American securities stand lower in the money markets of the world than those of any other power, except Turkey and Egypt?" The Illinois Staats-Zeitung thereupon remarked that it would be well enough to enquire why when the fact should have been proved. And it proceeded to show, from the quotations of the Paris Exchange, that, instead of standing lower than those of any power but Turkey and Egypt, American securities stand higher than those of any but four powers—those four being Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Prussia. It was shown that one hundred dollars, invested in British securities, brought 3¼ dollars annual interest; in French, 4 to 4⅛; in Dutch, 4⅔; in Prussian, 4⅞; in American, 6⅔; in Austrian (coin securities), 8; in Italian, 9; in Spanish, 10; in Portuguese, 9; in Turkish, 11½—from which it was concluded that the public credit of the United States had improved fully as rapidly as could have been reasonably expected, inasmuch as in 1864 the quotations of their securities had represented a rate of interest of 15 per cent., while even nine months ago that rate had exceeded 7 per cent.

In your last issue you do not deny these facts, but you maintain that "they prove nothing for the purpose of this discussion." Since the only point made by the Staats-Zeitung was the incorrectness of the assertion that American securities "stand lower" than those of Austria, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, it is difficult to see how evidence furnished to show that they stand much higher should be treated as irrelevant. But you proceed to explain your position in this way: That the securities of the United States, if they do stand higher than those of Austria, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, ought to stand very much higher yet, considering our financial history, present status, unlimited resources, and what not; and that, because they do not stand as high as the securities of Great Britain, France, etc., they stand comparatively and relatively lower than those of any other power, etc.

Now, in the utmost candor and with the single object of assisting in the meritorious efforts so successfully made by the Nation, on other occasions, to dispel all vague illusions, I would ask you: Have you not here fallen into the error, so often vigorously combated by you, of applying vague possibilities and crude ideas of the immediate importance of "inexhaustible resources" as a measure of the public credit?

How could the public credit of the United States at the present time stand as high, or even higher, than the credit of those four powers by whom it is preceded in the estimation of European financiers? The comparative degree of a nation's credit is not determined so much by the rapidity of the increase of population, or by the "limitless extent of fertile soil," or even by an imposing surplus revenue in one year, preceded by large deficiencies and followed by a largely diminished surplus, as it is by a continuance, through several generations, of absolutely undoubted solvency, by fixedness of its financial policy, by steadiness and regularity of its revenue, and by the fact that revenue from taxation is obtained in such a manner as not to cripple the producing power—i. e., the taxpaying power—of the nation. But in all these respects the United States are far inferior to those four nations whose securities stand higher than theirs. Neither of these has repudiated—neither of them has, within the last fifty years, gone through any such trial of national strength as the United States have within the last decade. On the other hand, all four have—the French revolutions of 1830 and 1848, the Belgian war of independence, and the German war of 1866 notwithstanding—upon the whole enjoyed the most perfect steadiness and regularity of financial policy and fiscal administration. Their revenue systems have been wisely and conscientiously adapted to the interests of commerce and productive industry, and have not been footballs for blatant demagogues to play with. Lastly, never in all those four States has a single individual, much less a party controlling 45 out of every 100 votes, advocated, nay, even intimated, the possibility of the nation tendering to its creditors its own repudiated due-bills as payment of its funded debts.

Since in all these respects the record as well as the prospect of the United States is by far less bright, it is simply natural and self-evident that their credit should stand lower. None knows better than the Nation that public credit is a thing of growth, not an article of manufacture. Even a Sequoia gigantea of only five years' growth will be of smaller size than a common hemlock of fifty years' growth. You cannot coax it, you cannot force it, to be as tall as its older relative. You may praise its "immense future," its "boundless resources," but that will be of very little use. You may expel nature by a pitchfork, as Horace admits while doubting the efficacy of the process, but you cannot impel it by all the pitchforks which the earnest men and poor financiers in Congress or Cabinet may wield.

But supposing, for argument's sake, that those fanciful elements of a high degree of public credit which the United States possess should be equal in power to the real elements of such a degree of credit possessed by Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Prussia, would that be sufficient to enable the United States to pay as low a rate of interest as those four States do? It would not; and for this reason: The rate of interest a government has to pay will, on the average, never be more than one per cent. below the average rate of interest paid by private borrowers in its own country. It will not; because it cannot, as long as the bulk of the national indebtedness has to be taken at home. Granted that one-third of our national bonded debt is held in Europe, yet the European market value of our bonds will be governed by our own quotations of them. But what determines these? Certainly not the rate of interest paid upon "loans on call," because that rate stands not in proportion to the amount of capital existing in the country, but to the amount of available uninvested currency. The rate of interest upon capital securely invested being from 12 per cent. on the banks of the Mississippi to 10 per cent. in Chicago and 7 per cent. in New York, the average cannot be set down at less than the latter figure. Now, in a country in which the rate of interest paid upon capital, invested in the very safest manner, averages about 7 per cent., the "par" of the national public credit (if you will pardon the use of this term) is just about six per cent., and no buncombe speeches, nor senatorial "financial policies" or "funding schemes," can make it less. An increase of the capital of the country (not by boasting of but by developing the "inexhaustible resources") and a scrupulously steady adherence to a well-digested revenue system can. But whatever may be effected in this way can be effected only in the way of slow, natural development. If anything, public credit cannot be brought up "by hand." Quite the contrary. "Hands off!" is the safest rule, which the numerous owners of patent rights upon "improvements of the public credit" should lay to heart.

To conclude. In consideration of all those causes which work against the public credit of the United States, that credit is not only as well, but much better, than could be expected. By the utter defeat of all buncombe, sensational financiering, and the most scrupulous adherence to the old adage that honesty is the best policy, it may, in the course of a decade or so, be raised very near to the level of the public credit of Prussia, but by such measures as have been proposed by Messrs. Boutwell and Sherman it never will.

HERMANN RASTER.

CHICAGO, February 20, 1870.

[The only point in controversy between us and Mr. Raster seems to be about the meaning of the phrase "stand lower," which we used in the article of Jan. 27. If it is improper to use it with regard to the credit of a country, except as meaning that the bonds of the country have to pay a higher interest—and on the Stock Exchange it probably would be—Mr. Raster has clearly convicted us of inaccuracy. But if it be lawful to use it, as we used it, in a general discussion of the public credit, as meaning that, everything considered, financial history, financial prospects, and tax-paying ability, the amount of interest a country pays on its bonds is not an accurate measure of its credit—that it may pay much less interest than another country, and yet possess really less credit—i. e., less of public confidence in its honesty, then all Mr. Raster can charge us with is want of perspicuity, and we are willing to admit that his failure to understand us, and the Illinois Staats-Zeitung finding it necessary to accuse us either of unscrupulousness or stupidity, makes it look very much as if this charge was well founded. We cited no figures in our article of Jan. 27. We tried to explain that, considering the resources and the financial history of the United States, and the exhibitions of the public temper with regard to the public debt, our Government really enjoyed less credit, or "stood lower" in the money markets of the world, than any borrowing powers except Turkey and Egypt, which pay about double as much interest. The advantage we enjoy over Austria, Italy, Spain, and Portugal in the amount of interest we pay does not represent, or anything like represent, the advantages we really possess over them in the elements of credit. These are: financial history—there is none better than that of the United States, though we admit it is marred in foreign eyes by the performances of some individual States; resources—meaning by this, ability to bear taxation, owing either to the largeness of profits on capital or the rapid increase in the number of tax-payers, or, to put it differently, in the area over which taxation is diffused; morale—meaning by this, popular comprehension of the conditions of public credit, popular appreciation of the importance of good credit, and popular conviction of sanctity of national engagements in the forum of conscience; and we affirm, without hesitation, that as regards this there is no other country in which the national credit rests on so sound a basis, and none in which the question whether the national debt ought to be paid punctually and honestly would, if put to a popular vote, meet with so favorable and intelligent a response. Looking to the political future of the civilized world, we think it must be admitted that this last is an important consideration for investors. Mr. Raster is, we believe, a reader of the Nation, and he therefore knows perfectly well that the talk about the value of material resources, apart from the state of the popular will, for the payment of national liabilities—the talk, for instance, of paying the debt out of the gold and silver mines—has afforded us as much amusement as it has him.

We gave at some length, in the article which he criticises, what we believe to be the reasons why the national credit does not stand higher, and, as these reasons are substantially the same as his, we need not go over them again. There is one, however, to which we attach a good deal of importance, which he does not mention; and that is the flightiness of the House on all questions, particularly international questions. The queer resolutions which it solemnly debates; its occasional lofty declarations of unwillingness to be bound by any of the received rules, either of public law or political economy; the exceeding deference shown by it now and then for the whimsicalities and absurdities of reformatory platforms, and the exalted places which downright rascals have in several instances managed to acquire in the national councils—all help to fill the mind of the foreign capitalist with doubts. He would not lend money to an individual madcap, no matter how rich he was, unless he could get some better security than his word, and the performances of some of our politicians have kept him continually asking himself whether the United States is not a national madcap, and whether we have such a thing as a policy steadily kept in view and acted on in national affairs. In short, the general behavior of its authorized representatives has a great deal to do with a people's credit. People in Europe are now beginning to understand Congress better, and hence our credit is improving. As to what the interest on a government debt can be, that, we take it, is determined by the proportion the supply of its securities bears to the demand for them, and this partly on the condition of other fields of investment and partly on its financial history. The greater portion of the United States debt is now held at home, it is true, but we deny that it need be; in fact, were the United States credit what it ought to be, it would not be held at home, because the Government, like other people, would be able to borrow at lower rates where capital was more plentiful. Chili put a five per cent. loan on the London market the other day at 83; it was all gone in a few hours, and now stands at a premium of nearly two per cent.; the reason is that this is a larger interest than the English can get at home; that enormous amounts of capital are lying idle, owing to the break-down of the joint-stock companies during the last three or four years, and the purchase of the telegraph lines by the Government; and that Chili has always paid her debts—and yet Chili is a terra incognita to most Englishmen. Similar success has attended a Russian loan for the same reasons. If six per cent. be, as Mr. Raster says, the lowest rate at which anybody ought to lend money to the United States, its credit is at this moment better than any nation's in the world; but, if we are right, there is no ought in the matter. If Englishmen and Dutchmen can be persuaded to take the bulk of our debt, they will take it on its own merits, and, barring political troubles, will fix the price for themselves, and New York would take its quotations of Government securities from whatever exchange they were most dealt in, as it does now.—Ed. Nation.]

IDEAS BY THE POUND.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It seems to me that the calm good sense and impartial carefulness which usually characterize the Nation are apt to disappear when the subject of free-trade or protection is under discussion. In the numbers for February 17 and 24, there are two articles on the projected tariff on books which seem to be based on an ex-parte statement, adopted without examining its accuracy, and heightened by editorial misapprehension. I presume, as a matter of course, that this arises from misunderstanding, but it indicates that, so far from looking into both sides of the question, you have not even given proper consideration to the one-sided statement on which you have relied.

On February 17 you assert that "the advocates of protection in book-making reappear with a demand for twenty-five cents per pound, pure and simple, whether a foreign work have been published ten, twenty, forty, or a hundred years ago." The importers' memorial, on which you base your article, confines itself to the endeavor now making to obtain a specific rate of twenty-five cents per pound on some books, and, without enquiry, you expand the assertion to include all books—apparently on the ground that it is safe to assume anything unreasonable of a protectionist. (a) Had you examined into the matter, as—you will allow me to say it—you ought to have done, you would have found that the tariff schedule asked for by the publishers, proposes twenty-five cents per pound only on English books published since 1849; other English books being put at five cents per pound; while books in foreign and dead languages, and work simported for public institutions, were put on the free-list. If such provisions could be adopted, it would be a source of rejoicing to every earnest student in the land. Had you further looked into the Tariff Bill recently reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, you would have seen that the committee, though not quite as liberal as the publishers, were still sufficiently so to render your statement utterly erroneous. They divide all books into two classes. Those less than twenty years old are subjected to twenty-five cents per pound; those more than twenty years old are placed on the free-list, together with books imported for private use and not for sale. You see how utterly groundless are your assertions, and the arguments based upon them.

In the same spirit—shall I say it?—of blind denunciation, in your article of Feb. 24, by a misconception of the same importers' memorial, you are led into the absurd statement that "the effect of such a measure would be to increase the cost of all imported books an average of about 96 per cent., those of general literature absolutely 162 per cent." Now I will do the importers the justice to say that they are not accountable for this. What they did say was that the rates of duty—not the cost of books—would be thus increased: a very different matter, and one which, whether true or not, does not warrant your scaring the reading public with such fearful visions of high-priced literature. (b)

Thus you will see that the proposed change in the tariff would not, as you state, "of course affect all foreign books;" it would not prevent, what you particularly desire, the accumulation of libraries by colleges—nay, it would encourage their formation as well as those by private students; and it is not true that "if some publishers should be the better of the change, others would be ruined." No one, in fact, would be ruined—unless, indeed, some Canada smugglers—and legitimate importing business, even in recent English books, could be continued prosperously, notwithstanding that the importers' memorial, with your endorsement, asserts that the proposed rates would be "prohibitory to the purchaser." (c)

A single authentic fact is more convincing than a thousand empty assertions, however confidently made, and I will therefore give you the figures, drawn from the importers' memorial, by which you can compare the working of the present and the proposed rates. They have selected, as the basis of their argument, a volume of Bohn's Libraries, and it is as favorable a one as they could have well chosen, those books being noted for their cheapness in comparison with the weight.

Bohn's Libraries retail here for $1 75 per volume. They are wholesaled here at $1 25 net, and in large lots are sold at $1 17. The importers assume that they cost to make in England one shilling sterling, that they are invoiced to this country at one shilling and ninepence, that their average weight is 1 lb. 4 oz., and that the charges of importation are 5 per cent. From these data a calculation is easy:

I. Under the existing tariff:

Cost one shilling, equivalent at present rate of exchange to	28½ cents.
Duty 25 per cent. on 1s. 9d., equal to 42 cents gold, currency 49½, is	12½ "
Expenses, 5 per cent.	02 "
Cost laid down in New York	43 "

Even assuming that the above are sold at a higher price than $1 17, we have here a profit of 74 cents, or 172 per cent.

II. Under proposed specific rate of 25 cents per lb.:

Cost of book as above, one shilling currency	28½ cents.
Duty 25 per cent. per lb. on 1¼ lb., equal to 31¼ cents gold, in currency	37 "
Expenses as before	02 "
Cost in New York at 25 per cent. per lb.	67½ "

Profit on sales at $1 17 is 49½ cents, or 73 per cent.

To enable you to appreciate this fully, I ought to call your attention to the tables in the importers' memorial, where you will observe that the rate of increase on the duty of Bohn's Libraries under the proposed specific rate is about double that of the average which they themselves state for all books, and that therefore it is as unfavorable an example as I could have selected for the comparison. (d)

To the ordinary mind, a profit of 73 per cent. would not be considered "ruinous." I know many American publishers who would content themselves with that rate during the term of their natural lives; but when it is proposed to increase the revenue and protect American industry by cutting down the profits of English publishers to that figure, a howl of objurgation is raised, and even the Nation forgets its placid impartiality, and is led into misstatements which expose it to the criticism of one of the humblest of its admirers,

A Publisher.

[The facts of the case are simply these, following the letter references above: (a) The importers' memorial which we discussed, so far from being an ex-parte statement, quoted verbatim and in connection every essential position in the argument for a specific duty which it undertook to refute, as any one may see who compares the two—the latter being bound up at the end of the pamphlet called "England's New Colony," which also contains the articles from Old and New, and from the Boston Advertiser, commented upon in our last number. The sixth paragraph of the protectionists reads as follows:

"VI. A rate of 25 cents per pound is the minimum that would effect these objects [of protection]."

As it is the only one which names the specific rate desired, and as this particular demand and no other was under consideration by the importers, whose counter-arguments we simply reproduced, "A Publisher's" remarks about "the tariff schedule asked for by the [other] publishers," and "the Tariff Bill recently reported by the Committee of Ways and Means," are, therefore, totally irrelevant. Moreover, the articles we attempted to refute (February 24) made no limitation of time in their demands, and all their arguments, if sound, applied to books of any age for which there is a demand here. An American book manufacturer is as much injured by an imported Shakespeare as an imported Tennyson. It is well to remember, too, that experience justifies us in regarding no demand of the high-tariff men as so extravagant as to be visionary. (b) We certainly were guilty of a slip of the pen in writing "cost" for "duty," while attempting to state concisely the points of the memorial already set forth in our literary note of February 17. (c) "Ruinous" and "prohibitory," sweeping as they are, may yet be relative terms, and were so used by us. In the case of any given book, it is "ruinous" to import it if there is to be no sale for it, or if the margin of profit is too small for the risk and expense of carrying on the business. On the other hand, in loading a book-buyer, as in loading a camel, excess consists in passing the limit of endurance, after which an ounce and a pound—ten per cent. and two hundred per cent.—become equally "prohibitory." (d) "A Publisher's" calculations are vitiated by the curious error of identifying, in the first item of each, the English manufacturer with the American importer. Even the one shilling which stands for the cost of making a volume of Bohn in England was assumed in the importers' memorial as a concession for the sake of argument; but in any event the importer must buy at not less than one shilling and ninepence. Adding the difference to "A Publisher's" tables (ninepence, at the present low rate of gold = 22½ cents), we have, in the first, 65½ cents instead of 43, as the cost to the American importer under the present ad valorem tariff, against which the memorial places 55 cents as the cost of making the book here, and still leaves a virtual protection of 10½ cents. In the second, the same substitution makes the importers' cost under a specific tariff 90 cents, and gives the manufacturer of the American reprint a protection of 35 cents. In both cases the importers' profits are large, though not so large as represented; but it should be remembered that in 1869 gold ranged from 130 to 140, and, taking the average at 136, we are informed that the shilling, including duties, freight, and insurance, have cost the importer 44 cents, and that a volume of Bohn at one shilling and ninepence has therefore cost him 77 cents under the ad valorem tariff of 25 per cent. If he sells it at $1 17, he makes 40 cents, or a gross profit of 34 per cent., instead of 73, as claimed by "A Publisher." We are further told by the heaviest importers of Bohn's Libraries in this country, that the volumes are not sold in London in the largest quantities at 50 per cent. discount—i. e., one shilling and ninepence for the volumes which retail at three shillings and sixpence. "Indeed, a discount even approaching 50 per cent. is only secured on books which the American importer can venture to buy in the largest quantities; while on purchases made in smaller numbers his gross profits do not average one-half those which the above figures show to be the extreme rate on Bohn and similar books." Moreover, the present exceptional profits, due to the decline in gold, even since the memorial was published, cannot but be temporary before a general lowering of prices. At the same time, the American publisher who can make at 55 cents a volume of Bohn, which he can retail for $1 75, and wholesale at $1 17, has a profit of over 50 per cent.—Ed. Nation.]

MR. PUMPELLY AND THE FOREIGNERS IN CHINA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It is with reluctance that I so soon again ask the favor of space in your paper and a hearing from your readers for matters concerning foreign residents in China. But so serious and sweeping a charge has been made against the China communities, by a writer of some reputation, upon the very point on which I have declared them to be worthy of regard and praise, that I feel compelled to say something in disproof.

Mr. Raphael Pumpelly, in his book of travels in China and Japan, on pages 205 and 206 relates, as an incident happening to himself, that he was on board a Shanghae steamer on a pleasure excursion when the captain wilfully ran down a Chinese boat, destroying three lives certainly, and probably four, without compunction on his own part, and without causing even a momentary sensation among the residents who formed the pleasure party on board. He continues as follows: "It has long been the practice of foreign vessels to run into and sink any junks or boats that might be in their way, no matter how crowded with passengers these might be; and probably scarcely a day passsed without a boat being thus sunk in Chinese waters." . . . "After such an occurrence, I was not surprised to see foreigners walking through crowded streets and incessantly belaboring the heads of men, women, and children with heavy walking-sticks to open a path." And again, at page 344, he says, speaking of the state of things in 1863: "Wholesale murder was committed almost daily at the ports, where it was a common occurrence for steamers and sailing vessels to run into and sink dilatory boats and junks, often crowded with passengers. Young clerks drove rapidly through crowded streets, without stopping to care for the women and children run over by their carriages, and men of position made their way through thronged thoroughfares by belaboring the heads of the populace with heavy walking-sticks."

It seems well-nigh incredible that an amiable man of unusual intelligence and education could misrepresent a whole community in such a reckless manner, and as I rewrite the words I can scarcely believe they are Mr. Pumpelly's. I emphatically deny, on behalf of the China communities, all the assertions and statements above quoted, except the main incident. I except that because Mr. Pumpelly declares he saw the boat sunk with his own eyes, but also there I deny that it was done voluntarily on the part of the captain, or without causing emotion and regret to the residents who happened to be on board. I have learned from Mr. Pumpelly that the steamer was the American steamer Surprise, and the commander a Capt. Osborne, an American. The Surprise belonged to a company of which I was the manager. I therefore knew Capt. Osborne very well, and know that he was an exceptionally humane man, who owed his early preferment from mate to captaincy to his popularity with the Chinese.

The rules of the company which owned the Surprise have always been most stringent upon the point of collisions with Chinese boats, requiring captains to give way to them, and it is a notorious fact in China that Chinese boats, practising upon the consideration shown them, cross the bows of steamers unnecessarily, paying no attention to shouts and signals. Moreover, Mr. George F. Seward was at that time, as now, the American Consul at Shanghae, and he has so resolutely and persistently defended and protected the Chinese in all such cases, that he has obtained the reputation in China of leaning to the Chinese side—a reputation he lately confirmed by declaring in a decision on a collision case that he would award to the Chinese even when at fault, if the foreign navigator had unnecessarily passed so near the native craft as to cause her steersman to lose his presence of mind. Therefore, without being able to speak from personal knowledge or recollection, I am entirely confident that while Mr. Pumpelly's eyes saw the collision and the destruction of the boat, his imagination created the details, and his ignorance of nautical matters prevented his seeing that, owing to some peculiar circumstances of tide or position of other vessels, the collision could not be avoided without greater loss of life in some other direction.

As to the deductions, they are worse even as misrepresentations than the incident itself. Long before the period of which Mr. Pumpelly writes, the consular establishments of the United States were fully organized, as the English had been from the date of the Treaty of 1842, and the Consuls have been especially at pains to inform the Chinese authorities of their readiness to give strict justice to Chinese claimants in collision cases, for collisions of course occur in such crowded waters. I think there is no old resident of China, living at home, be he merchant or official, who will not join in denial of Mr. Pumpelly's wholesale declaration.

As to foreigners "incessantly belaboring the heads of men, women, and children with heavy walking-sticks to open a path," I again am at a loss to understand how these words can be Mr. Pumpelly's.

The residents in China are the sons and brothers of the merchants of London and Manchester, of New York and Boston. Their friends know what they were before they went to China, they see what they are when they return. Are there any evidences in their conduct or character of extreme brutality? It must be remembered that there is scarcely any other class of foreigners in China but the educated class. All the laborious details of trade are performed by the Chinese, and when Mr. Pumpelly speaks of residents, he speaks of those who come directly from the mercantile circles of England and America, and in many, if not the majority, of cases, from the very best circles. Also, he speaks of residents of position committing these enormities.

Moreover, Mr. Pumpelly, in making his case, forgets the character of the Chinese. He forgets they are not slavish. No man, be he prince or peasant, foreigner or Chinese, could belabor the throng in a Chinese street with impunity. I was walking once in the streets of Shanghae with an author of many books of travels, then recently from Egypt, and accustomed to the extreme servility of the Arab sailors and servants. He squared his shoulders in the narrow streets, expecting the common people to give way, and soon got the reward of his superciliousness in a twister from the heavier shoulder of a common coolie that sent him flat against a shop-front. He retaliated in his book, when he wrote one, by describing the common Chinese as rude boors and far inferior to the Egyptians, but any of us could have told him that that was what he had to expect, if himself rude in a Chinese street.

I lived seventeen years in China and never saw such a sight as Mr. Pumpelly describes as of constant occurrence, nor do I believe that young clerks there have ever driven over women and children with or without impunity. There is one fact patent to all comers to the ports of China—that in every one, from Canton to Newchwang, the population immediately about the foreign settlement is friendly to foreigners. Enmity to them only exists in places which they do not frequent. As this friendliness cannot arise from self-interest, since not one in one hundred has any advantage from, or connection with, the foreigner, there is but one interpretation to be drawn from this unquestionable fact, and that is, that the foreign residents are orderly and respectable in their manner of life, and considerate of their Chinese neighbors. I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

Edward Cunningham.

Boston, Feb. 22, 1870.

THE RATIFICATION OF THE AMENDMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I have great respect for the opinion of the Nation, but cannot concur in the conclusions reached in the article on the Fifteenth Amendment in your issue of the 10th inst. I have neither the leisure nor the information requisite for a full discussion of the interesting question which has arisen in regard to the revocation of ratifications. But if you will permit me to make a single suggestion I will do so.

It seems to me that the natural and common-sense interpretation of the Constitution (Art. V.) would be that a proposed amendment is to become a part of the Constitution by the concurrent assent of three-fourths of the States, given in the manner therein prescribed.

The words are: ". . . shall be valid . . as a part of this Constitution, when ratified by . . . three-fourths of the several States."

The word ratify means, according to Worcester (the only authority at hand as I write, I take the first two synonyms given), "to approve and sanction," "to make valid." The latter is evidently not the sense in which the word "ratified" is here used. A single State may ratify, but cannot make valid. The other meaning is the one doubtless intended. If so, the language used means that a proposed amendment shall be valid when approved and sanctioned by three-fourths of the States. In other words, that three-fourths of the States must unite in their approval.

Let us see what would be the consequences of a different construction. Suppose under the pressure of a passing excitement some proposed amendment (objectionable in its nature) should receive the assent of three-eighths of the States only. Imagine that a few years later, these States having seen the impropriety of the amendment and withdrawn their approval, a different three-eighths of the States, whose interest it might in the meanwhile have become to enact this iniquitous measure, should ratify the still pending but almost forgotten amendment. The Constitution would thus be changed against the wishes of a majority of the States. And, what would be still worse, the mischief could not be undone. No new amendment could be adopted against the wishes of this last three-eighths of the States. Indeed, a portion of this minority would be equally powerful to continue in force the change in the fundamental law thus foisted by the minority upon the majority.

Nor is this suggestion chimerical. One can easily imagine a change in the Constitution which would make the party in power absolute, failing for want of the assent of three-fourths of the States, and made available a few years later by another party or section into whose hands the balance of power may have passed in the interval. May there not be now some such slumbering amendment waiting to be awakened into life by your argument and its consequences?

Every abortive proposed amendment is and will be a masked battery which we cannot destroy, and our future will soon be filled with these hidden dangers—amendments that were never alive, that cannot be killed, capable of a future life, indestructible, terrible.

Yours, very respectfully,

R. Thomas.

Baltimore, Md., Feb. 17, 1870.

THE ST. THOMAS BARGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: If it is not an unpardonable sin to differ from the Nation in its political views, we trust a little space may be granted to hear the other side of the St. Thomas question. We are unable to see that the position of the Government in regard to the purchase of this island is "discreditable," and we question the fact that it is "acknowledged on all hands that we want the island as a naval station." It was well known to Denmark and all other nations that the consent of the Senate was requisite to complete any such transfer, and we trust that this consent will never be given, for we are at a loss to understand why its acquisition is so pertinaciously demanded. In all future wars, the fleets of the hostile nations will undoubtedly be moved by steam power, and as it is our policy in times of peace to keep as few vessels in commission as possible, and as it requires many months to fit out iron-clads, the island would certainly be wrested from us before we could put on our armor; and we hold that the annexation of any island is the poorest possible policy. Besides which, the rapid movement of fast steamers brings St. Thomas within two or three days of our Southern navy-yards, where depots of coal would not fall into an enemy's hands, and a few tons of coal, more or less, consumed in two or three days, would detract but little from a war steamer's efficiency or the length of her cruise.

But there is another view of this question which should enlist the sagacious and able support of the Nation in opposition to the acquisition of the island of St. Thomas as well as that of St. Domingo, for many of the arguments of the Nation used in opposition to the acquisition of the latter will apply to the former. The acquisition of any territory, especially of distant islands or colonies, is so important a measure and may lead to such consequences, that it should if possible have the sanction of all the States, or at least of a majority of both Houses of Congress, and not be left to the management of a Secretary of State who, it is claimed, has the power to bind the whole country to a bad bargain, and who may be desirous at any cost to the country to signalize his reign by the annexation of territory, however undesirable or difficult to defend. At present, the only check to this course is the consent of the Senate, and if Denmark cannot obtain it there are doubtless good reasons, and she has no cause of complaint. E. W.

Boston, Feb. 10, 1870.

[As a general rule, it is an unpardonable sin to differ from the Nation, but we sometimes wink at it, as in the present case. As to the value of St. Thomas as a naval station, we refer "E. W." to Admiral Porter. As to the inexpediency of allowing the Secretary of State to acquire territory, either with or without the consent of the Senate, we cordially agree with "E. W.;" but until there is a change made, the constitutional relations of the Executive to the Senate should not be used as a trap to catch innocent foreigners in. If anybody is responsible for William H. Seward, it is the people who bred him and put him in office, and not the Danes; and if, both being innocent parties, one has to lose something through his misconduct, it is the United States and not Denmark—particularly as the Senate stood by and watched him bargaining without warning his unhappy dupe.—Ed. Nation.]

RELIGION AMONG THE GERMANS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Permit me likewise to contribute a reply to your enquiry in reference to the condition of religious thought among the Americanized Germans. The occasion for that enquiry was, I believe, a notice on your part of a discussion in the English papers concerning the present status of religion in Germany, called forth by the Berlin correspondent of the London Times. The tendency of religious ideas among the educated Germans in America may be assumed to approach to—if it is not quite the same as—that of their educated countrymen abroad; and your query should be modified so as to apply to them only, for the German-Americans as such do not constitute a distinct class. They, the educated German-Americans, have, however, in the meantime, obtained an able, learned, and authoritative spokesman, Judge Stallo, of Cincinnati, whose really brilliant argument before the Superior Court of that city in defence of the Board of Education for prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the Public Schools, may be considered fairly to present their views; and enquirers seeking enlightenment on this head will there find it.

But this has reference merely to the educated class of our German fellow-citizens. The communication promised you by Dr. von Holst will, no doubt, throw light also on the state of religious affairs among the German masses in this country. Very respectfully, R. D.

New York, February 19, 1870.

"THE DEAD SEA APES."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It ought to be recorded among the curiosities of literature that two of our literary magazines have blundered—and dogmatically at that—over Mr. Carlyle's phrase, "Liturgy of Dead Sea Apes," the terms in which he describes "Spiritualism." Of Mr. Carlyle's early works, none made so profound an impression as did his "Past and Present." It is his political profession of faith, and rallied a host of the young men of the time around his standard. Mr. Hughes reflects this general fact by a specific instance in his "Tom Brown at Oxford," in which the hero and his friend Hardy find in it the solution, in some sort, of all their political puzzles. Now, the holy apologue of Moses's visit to the dwellers by the Dead Sea, who chattered and grinned themselves into apes, out of contempt for the prophet and for all reality, is told in "Past and Present." The editors of the Galaxy and of Lippincott's Magazine will find it in the "Past and Present" (Emerson's Boston edition, 1843), on pages 152-3, and will probably arrive at the conviction that Carlyle did not write "Liturgy of Dead Sea Apples," nor any other nonsense. We, however, notice that in the Penn Monthly for February this mistake is corrected, and the quotation from Carlyle is given in full in the article entitled "Notable Letters to Philadelphia." ALTONIENSIS.

PHILADELPHIA, February 17, 1870.

MUSIC IN PHILADELPHIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Allow me to add to your list of musical enterprises in Philadelphia a mention of the series of "Parlor Concerts," for the performance of strictly classical music, by a string quartette club, under the direction of Miss Jackson, pianiste.

Begun twenty years ago, as private entertainments at the residences of twenty subscribers, the receipts all devoted to the improvement of the performances, these concerts (still under the same rule) have for the last two seasons been given in a public hall to growing audiences. Through Madame Seiler (known in musical circles from her work on "The Voice in Singing") and the composer David, Miss Jackson was enabled to secure in Germany, in 1868, the services of Mr. G. Guhlemann, a graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory, as conductor.

We are modest, you know, in the presence of New York, but the degree of proficiency to which he has brought the quintette is said by competent judges to be such that even Mr. Thomas's orchestra surpasses it in numbers only. And in the interest of musical art everywhere, it may not be unpleasing to add that it is planned that equality in this particular, also, shall be duly reached. Z——.

PHILADELPHIA, February 14, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE death of Mr. J. Wesley Harper has followed closely upon that of his lamented brother, the founder of the house which bears their name, causing a still further loosening of the lifelong partnership. He was the third of the four brothers, and, like each of the rest, had a distinct aptitude to contribute to the common business of publishing. His was the literary department, and he brought to it, it is said, besides sound judgment and critical acumen, more than ordinary linguistic knowledge. He died at an age—sixty-nine years—not too great for further activity, except for bodily debility, aggravated, no doubt, by the near bereavement he had sustained.

— Mr. James B. Greenough, an instructor in Harvard University, has recently written a brief treatise on the Latin Subjunctive, which will be welcomed by teachers of Latin and by students of linguistics. It is an attempt to explain all the uses of the subjunctive from what is suggested as its probable origin, by an examination of its forms in the different Indo-European languages. The purely grammatical analyses which have been made by those who were simply classical scholars have produced no better definition than that it is "the mood of subjective conception," or of "ideas less definite than the infinitive." Students of linguistics, on the other hand, have, for their part, hardly done more than busy themselves with the forms alone. Each investigation has gone on independently of the other. The pamphlet before us concerns itself with both matter and form, and endeavors to show "that all the uses of the subjunctive can be accounted for naturally upon the supposition that the mood was originally future in its meaning, . . . a supposition which is not inconsistent with its formal origin so far as that is known." This hypothesis Mr. Greenough maintains with much ingenuity, and he thoroughly discusses from this point of view the various uses of the subjunctive. Some of his arguments are not so clear as others, and will probably be attacked; but this is the less to be regretted because it is only by tentative work that so difficult a matter can be put in the way of settlement. Messrs. Sever & Francis publish the essay—or rather sell it, for it is not published.

— Social science in Philadelphia is to be cultivated by a society lately formed in affiliation with the American Association, and composed of some of the most intelligent, respected, and active citizens. Their deliberations will be assisted by the course of lectures at the University of Pennsylvania now being delivered by Prof. J. H. McIlvaine, from the chair founded by Mr. Stephen Colwell in behalf of political economy and social science, and at which the public attendance is surprisingly large, even considering that no fees are exacted. If the interest excited by these ten lectures endures till the fall, it will be an excellent preparation for the General Meeting which the American Association contemplates holding this year, probably in October, in Philadelphia. The interval will, doubtless, not go unimproved by the local society. In Boston, the Lowell lectures, under the auspices of the General Association, have already begun with a paper from Mr. C. C. Perkins on art and art museums, followed by one from Mr. F. L. Olmsted on public parks. Though coming at the end of the season, when the public have already been surfeited with half a dozen rival lecture courses, these on social science were so eagerly anticipated that the tickets of admission (which are always given away freely in the order of application) were all taken up in less than an hour.

— So far as our knowledge goes, no jurist, native or foreign, has expressed his concurrence, quâ jurist, with the legal doctrines laid down by Mr. Sumner in his speech on the Alabama case. M. Rolin-Jaequemyns, a Belgian advocate, and the principal editor of the Revue de Droit International, has, however, taken his part, in a vague way, by apologizing for his view of the responsibility of England for the issue of the belligerency proclamation, and maintaining the propriety of submitting the question of the legitimacy of the proclamation to arbitration, because although, he says, it be a good rule that each nation ought to accept what passes outside of its frontier as one accepts the operation of a law of nature, nevertheless it may, by proclaiming as existing a situation which really does not exist, by recognizing, for instance, as complete what is really incomplete, or as general what is only local, and thus provoking or authorizing facts which would only be legitimate if the bases of the proclamation were true, do injury indirectly which it cannot do directly. It is not sufficient, he says, to ask were the Southern States belligerent or not, but were they as much belligerent as they were said to be. In other words, there are degrees of armed contention—some of which call for recognition, and others do not. This does not help the matter very much, however, as everybody agrees with M. Rolin-Jaequemyns and Mr. Sumner thus far; where Mr. Sumner gets into controversy is when he raises the question who is to decide when the conflict has reached such proportions as to call for recognition. The usage of international law leaves it to the discretion of each country, subject to war with the offended party in case the discretion is abused. The occasion of M. Rolin-Jaequemyns' remarks is the appearance of a brochure from the pen of M. Eperson, the professor of international law at the University of Pavia, in which he assails Mr. Sumner's views on all points. M. Rolin-Jaequemyns agrees with M. Eperson in repudiating the doctrine of consequential damages, which is found laid down with great explicitness in Mr. Sumner's speech under the head of "The Rule of Damages," and which he fortifies by appeals to the Roman law, the French law, and the law of nuisance, as defined by Blackstone's Commentaries, which he declares "is applicable in the case." Mr. Sumner has always replied to the criticisms on this rule of his by denying stoutly that he made any "claim" under it. M. Rolin-Jaequemyns defends him on the same ground. But then it was not Mr. Sumner's business to make claims. He undertook to furnish the law on which the claim should be based, and by which the amount claimed, if claim were made, should be ascertained, and he declared that his rule was "applicable in the case;" moreover, he presented this "rule" as one of his reasons for rejecting a treaty which proposed to provide simply for the payment of direct damages. We have received a new edition of the speech, just published in Boston, with a preface from the gentleman who has brought it out. We have nothing to add by way of criticism to what we have already frequently said about it. Its effect as an expression of feeling is greatly diminished by the badness of its law and the extravagance of its language.

— One is apt to think oftener of the stones of Venice than of what they rest upon, or of the causes which led to the selection of so singular a site for a city. But a little reflection shows us that Venice stands at one end of a chain of which the pile-dwellings of the pre-historic age, in all parts of the world, constitute the other. Nor need we go so far back to find this latter end when it is still exhibited in the habitations of many savage tribes, like the Papuans of Borneo. Their crazy sheds are the prototypes of the palaces of the Grand Canal, whose foundations are among the most interesting but rarest sights of the beautiful city. How visible they once were may be inferred from the naming of Venezuela—"lesser Venice"—by Vespucius, because of the native pile-dwellings of the coast which he visited. These suggestions, with a great deal of information, historical and critical, may be found in the article "Ueber Pfahlbauten," by R. Hartmann, with which the latest number of the Zeitschrift für Ethnologie (Vol. II., No. 1) opens. Two accompanying plates represent actual and supposed pile dwellings, single and in groups, and mark the rude beginnings of architecture. The other principal article, by Franz Engel, discusses the palm-tree in its manifold relations to the human race; and there are the customary miscellany and book reviews.

—The present career of Italy, in many ways, runs parallel to our own. The kingdom has, like this republic, its national debt—the price of liberty—its temptation to repudiate, its disordered finances, its lack of a sound and settled policy of taxation and economy. It cuts down, or proposes to cut down, the salaries of judges, while it tolerates a franking privilege like that under which our postal service groans. One of its problems is the relation of religion to the public schools; another is compulsory education. The latter is now engaging the attention of a special committee appointed by Minister Correnti, and has also been under discussion before the Società Pedagogica Italiana, in Milan. The question is complicated by the present low condition of the schools to which it is proposed to force parents to send their children, since it is felt that penalties for non-compliance would be quite of place in given circumstances. One measure suggested, is to deal vigorously with the unlettered conscripts, as the Government can if it chooses. At a recent session of the above-named society, the president calculated that one in six of the population, or four millions of both sexes, were of school-age, while the actual number of scholars is scarcely a million and a half; only Piedmont and the Valtellina furnishing their quota. He also stated that there were still in Italy over seven thousand communes, or parts of communes, which had neither male nor female schools; and that to educate all the four million children would require a total outlay of 57,000,000 francs, in place of the 16,000,000 now actually spent; thus raising the tax of instruction to 2·36 francs per caput.

— These figures are confirmed by the official report of the Italian post-office for 1868, the last rendered. It appears that while, for the same year, the postal revenue of Great Britain was in the ratio of 3·73 francs per caput; of France, 2·22; of Switzerland, 1·80; and of Belgium, 1·39; in Italy it was but 0·64. As compared with the preceding year, there was a decided increase in the number of letters transmitted; and yet, out of the sixty-eight provinces of the kingdom, twenty-six showed a diminished correspondence. Dividing, again, these provinces into five classes, according as they contributed to the revenue an average between 80 per cent. and 30 per cent., the report exhibits but 10 belonging to the former (all, with exception of Naples, in Upper Italy), while 14 belong to the latter, and are all, save Belluno, in Lower Italy. Nevertheless, the review, as a whole, is favorable to the progress of enlightenment, and the railroads are proving powerful agencies in cheapening the service and extending it to the most benighted districts. The money-order and registered-letter departments are highly efficient and fully employed, and the post has just been ordered to transmit telegraphic despatches by letter to the station nearest the office of mailing. Finally, while the postal revenue has increased by one-fourth since 1863, the expenses have been reduced by a fourth, and the past year probably showed, for the first time, a balance to the profit of the Treasury.

—There died in Paris on the 21st of January, at the age of fifty-eight, a socialistic reformer and revolutionist, who, ten years ago, had a great part in liberalizing his countrymen, the Russians. Alexander Hertzen was a native of Moscow, son of a wealthy and noble proprietor, Captain Yakoleff, and of a German mother whose name he bore. He applied himself early to philosophy and natural science, with the previous advantage of a training from nurses and tutors in the French, German, English, and Italian languages. He had already been twice exiled temporarily for his liberal opinions to Viatka and Novgorod, when in 1848 a tale he had written for a periodical, called "Duty before Everything," was suppressed by the censorship, and, seeing that free thought was not to be tolerated, he abandoned his country and resided ever after in foreign parts—in Geneva, Paris, and longest of all in London. There he edited the Severnaya Zvezda ("Polar Star"), with a fortnightly supplement, the Kolokol ("The Bell"), which no barriers or police could keep out of Russia, where thousands of copies were regularly circulated, and exerted a powerful influence adverse to the Government. He retained the confidence of the Russian liberals till 1862–63, when his espousal of the Polish cause upon the eve of the last insurrection caused him to be regarded as a traitor—enemy no longer of despotism, but of his native land. After that his power declined, and the revolution from above in Russia, inaugurated by emancipation, deprived him of his occupation. Those who knew him in London speak of him with warm affection. He is said to have believed that Russia was to profit by the political and social experience of Western Europe, and to reach the same or even a higher development without solving afresh the problems bequeathed from the Middle Ages: a faith which is easy to hold and not so difficult to defend. Hertzen's published works were at first in German and French, afterwards in Russian for Russian readers exclusively. They are: "Letter on the Study of Nature" (in Russian), St. Petersburg, 1842; "Kto Vinovat" (Whose Fault is it?), a novel depicting Russian society with fidelity, St. Petersburg, 1847; "Letters from France and Italy," 1850; "Du Développement des Idées Révolutionnaires en Russie," Paris, 1854; "Récits interrompus," London, 1854; "My Exile" (in English), London, 1855; "Vom andern Ufer," Hamburg.

FITZ JOHN PORTER'S CASE.*

An old controversy has been revived in a new form by the attempt of Fitz John Porter to be relieved from the disabilities imposed on him by sentence of a general court-martial. People regard the effort with various degrees of favor, according to their old impressions, if these have not been changed by new political bias. In a day of amnesty and conciliation, and of hushing up of past discordances, it appears to be thought by some that it is not worth while to withhold pardon from one offender among many. It is argued, again, that Porter's offence was rank only to the sense of those who opposed the administration of McClellan; that political hostility discovered in Porter's conduct a baseness not to be found in it by the impartial. The disgrace of Porter, it is claimed, was a thing procured by the Government for effect, as well as for a sop to Pope, whom the Government had hoped might supersede McClellan, but who had to be relieved from command, so loud was the clamor against him.

On the other hand, there are plenty of people, like the author of the pamphlet named below, who assert angrily that Pope's was in plan a very fine campaign, wholly marred in execution by Porter, who, stirred up by hatred for Pope and friendship for McClellan, committed open treason on the field. It is asserted that the court-martial on Porter would have sentenced him to death had it not been for an intimation they somehow received that President Lincoln would not approve.

It seems to us that the reader's opinion of Fitz John Porter's guilt depends on the feelings with which he reads the report of Pope or the report of McClellan. It is McClellan versus Pope, an old controversy, as we said, and it cannot be expected that, from either side, the case of Porter should be presented solely on its own merits. Naturally, it is put in a light reflected from partisanship. On one side, his conduct is condemned, and, on the other, excused, on the supposed condition of his mind while under Pope's command.

Porter should, undoubtedly, now be judged wholly on his military record. But even in those who look at his conduct from a military point of view, there is a great confusion of what he did with what influenced him. It is useless to bring into the discussion of Porter's guilt or innocence all the operations of Pope's campaign. Much that is hotly disputed has nothing to do with the matter. Pope's plan of campaign may have been brilliant; Porter may have been bitterly hostile to Pope; a great force of the enemy may, or may not, have been in Porter's front when he withdrew his troops—all this but needlessly burdens the simple questions: Did he wilfully disobey the orders of his superior officer; did he shamefully cast aside his duty as a soldier, and permit comrades in arms to struggle in a doubtful battle while he looked on and took no part in it, though positively ordered to attack the enemy? It may be that Porter had it in his heart not to support Pope, but to ruin his campaign if he could; but there is nothing to prove it. There is ample evidence of the position of Pope's and the enemy's forces, and of Porter's orders for the part he was to play; and this proof ought to be examined if a just verdict is to be given.

The time and the general features of the field are well known and do not need to be recounted. It is enough for our purposes to remember that Stonewall Jackson, with a large force, had recklessly thrown himself in Pope's rear by a flank movement through Thoroughfare Gap, while Pope held the country further south towards the Rappahannock. Learning of this movement of Jackson, and knowing him to be isolated from Lee's main army, Pope attempted to destroy his detachment before any aid could reach him. Fitz John Porter, in command of the fifth corps of McClellan's army, had reinforced Pope, and it is not disputed that he was subject to Pope's orders. About dark of the 27th of August, 1862, Pope sent instructions to Porter, who was at Warrenton Junction, to move his corps forward at one o'clock in the night towards Bristow Station, on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, which point he was directed to gain by daylight of the 28th. Porter did not obey this order, did not march in the night, and did not reach Bristow Station until several hours after the time set for his arrival there. Later in the day, he was ordered to move to Manassas Junction without delay; and he did not obey this order. His command lay in camp at Bristow Station all that night. Soon after five o'clock on the morning of the 29th inst., he received orders to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day. The order added: "It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning; a severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary." This despatch found Porter still at Bristow Station. When he had gained Manassas Junction, he was instructed to turn towards Gainesville. Moving on in pursuance of this order, he came within sight and sound of a heavy engagement between some of Pope's forces and Stonewall Jackson's command. He went quite near to the battle-field with his corps, but did not allow his men to engage the enemy. On the contrary, after a short halt, he began to retrace his steps towards Manassas. At 4.30 P.M., an order was sent to him: "Push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear." He did not obey this order, and did not attack or move upon the enemy that afternoon or night.

* "General Pope's Virginia Campaign of 1862. By Lewis Este Mills." Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1870.

There is much more in evidence to mark the spirit of insubordination that seemed to govern Porter; but it is enough that these facts were established before the court-martial by which he was tried and sentenced. It was for the court to consider what motive he had in his flagrant disobedience of orders, and perhaps thus to estimate the gravity of his offence. Whatever influence they may have thought at work with him, and however true it may be that they wished to condemn him to death, it seems to us fair that Porter's appeal should now be considered as if the sentence passed on him had been the heaviest that could be imposed. He has the right to assume everything in his favor that the sentence of the court implies. But as a servant of the Government, charged with an important command, we have seen how he kept his trust. It has been proved that when he had positive orders, and no discretion, he disobeyed his superior officer in the face of the enemy; delayed his march on trivial pretexts, and showed neither zeal nor willingness to keep pace with the army of which his corps was a part. When a sanguinary battle was raging immediately in his front, he drew back from it without orders, lending no aid to his hard-pressed fellow-soldiers on the field. And further, when positively ordered to attack the enemy at once, he failed to do so, and made no movement for that purpose.

The consequences of these acts it is not necessary to trace or estimate. They are in themselves an overwhelming condemnation. No military tribunal could pass them by; all soldiers, sitting on a court or not, must pronounce them worthy of prompt and heavy punishment. By a new and thorough examination of the testimony, we are led to the conviction that Porter shamefully and dishonorably violated his trust, and we hope that he will not be reinstated in the army, that his disabilities will not be removed, and that he will not be recognized as a person having any claim whatever to the clemency of the Government.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

THE Galaxy for March is a typical number of this magazine, for most of it has current interest, none of it is to be called heavy—and, if the truth is to be told, none of it weighty—some little of it is feeble, a little of it is good, its department of fiction is well cared for, and its poetry is mostly poorish. Mr. Robert Weeks's poem of "Medusa" is much the best, the last five verses being, in fact, absolutely good. Of the first two, however, each ends in a singularly flat way—the second with a piece of colloquial slang—little as the writer means it; and the other with what appears like an insistence on the poet's first assertion which affects one's sense of the ludicrous—far as that, too, was from the writer's thoughts. This would not be worth saying in the case of most magazine poetry; but here the faults hurt a pleasing poem; and they are avoidable faults, if one remembers that striving for simplicity of expression is right; but that simplicity of expression without great value in the thought makes of poetry something particularly bad, there being in this matter a difference practically infinite between poetry and prose. In the latter mere simplicity of expression—even altogether regardless of the thought—being almost to be praised as a merit. But as for poetry, why not say that in that there is no manner which is to be praised if the matter, too, is not to be praised? And this for the reason that with a man's simplicity of manner in prose we may rightly be pleased as revealing an estimable cast of mind; but that in poetry, if he would work well and have praise, he must work as an artist, and, let his mere manner be what it will, must somehow produce something which has in itself an independent objective value and intrinsic beauty. "The Lost Bird" and "Glimpses into a Portrait Gallery" are poems by Mr. E. R. Sill and Mr. George Calvert respectively, Mr. Sill's being the better, but both going to prove, if Messrs. Sheldon & Co., the publishers, and the Messrs. Church, the editors, are anointed bards, that the poets are not yet trustworthy critics of poetry.

"Hand to Hand" is by Mrs. Rebecca Harding Davis, who apparently does not yet believe that human nature also has heights and depths in it, and who still goes on undermining the moral nature of her youthful readers by preaching to them all kinds of distortions and diseases of motive and action. There is a story told of an Austrian princess in the Empress Queen's day who, to relieve the intolerable tedium of life in her mother's rigid court, suffered an ulcer to grow and spread untended on her cheek, that she might so, if nohow else, get some occupation for her mind. Her study of morbid growths was, however, enforced, we may say, and we may imagine that, had wholesome natural work been possible for her, she would have permitted herself to get well. As it was, we do not read that she, directly or indirectly, inculcated on others the breeding of disease, nor set up suppuration as a function of healthy tissues. Something very like this, though, is what Mrs. Davis is always doing, and there is no writer for the periodical press of an unhealthier influence or a much more reprehensible method than hers. It is the less easy to be pleased with her that she is so clever. Another story—if it is to be a story—that figures in this month's Galaxy is "Letters from Havana," which is pleasant reading and good writing, and has the air of having been done upon the spot; and another is Mr. Trollope's "Panjandrum," which comes to an end.

"The Clown's Real Pigling" is by Mr. Grant White, and is an attack on the realism of the stage of to-day—an attack in making which Mr. White will have the sympathy of all instructed playgoers. The only pleasure one gets in looking at the vaunted representations of great dramas "put upon the stage in a manner far surpassing former revivals of them," is that after all, when we do get an actor who really has education and ability, this machinery and scenery and costuming will speedily disappear; or that when we do get such an actor it will make but little difference to the spectator whether the scenery and machinery are actually there or not. We have this other comfort too, if but a sorry one, that in the severe competition with the stage-carpenter and upholsterer and scene-painter sham geniuses are reduced to their proper place, and seem what they truly are. The present application of realism to great plays, if it teaches managers a way of tricking the public with poor players, at least enables the spectator to overhaul to good purpose his estimate of players that have been passing for good or more than good. Mr. White has something to say about Fechter which we take to be good criticism, and which is at all events worth hearing, he being a dramatic critic of experience. Other miscellaneous articles in this number of the Galaxy are Mr. Justin McCarthy's gossip about the Prince of Wales; a readable description of life in the University of Cambridge, England; "A Morning at Sarony's," by somebody who talks pleasantly about the photographer who is supposed to be at the head of his brethren in this country; and another instalment of "Ten Years at Rome." It might be well if some authority were to settle what is the exact relation of a so-called "religious house" to the house, say, of a private gentleman, so far as concerns the right of a visitor to come away after asking and receiving hospitality, and tell what he has been able to discover about the personal habits of his hosts. A man is enrolled as a brother in a monastery, sees fit to leave it for the life of the world, and throwing off his chains goes out and tells whosoever cares to hear, how he and his brethren used to live. That would seem to be not very improper. He relates that of which he was a part, and, so to speak, talks of himself, as he has a right. But having come out of (say) a Romanist monastery he goes to a company of Protestants who live together in a certain way and is made a privileged guest. Is he to come away then and tell the public how long the head of the house wears his undershirt without changing it? This is a question in the casuistry of the minor morals which it would be well, we should say, if the writer of "Ten Years in Rome" would get some one to settle for him.

The Atlantic opens with an instructive article "In Behalf of the Birds," by their friend, Mr. Thomas Brewer, who a year since defended the crow against the universal reprobation of bucolical mankind in America. An article such as the agricultural papers would copy, dealing by their names with our common American birds, and stating specifically what harm they do to the farmer and what counterbalancing or overbalancing good, would probably be of more service to Mr. Brewer's protégés than articles like that before us. To prevent the honest rustic from saying that he "knows better" when he is told that birds eat more grubs and insects than corn, it is necessary to cut open in his presence an individual, or more, of each species in American ornithology and show him the contents of the bird's crop. But this article, with its account of European enactments for the protection of birds, would be useful reading for State legislatures. The Solons at the State House in Boston brought in a bill last year, Mr. Brewer tells us, which went out of its way to invite the destruction of the eggs of a bird which never since the discovery of America has laid an egg in Massachusetts.

"The Military Ball at Goulacaska" is an interesting and very probably true and correct sketch of an amusing little episode in military life in Louisiana during the late war; "The Robbery of the Blue River Bank" is a short story of the "exciting" kind, fairly well told, and with here and there a truthful touch, showing observation; "Adventurers and Adventuresses in New York" is padding of the most unblushing sort, and so is "The Minor Theatres of London;" but both are redeemed by "Captain Ben's Choice" and "A Romance of Real Life"—the latter christened with a want of effectiveness that would make a veteran "magazinist" groan. "Captain Ben's Choice" is almost perfection in its way. One hopes that the writer of it knows how good it is. It must have been made, though, and not simply reported; so the humor—unconsciously as it reposes in the circumstances—is not there by chance, and we may safely hope for more work as excellent as this in its successful portraiture and good feeling. Of humor of another kind—to be described as more obviously inherent in the humorist, dependent rather on his voluntarily chosen way of looking at things than at all on the character of the things looked at, controllable and consciously exercised, more truly humor in the older sense of the word; appealing not at all, or but slightly, to the sense of the ridiculous or ludicrous, "A Romance of Real Life" offers many extremely delicate and subtle examples. No wonder the poets are at war with so dangerous a spirit as the humorous; it is only the greatest of them that it does not ruin for poetry.

The solider articles in the March Atlantic are a scientific paper on "California Earthquakes;" "Time Works Wonders;" a more or less instructive journal of a railway journey "From Pennsylvania Hills to Minnesota Prairies;" and an essay by Mr. James on the question, "Is Marriage Holy?" Our erring wives, he would say, we prosecute and punish if we hearken to the commands of that law which is established by human society. But when we think of the moral law, which teaches us not that we are better than the world outside of us, but that we owe it mercy even as we feel that we ourselves need to have allowances made for us, then we forgive the transgressor, for we feel that we have no right to demand of another human being, as of right, that she shall love us. Meantime, what becomes of society? and what becomes of children? and whether, on the whole, we do best for ourselves and others—even for the unfortunate woman herself—to keep the wife in a perpetual state of being forgiven—these are questions upon which we do not get any light from Mr. James; though it is plain that his sentiments are generous, and such as would give men great spiritual happiness, and perhaps, too, would conform to the standard of justice between man and man, if men lived in vacuo. All such arguments proceed on the assumption that man as a citizen is infinitely inferior to man as a spiritual being—to which, if one assents, the conclusion is that the citizen, then, shall be subordinated in all things to the spiritual being; as if men in mid ocean should knock their raft to pieces because the company are not altogether comfortable upon it. Patched timbers are less than men, surely; but what were the men without them? The author of "A Night in a Typhoon" was on board the U. S. ship Idaho when recently that vessel was overtaken by a typhoon, and he and his companions underwent an experience which but few men have ever undergone and lived to relate. It is but a little while—the time is to be counted in months, we think—since half a dozen men who had sailed into the centre of a typhoon—into the windless circle at the heart of one of those revolving storms—and had come safely out, were made to sit for their portraits, so wonderful was it considered that they should have escaped. This story of the Idaho is worth reading, then. The most noticeable poetry of the month in the Atlantic is Dr. Holmes's "Even-Song." The article of greatest current interest is the letter from Madrid, and the writer is probably judicious in being not too hopeful.

Putnam's has for its best article the fourth of its "Sketches in Color," which are evidently the work of an impartial and intelligent observer who has gathered together some interesting facts and formed some sound opinions as to the Southern colored man. "Our Trip to Egypt as Guests of the Viceroy," is by Élisée Reclus, and is much better than most of the correspondence from the Suez Canal. "The Bear Hunt" is a translation from the Swedish, and will be found interesting considered as a sketch of life, and pleasant, though slight enough, considered as a story. "Americans and Some of their Characteristics" is by Dr. T. M. Coan, and we are going to wait a while before believing it. Who besides Dr. Coan says that the average Frenchman, "as is shown by the statistics of armies," is heavier than the average citizen of the United States? How long since the American type of countenance and head became assimilated in any essential points to the face and head of the American Indian? There was a French philosopher awhile ago who lamented the declination of the Aryan type on this continent toward the aborginal American type; but nothing has been heard from him, that we know of, since it was discovered that his Canadian correspondent had been generalizing on facts observed in the cases of certain Micmac or other Indians who had learned to talk French; and we fancy that some of Dr. Coan's philosophizings would be all the better for a somewhat firmer basis of facts. "School-days at the Sacred Heart" is a readable description of a school-girl's life in a convent, and speaks in high terms of the sisters and their ways. "The Subvented Church," on the other hand, is not the work of anybody in immediate danger of drinking of the cup of abominations; but it is so fearfully satirical and sarcastic that much more than its writer's safety we do not make out from it. With this number Putnam's goes into new editorial hands, of whose management it is of course too early to speak as yet.

The March Hours at Home is the best number of this periodical that we have yet seen, and contains several articles worth reading and very well adapted for reading in the family. Professor W. F. Allen, a careful scholar, contributes a pleasant description of the way in which a Roman gentleman of the time of Augustus got through his day, and makes an essay which, with a few others like it, supplied with references, would make an excellent book to put into the hands of boys beginning their Latin. "A Glimpse of Thackeray" is by Mr. J. Esten Cooke, who seems to have been much surprised because that brutal cynic did not roll upon him one bloodshot eye, set in the middle of his forehead, clench his fists, and say that he believed all women to be unvirtuous and all men swindlers and toad-eaters. Quite a reasonable, agreeable gentleman Mr. Cooke found him, which must have been sufficiently surprising to one whom we may suppose to have read his novels. In the bondage of the high-toned Southerner to the British Critic the philosophic eye discerns some compensation for the wrongs of the African. "The Literature of our Sunday-Schools" is by the Rev. George Bacon, and is so sensible that it will shock the purchasing committees of most Sunday-school libraries. But the reform for which Mr. Bacon pleads is perhaps coming. Certainly the state of opinion in the churches differs vastly from what it was twenty years ago, when the lives of hydrocephalic "converted" children, pious at an age when their piety was the impious sin of others against the little unfortunates, made the staple of the reading that was offered for boys and girls. The very heavens seem to have grown brighter over New England towns since the fifteen or twenty bound volumes of the "Panoplist" ceased to be pressed on the attention of Bible-classes. That sort of reading was worse than even the razeed sensational novels that Mr. Bacon cries out against which are now manufactured for the young. But it may be doubted if Sunday-school libraries will ever be good until the Sunday-school conventions come to the opinion that they are chiefly valuable as furnishing children whom their parents cannot supply with books, and who have no town library to which to resort, with sound literature, which otherwise they might never get hold of until after the age of most impressibility had passed without the taste for reading having been formed. Before this is done, however, the Sunday-schools themselves probably must be changed, and teaching in them will have to be different from what Emerson somewhere describes it as being—the shutting up of young people in pews and making them answer questions which the children do not want to ask. "Where shall Baby's Dimple be?" is a cradle-song by Dr. Holland. The chin is the place decided upon; not on the "limb" nor cheek is the angel to touch the sleeping infant. The song will be popular, if we have young mothers. "Old Ironsides" is about the brave old Admiral Stewart, and is the second of two papers, both of which are good. "Miss Adelaide" is a short story, by a new writer, we think, who writes better than she makes plots. "Romance" is by Dr. S. B. Hunt; and there are besides, in Hours at Home, some verses which attempt to express the impression produced by the perfume of the heliotrope; "A Description of the House of Lords," by Mr. G. M. Towle, who, if he were suddenly caught up into the moon, would write back hackneyed letters out of Appleton's Cyclopædia article on that refulgent orb; and some "Leisure Moments" chat.

Lippincott's has a striking sketch of the notorious "Jim Lane," by a man who knew him, and who tells some curious stories about that worthy's electioneering and raiding. Electioneering surely never went further than he carried it at the time of his going to the Senate from Kansas. One member of the Legislature, we are told, went to bed to escape his importunities, but after Lane had finished a midnight harangue to the bar-tenders, cooks, chambermaids, and everybody else that he could get together in the tavern parlor, our friend up-stairs was awakened by Lane's creeping into bed beside him to "see" him about his vote. Lane's raids into Missouri were such, this writer asserts, that we may as well say no more about Quantrell's murders at Lawrence. There can be little doubt, for that matter, that the devil was fought with fire on whichever side of the border he showed himself.

Another interesting paper—though less is made of the subject than might have been—is entitled "Vaudoux in St. Domingo," and treats of the horrible superstition known in this country as voodooism. Here, however, so far as is known, the system has not its more disgusting and horrid features, though no doubt it is practised to a greater or less extent in many parts of the Southern States. For the rest, Lippincott's has the ninth part of Mr. Trollope's "Vicar of Bullhampton;" some good enough "Monthly Gossip;" a slight story by Miss Rose Terry; and an article by the Hon. Amasa Walker, who says that Mr. Boutwell's official interference with the gold premium has been and is injurious to the financial and monetary interests of the country, and that it retards trade and embarrasses industry of all kinds. Philadelphia spring butter has not come in yet, we suppose, but the Monthly Gossiper seems to be in a state of high excitement. He professes to hold that the young ladies of "his burg"—that, we believe, is the correct metropolitan term—are "the cunning handiwork of Nature herself;" that they care nothing for the hollow tributes of universal admiration; that they can be lively without fastness, beautiful without vanity, and elegant in attire without extravagance or ostentation; that they are superior to young persons of the same sex who reside in New York and Boston; that the terrapin can nowhere be eaten with such satisfaction as in Philadelphia; that croquettes also, when made in Philadelphia by "Augustin," are unequalled; that "the well-known Delmonico," eating of these croquettes, "confessed himself vanquished;" that society in Philadelphia "has always been characterized by a certain elevation of tone and severity of morals which contrast as favorably with the fastness of New York, as does its lavish and genial hospitality with the dry toast and weak tea reunions of Boston," and so on. We shall look to see the World calling for a company of New York capitalists of energy and enterprise to go down there and "run" a place that seems to have so many natural advantages.

The Catholic World gives this month the second of the letters from the Vatican Council, written by Father Hecker, who does not yet become interesting, though his record of facts is perhaps better worth having than those made by other correspondents. A writer who offers his "Views of the Labor Movement" suggests, as the true method of rearranging the relations of labor and capital, that men should begin again to practise the communism of the Early Church. The "vital conditions" of the kind of co-operative association which he approves are, first, Christian fervor; second, Christian humility; third, Christian poverty—after which the fourth need hardly be mentioned. Other papers are: "The Relations of British Premiers to British Catholics"—which is written in a candid spirit; a third and last part of an Essay on "Church Music"—which raps the Protestants soundly not only for sinning themselves in the matter of choir-singing, but for having caused and compelled Catholics also to sin; a "Historical Sketch of the Rise of the Greek Schism;" another of "The Present Condition of Poland;" an argument which proves that civil liberty was "not born of or with the Reformation, but the Reformation itself was born of absolute monarchy, despotism, or Cæsarism;" several book reviews, some stories, and one or two pieces of poetry.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

LETTERS published twenty years ago, and written, some of them, nearly forty years ago, should, to be republished now, have a quality in them independent of time, or which time improves, likes poesy and wine. Mr. Wm. Cullen Bryant's "Letters of a Traveller" (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son, 1850, 1869) will owe their immortality, if they get it, to the writer's muse rather than to anything notable or memorable in themselves. They are now printed for the third time (as they originally appeared in a newspaper), and bear date of the years between and including 1834 and 1849. Arranged chronologically, they take the reader first to Western and Southern Europe; then to the Southern States of this Union; next to Great Britain; again to the Continent; next to the North-west, New England, the Southern States, to Cuba; to Europe once more and finally. They are slight and superficial sketches, suggestive of no long sojourn or special study, and far from equalling the opportunities which Mr. Bryant often had. In '34, he saw Tuscany under the Grand Duke, and Venice under the rule of Austria; in '45, he was in England during the Corn-law agitation; in September, 1849, he was in Paris under the Republic. His comments on these epochs scarcely heighten the contrast which he and we have witnessed in the events of the last decade. It is otherwise when journeying in this country. Horse-thieves and lynch-law, he found, were the order of the day in Illinois in 1841. In 1843, Florida was recovering from the Seminole war, and there were the same expectations as to-day of a speedy influx of immigrants and invalids, and promises of better accommodations. In 1846, at Lake Superior, there were many "surface indications" that the copper mines were as valuable as any in the world. In 1847, Lawrence, Mass., was only a year old, and still in the confusion of bricks, mortar, and timber. In 1843, Mr. Bryant remarked that the U. S. House of Representatives no longer, as he had seen it in 1832, aped the English House of Commons in sitting covered—perhaps "because it so often happens that all the members are talking together, the rule being that the person speaking must be bareheaded." At South Easton, in Pennsylvania, in 1846, he asked if a certain rolling-mill would stop for the new tariff, and was told: "It costs the iron-masters fifteen dollars a ton to make their iron, and they sell it for forty dollars a ton; if the new tariff obliges them to sell it for considerable less, they will still make money." "So," adds Mr. Bryant, "revolves the cycle of opinion. Twenty years ago, a Pennsylvanian who questioned the policy of the protective system would have been looked upon as a sort of curiosity. Now, the bloomers and stable-boys begin to talk free-trade. What will they talk twenty years hence?" Not what Mr. Bryant probably anticipated; but change in the national policy has not been left dependent on a change in Pennsylvania itself, and the implied prophecy has been nearly enough fulfilled. In New Hampshire—to bring our quotations to an end—Mr. Bryant saw, with admiration, three sisters: "no pallid faces, nor narrow chests, nor lean hands; but forms which might have satisfied an ancient statuary; with a well-formed bust, faces glowing with health, round arms, and plump fingers—such women, in short, as our mothers, fifty years ago, might have been." It is helpful, when discussing the physical degeneracy of New England, to know that already in 1843 the mothers of the last century were held up reproachfully to their descendants, and that Mr. Bryant wrote, apropos of the exceptions just mentioned: "I had not observed any particular appearance of health in the females of the country through which I had passed; on the contrary, I had been disappointed in their general pallidness and look of debility."

So far as we recollect, Mr. Story has never before imitated Mr. Browning so well as in his "Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem" (Boston: Loring). Usually the subtlety and depth of the master is beyond the utmost reach of the disciple—so very far beyond it that there is something painful in noting the surface resemblance. But in this piece there is a good deal of the Browningesque subtlety. It is not, however, Mr. Story's own. For a long time the theory has been the common property of all the pulpits that, in betraying his Master, Judas Iscariot had no very evil design. Judas, say the apologists, firmly believed Jesus to be the promised Messiah; he eagerly wished for and waited for the time when his Master should manifest himself in full power. So the mistaken man, impatient and full of faith, led the soldiers out to the Mount, expecting their overthrow or their instant conversion as soon as they should attempt the arrest. But when he saw his Lord bound and led away in submission, he went in grief and shame and killed himself. Generally, it is said in the pulpits, by way of leaving Judas, even at the very best, still black, that he was a sordid wretch, who desired only the coming of Christ's temporal kingdom—to see the Messiah reigning in glory on the throne of Judea, rewarding his friends with riches and rank, and ruling his enemies with a despotic sway But the ingenious inventors of the "whitewashing" process made it complete. Adopting as his own this now threadbare theory, Mr. Story makes a poem, which is fashioned in the image and likeness of Browning's admirable and famous "Letter of Karshish," wherein the Arabian physician tells a brother physician how, in his journeying through Syria, he had happened on a certain Lazarus, a remarkable Jew, who believed himself to have been actually raised from the dead by a prophet and physician who afterwards was put to death, but who still was held by many to have been and to be divine. Mr. Story's Karshish is a Roman Lawyer, and Judas is his Lazarus. Such details as he has put in for the filling out of the outline add nothing to the main conception, but rather weaken it; and the verse, too, is flat and feeble. The poem first appeared about a year and a half ago in Blackwood's Magazine, and is not long.

"The Constant Tin Soldier," that seems to the childish fancy what Napoleon's Old Guardsmen seem to us; "The Ugly Duckling," whom many a homely child has taken to him or herself in consolation—these, and the heroes and heroines of all the rest of Andersen's "Wonder-Stories" (fifty-eight by the tale), will be found in beautiful apparel, of paper, print, and binding, in the edition of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. No more healthful, innocent reading was ever provided for the young, nor much that endures longer in the mind that has received it.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.*

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Clark (Rev. R. W.), The Bible and the School Fund, swd	(Lee & Shepard) $0 40
Greenough (J. B.), Analysis of the Latin Subjunctive, swd	(Cambridge)
Green (S.), Trout Culture, swd	(D. M. Dewey)
Harper's Weekly, Vol. XIII., 1869	(Harper & Bros.)
Harper's Bazar, Vol. II., 1869	" "
Harper's New Monthly Magazine, Vols. 38, 39, 1869	" "
Leland (C. G.), Hans Breitmann in Church, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 75
Owen (R. D.), Beyond the Breakers: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Seguin (Dr. E.), New Facts and Remarks concerning Idiocy, swd	(Wm. Wood & Co.)
Trumbull (J. H.), Composition of Indian Geographical Names, swd	(New Haven)
The Workshop, No. 2, swd	(E. Steiger) 0 50

The Third Edition of Professor Raphael Pumpelly's Narrative of his Tour Across America and Asia. $5.

A New and Thoroughly Revised Edition of Spielhagen's Through Night to Light. $2.

The Second Edition of Spielhagen's Problematic Characters. $2.

The Third Edition of Taine's Rome and Naples (the first part published of his "Italy"). $2 50.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, New York.

NEW AND IMPORTANT

AND

STANDARD BOOKS,

SUPPLIED BY

Scribner, Welford & Co.,

654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

1. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire; comprising the History of Chaldea, Assyria, Medea, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judea, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Rome, Macedonia, and Parthia. By George Rawlinson, M.A., Author of "Herodotus," "Five Great Monarchies," etc. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $6.
2. American Society. By George Makepeace Towle. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth, $10.
3. Art in England, Notes and Studies. By Dutton Cook. Small-post 8vo, cloth, $3.
4. A Geographical Handbook of all the Known Ferns, divided into Six Territorial Divisions. Compiled from the most recent Works. By K. M. Lyell. 12mo, cloth, $3 75.
5. The Fall of Babylon, as Foreshadowed in History and Prophecy. By the Rev. Dr. Cumming, Author of "The Great Tribulation Coming on the Earth." 12mo, cloth, $3.
6. Our Iron-Clad Ships; their Qualities, Performances, and Cost; including Chapters on Turret Ships, Iron-Clad Rams, etc. By E. J. Reed, C.B., Chief Constructor of the Navy. With Illustrations, 8vo, cloth, $6.

NEW YORK CHURCH BOOK-STORE.

NEW BOOK by DEAN GOULBURN. English Edition. Price 75 cents.

THE PURSUIT OF HOLINESS.

A Sequel to "Thoughts on Personal Religion," intended to carry the reader somewhat further onward in the Spiritual Life. By EDWARD MEYRICK GOULBURN, D.D. 12mo, cloth.

CHEAP EDITION OF MONSELL'S POPULAR BOOK,

OUR NEW VICAR.

By the Rev. I. S. B. MONSELL. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

JUST READY, PRICE $1 50,

CREATION:

A Recent Work of God. By the Rector of St. Mary's Church, New York. Crown 8vo, cloth.

POTT & AMERY,

COOPER UNION, FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

A LARGE STOCK OF

London Bibles,

Episcopal Prayer-Books, Church Services, etc., in plain and fine Bindings, mounted with Enamelled Crosses and Monograms, etc., etc. The largest and best Stock in the United States may be seen at the LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

SOLE AGENTS:

POTT & AMERY,

Cooper Union, Fourth Avenue,

NEW YORK.

JUST ISSUED.

The first American Edition of Madvig's Latin Grammar,

Carefully revised by Thomas A. Thacher, Yale College. The most complete and valuable Treatise on the language yet published, and admirably adapted to the wants of Teachers and College Classes. Price $3. To Teachers, postpaid, $2 30.

Prepared by W. F. and J. H. ALLEN:

Allen's Latin Primer. A First Book of Latin for Boys and Girls. By J. H. Allen. Part I. 50 cents.

Allen's Manual Latin Grammar. $1 25. Recommended by Harvard College as indicating the amount required for admission.

Allen's Latin Lessons. $1 25.

Allen's Latin Reader. $2 50.

Latin Composition. To be issued in April.

Allen's Latin Lexicon. Sufficiently complete for an ordinary collegiate course. $1 25.

Craik's English of Shakespeare.

By W. J. ROLFE. Price $1 75.

[From the Harvard Catalogue for 1869-70.]

"For 1870, students may prepare themselves in Craik's 'English of Shakespeare' or in Milton's 'Comus.'"

GINN BROTHERS & CO., Publishers,

13 Beacon Street, Boston.

TNAM & SON have REMOVED to their NEW STORE, Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, FOURTH AVENUE and TWENTY-THIRD STREET.

NOW READY,

Father Hyacinthe's New Volume,

THE

FAMILY AND THE CHURCH.

BY THE

REV. FATHER HYACINTHE.

TRANSLATED BY

LEONARD WOOLSEY BACON.

12mo, cloth, $1 50.

ALSO,

A NEW EDITION

OF

The Earlier Discourses of Father Hyacinthe.

WITH A FINE PORTRAIT ON STEEL.

12mo, cloth, $1 25.

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,

PUBLISHERS,

Y. M. C. A. Building, Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York.

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

ARGUMENTS IN THE CASE OF

The Board of Education of Cincinnati.

WITH THE

OPINIONS AND DECISION OF THE COURT

1 vol. 8vo, pp. 420, cloth, price $2; or, on tinted paper cloth, gilt top, $2 50.

Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the price.

ROBERT CLARKE & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

Cincinnati

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1870.

The Week.

DEBATE and nothing accomplished, is the week's record of Congress. The chief topics in the Senate have been the Funding Bill, the bill to compensate Southern loyalists, and the bill to alter the judicial circuits. On the provisions of this last will depend, apparently, the confirmation of Mr. Bradley, who, but for a misapprehension of the President's intentions in regard to him, stood a good chance of being confirmed at the same time that Judge Strong was, ten days ago. The House has discussed the Indian Appropriation Bill, the Georgia Bill, and the new tariff, and has considered the novel question whether a member who has resigned his seat, and taken himself off, bag and baggage, and then repented and asked to be taken back, has any right to be heard on the motion. The House decided not, but thought it best to enquire whether its members should be allowed to resign in the midst of such an enquiry as frightened Mr. Golladay into so doing. On Tuesday Mr. Bingham succeeded in fastening an amendment on the Georgia Bill, with which it now goes before the Senate. It completely disappoints the pleasant expectations of the Governor, and of Mr. Blodgett, the Senator-elect, and limits to the present year the term of the Legislature now sitting. A popular election becomes necessary in the fall, and the new Legislature will have full power to choose United States Senators—thus ensuring a change in the entire representation of the State for 1871. It is not altogether certain that the Senate will adopt the amended bill, but we suppose more likely than not.

The new Georgia bill was to have kept Bullock and his friends in office by extending their term, and indeed there was no reason in the world, as matters have gone, why the perpetual tenure of office by these gentlemen should not have formed one of the conditions of reconstruction. The bill had no merit whatever, unless this was a merit. The success, as some people consider it, of the Georgia performance has, it is reported, caused General Butler to make preparations for executing one of his threats, by preparing another bill reducing Tennessee once more to a provisional condition, owing to the defective execution of the laws, and consequent insecurity of life and property in that State. On this theory of Federal rights and State duties, there is no reason why Congress should not occupy itself for the next ten years overturning State governments and establishing peace and tranquillity by military law in various parts of the Union. There is hardly a single State in the North, for instance, in which society is in a thoroughly satisfactory condition. Robbers go unwhipped of justice, wives are unfaithful, taxes heavy, courts lax, ministers prosy, to a greater or less extent in them all. Nor is there any question that these facts show a departure from a republican form of government. Were these States perfect republics, these things would not be. Why not take them all in hand, and make an end of iniquity while we are about it? The time is propitious, and the machinery stands ready to our hands.

Mr. Golladay, of Kentucky, resigned his seat in the House, to avoid expulsion, he having also been dealing in cadetships. Governor Stevenson, however, refused to accept the resignation, saying that Mr. Golladay was bound to stand his trial before the only tribunal which could take cognizance of such a charge, thus showing, we must say, a much better appreciation of the charge, and of the relations of members to the House, than the House showed itself in dealing with Mr. Whittemore's case. Mr. Golladay asked leave to withdraw the resignation, but, of course, as he had been permitted to resign, letting him come back would have been equivalent to letting him and Governor Stevenson fill the vacant seat. A more ill-advised precedent than has now been established is not on record. Mr. Whittemore, as might have been expected, has completely recovered from his fright, and has published a letter, from which it appears that, if his act had any moral quality at all, it was praiseworthy. General Logan, he says, likes him very much, and will be glad to see him back in the House again, which Mr. Whittemore says "brings balm to the wounds inflicted." Other members of Congress feel in the same way; the persons who pushed on the resolutions against him are "a few Hotspurs;" he is "going to appeal to his constituents, whose confidence he never violated," and so on. Indeed, we do not well see how somebody can avoid giving him a dinner and piece of plate. And now let us have no more gratuitous nominations to cadetships. With so much suffering and poverty all around us, so many heathen unconverted, and so many estimable men short of money, the member who fails to raise something whenever he sends a boy to West Point or Annapolis ought to be ashamed of himself.

The proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment is very prudently delayed, in order to be quite sure about its ratification. There will be four doubtful States in all; that is, four States the validity of whose ratification Democrats will dispute, if not now, before very long, and it would certainly be well to do without them, if possible. There are, for instance, disputes about the certificates of New York and Indiana, and doubts whether the ratification of Georgia and Texas can be deemed valid until those States have been declared eligible for readmission into the Union by Congress. So the President declares that he will not issue the proclamation till these are admitted. There will then be the needful twenty-eight States without New York or Indiana, in the former of which the Legislature claims the right to withdraw the ratification, and in the latter the Democrats withdrew, when the amendment came up for discussion, in order not to leave a quorum, and maintain that they succeeded.

New Hampshire has again gone Republican by a sufficient majority, in spite of divisions sought to be caused by labor candidates and temperance candidates. The result is another proof of the firmness of party discipline in this country, and the practical disposition to do one thing at a time.

We mentioned some time ago, as one of the curiosities of liquor legislation in Massachusetts, that it licensed and prohibited on alternate years. Accordingly, last year having been the prohibitory year, this year a license law has been introduced into the Legislature, with a strong prospect of passing. The difference between the two systems is one of kind rather than of degree; one permits secret and the other open drinking, but that is nearly all. The temperance men apparently are in the state of mind of the uncomfortable little boy, who always "wanted what he hadn't got;" when they have licenses they long for prohibition, and when they have prohibition look fondly back to licenses, and in the meantime the poisonous "bowl" goes round as merrily as ever. It is a good sign of the times, however, that Governor Claflin at last acknowledges that the Hartford and Erie Railroad is something very like a swindle, and that the course which the Commissioners were legislated out of office for following was the only proper one. What makes it more important is, that the Governor himself "lobbied" the whole affair.

Talking of temperance men, we must not omit mention of a large and enthusiastic meeting held in this city on Monday last, at which Henry Ward Beecher and Horace Greeley spoke. Mr. Beecher met the "wedding at Cana of Galilee" argument by saying that when Christ created wine it was 1800 years ago, in a different climate and condition of society, and different surroundings, and that therefore the incident was of no special value in this temperance controversy, which certainly to the carnal eye seems a very just observation. But that profound thinker, Mr. Greeley, who followed after, went far deeper down; he said that it was not generally known that alcohol was poison (which is certainly very surprising), and that he was very sorry to hear it said that Christ created alcoholic wine; he did not believe it himself; he knew alcohol to be poison, and ten thousand revelations would not convince him "that Christ created a poison."

This is, of course, conclusive, but then Mr. Greeley must not be impatient if the common run of people cannot follow him in his more abstruse ratiocination. We who know him and read his clear, logical disquisitions in the Tribune, of course accept any assertion he makes positively on any subject, just as we accept Newton's on the laws of motion, or Kepler's on the revolutions of the planets; but then the poor drunkards are not so readily convinced, and we fear a great many will still go on doubting about the kind of wine Christ made at the wedding.

The way, by-the-by, in which Christ begins to be used on the political and social platform by some of our agitators (of course we do not mean the calm, judicial-minded, and reverent ones like Mr. Greeley) is, we think, at least open to criticism, not on grounds of taste or regard to other people's feelings (because these are not considerations that weigh much with them), but on grounds of common sense. In other words, granted that it is permitted to them to be indecent, is it permitted to them to make fools of themselves? What are we to say to the young and inflamed divine (he must have been young) who, the other day in Boston, cried out that "Christ had died to give the ballot to woman." The only opinion entitled to the smallest respect that the reverend gentleman can have in the matter, is that Christ died to promote good government—that is, government suited to the people who live under it. He did not die to give universal suffrage to the Moors, or an Antoninus Pius to Americans, and the work of finding out what was the government suited to each people he left to be done by their brains. The inconvenience of citing Christ in glorification of every little bee that gets into good people's bonnets, is that it may lead to displays of the most revolting folly. Anybody has just as much right to say that Christ died for legislatures composed of one chamber, or for direct taxation, or for the appointment of judges by the governor and senate, as that he died for female suffrage. If anybody feels troubled by these illustrations, all we can say is, that it is impossible to follow up some of the quacks of the day without passing through puddles, and splashing up a good deal of mud.

The town of Hyde Park, in Massachusetts, has been the scene of an attempt to vote, or rather a rehearsal of ballot-casting, on the part of some of the women, sixty in all, who went to the polls on election-day, and voted in separate boxes. The ticket they supported, and which they are said to have seriously scratched, was elected. They were received in divers manners by the male bystanders, the good and pure applauding, the wicked and licentious hooting and cat-calling. The occasion was dignified and illustrated by what we certainly never expected to hear of—the appearance, in the flesh, as chairman, or "moderator," of Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., the well-known novelist of the New York Ledger and other popular periodicals. Few people, we are sure, have ever thought of him as a palpable substance, or dreamed of his apparition in a town-meeting preserving order for female voting. His exertions were admirable and successful, and his rebukes to the turbulent were worthy of his reputation. One gentleman denied his right to repress expressions of disapproval on the part of the males, and even went so far as to move that the great novelist be called on to resign. A few manly words from that functionary, however, quelled the insurrection. Two or three of the women voters were old, the main body quite young, and the latter carried bouquets of flowers, which, according to the correspondent of the Herald, overcame the odor of tobacco and New England rum which had previously pervaded the room.

Another incident, but of more importance, in the Woman's Suffrage movement has been the summoning of a female Grand Jury in Laramie City, Wyoming Territory. The "Ladies and Gentlemen of the Grand Jury" were charged by Chief-Justice Dowe, who, judging from his effort on this occasion, appears to be a jurist of the same school as our old friend Judge Underwood of Virginia, and to be likely to help on that great movement for the softening and mellowing of judicial proceedings of which we spoke a week or two ago. He said that though he had taken no part himself in the Woman's Rights agitation, he had long felt that woman had been "the victim of the vices, crimes, and immoralities of man," and that she ought to be armed with some means of protection, and that "it had fallen to their lot that day to act as pioneers in the movement and test the question;" and he added "that the eyes of the whole world were that day fixed on Laramie County." After threatening the vengeance of the court upon everybody who annoyed or molested the Grand Jury, hinting, somewhat obscurely, that "the dens of infamy which infested the country" would now catch it, and assuring the men who were on the jury that his compliments to the women implied no reflection on them, and that he was pleased with their "gentlemanly deportment," his Honor turned, doubtless unwillingly, to the sterner and less poetic business of the court.

Captain Hall, the Arctic explorer, has been delivering a lecture in Washington, in which he announced his desire to go on another voyage in search of the North Pole, and declared that his object in going to Washington was to get an appropriation of $100,000 in aid of his undertaking, which, he said, was to subserve the interests of "science and commerce." The way he was to help commerce was by the discovery of "extensive whaling grounds." We do not pretend to be able to say what Captain Hall can do for science by his travels, but we must protest strongly against the voting of any money to aid in the quest of the extensive whaling grounds. Any whaling grounds that have not been already discovered and whaled pretty thoroughly, we may be sure cannot be got at readily by anybody but Arctic explorers, and we have yet to learn that Arctic exploration is a business into which any prudent commercial man would like to put capital with any expectation of return. If the whalers are badly off, and must have some money, we suggest that the $100,000 be distributed amongst them at once, without giving Captain Hall the trouble of going north. In that way much discomfort would be saved to all parties, except the whales, and, possibly, some loss of life.

The Charleston Courier has compared the new census of South Carolina with that of 1860, and the result is, that the population of the State has increased during the decade from 703,708 to 706,022, or by 2,314. This, considering the ravages of the war which has intervened, is quite as great a gain as could have been expected. The proportion of whites to blacks is now 295,314 to 410,708. Of the thirty counties into which the State is divided, only eleven show an increase, ranging from 120 (Clarendon) to 65,089 (Charleston), while the remainder have decreased from 472 (Laurens) to 16,570 (Colleton). The upper and middle districts generally have suffered depletion, those on the extreme northern border furnishing an exception; but the white inhabitants of them have actually increased, so that the loss is to be accounted for by a movement towards the coast on the part of the colored people. On reference to the map, however, it appears that this migration has been towards only one of the five coast counties, namely, Charleston, and undoubtedly shows that the same influences which in all the Northern States set towards the large cities, and away from the country, are at work in South Carolina. The field negro, being at liberty, goes down to Charleston, and not to Beaufort and the Sea Islands. As the Courier points out, this change of residence on the part of the numerical majority is destined to shift the balance of political power, and to enable the whites to recover some part at least of their former supremacy. But this is a revolution which can scarcely be regarded with apprehension.

Judging by the vote, and by the attitude of the Courier in regard to the so-called Phosphate Bill, passed last week over the Governor's veto, the blacks alone were not responsible for this piece of legislation; and, if it was brought about by corruption, were not the only members of the Legislature who accepted a bribe. The bill has caused violent contention for several weeks, as it gives a monopoly—without adequate security to the State—of the business of digging and mining in the beds of navigable streams and other waters of South Carolina, for phosphatic rocks and deposits, which now furnishes occupation to a large number of poor men, who, the Governor declares, would be willing to pay for the privilege. A State which has so much waste land can certainly ill afford to risk stopping up the source of fertility and wealth, as may result from the negligence or the greediness of the company to which it commits its phosphates. This is so evident, that it would scarcely be doubtful that the law was dishonestly carried, even if we did not know that the way of the lobby is nowhere easier than at Columbia. In a State which pays a million of taxes without flinching, this weakness of legislators is not to be ascribed to general poverty.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte has been committed for trial on the capital charge by the Chambre de Mise en Accusation (the equivalent of a grand jury) of the High Court. There were some fears that he would be tried for simple manslaughter, which are thus set at rest. The position of the Emperor in the matter becomes more and more embarrassing; it is his interest, and that of his dynasty, to have the Prince convicted, and even capitally convicted; but, on the other hand, blood is thicker than water, and the Imperial family could not but suffer somewhat in the popular estimation from having the crime of assassination brought home to one of its members. But it would deprive Rochefort of a large portion of his popularity; he was going down rapidly when the tragedy took place, and the way it at once raised him to eminence is a curious illustration of the way in which eminence is sometimes acquired in troublous times. Rochefort has never uttered one single sentence of which any human being could possibly be the wiser or better. He is neither orator, statesman, scholar, soldier, poet, inventor, manufacturer, nor jurist. His sole claim to celebrity lies in his dexterity as a lampooner, and a kind of smart pluck, such as is generally found amongst the Paris gamins, but the value of which is considerably lessened by the fact that he faints away whenever he becomes much excited. Nevertheless, some of the radicals of both hemispheres have taken this man, and have for some weeks been working him up into a sage and hero, and we doubt if a more melancholy, and at the same time more laughable, process was ever witnessed. It makes one wonder what the ideal human being of his admirers is. Jules Favre, for instance, who for twenty years has toiled for liberty with extraordinary courage and eloquence, wealth of knowledge and patience and hope, sinks into complete obscurity beside this new prophet. As might be expected, Victor Hugo about this time appears on the scene with a letter, addressed to Rochefort: "All I have predicted," he says, "is coming to pass. Your popularity is immense, as are your talents and courage. You are henceforth one of the persons of the future. I clasp your hand, dear outlaw, dear conqueror." We may guess from this what kind of place M. Hugo's "future" will be.

For a wonder, the two great measures now before the English House of Commons—the Irish Land Bill and the Education Bill, the details of which have reached us—seem to give satisfaction to all parties. Their passage, combined with the Church Bill, will give Mr. Gladstone the place in English history which Turgot would have had in French history if Louis XVI. had been a man of stronger character. They really promise the reconstruction of English and Irish society, and, what is their highest excellence, and gives their author one of the rarest distinctions, is, that the revolution they work, they work peacefully. The Irish Land Bill recognizes the vested interest in his farm even of a tenant-at-will, thus at last putting an end to the monstrous doctrine, which, we believe, has never found a lodgment in any jurisprudence but that of Great Britain, that the tillers of the soil may be treated as mere trespassers of it, and driven off it like wild animals. No man, under the bill, can be arbitrarily evicted from his holding without receiving, if he pays between $50 and $250 rent, a sum equivalent to five years' rent; between $250 and $500, three years' rent; and over $500, two years' rent. When it is remembered that the fee of land in Ireland does not sell for over "twenty-five years' purchase," as it is called—that is, the accumulated rental of that period, the small holder may be said, under this rule, to have vested in him a fifth interest in the soil. The landlord's rights are, at the same time, acknowledged and maintained by giving him the right to raise the rent in proportion to the rise of the value of property in the neighborhood, and to evict without cause on paying the penalty, and paying the tenant for his improvements, or for gross neglect or injury to the farm. But all eviction for cause can only take place under the decree of the Courts of Quarter Sessions, which are composed of experienced lawyers, going the circuit, and, therefore, free from local influence; and they are to have the power, too, to judge of the reasonableness of a rise in the rent. In short, the Irish tenant will, if this measure succeeds, be at last placed under the protection of law, and removed from the rule of an irresponsible despotism—the like of which, as we have said, has never been seen in modern times in a constitutional country. Mr. Gladstone deserves as much praise for the comprehensive view he has taken of the tenants' rights as for the ingenuity with which he has managed to provide for the landholding prejudices of English members, which have always constituted the main difficulty in the way of Irish reform; and the speech in which he brought the bill in was one of those pieces of masterly exposition in which he has perhaps no living equal.

Mr. Foster's Education Bill divides the kingdom into educational districts, with local school committees under the superintendence and control of the Central Board, and provides for the establishment of schools by the levy of a local tax, to be supplemented when necessary from the national treasury; but denominational schools already in existence and willing to comply with the requirement of the law, are not to be disturbed, and are to continue to receive Government aid as now, and may even, should the local constituency be satisfied, be converted into the district school. School committees are to have the power to fine parents for not sending their children to school between the ages of five and twelve, and the very poor are to receive their education free; those able to do so, to pay a small sum. This measure, too, seems to meet with general approval, and will probably pass with unimportant modifications. It touches the root of the evils which most afflict English society. The abolition of the law of primogeniture, to which some people attach so much importance, would probably not produce the slightest perceptible effect, for reasons which we have more than once set forth in the Nation. The ballot, in the present state of the popular mind, may only increase the power of money; in some districts will certainly do so; but popular education is sure before long to change the face of English society. The fact is that all attempts to give legal rights to ignorant people must prove failures, and have always proved failures, and we greatly fear our own reconstruction process at the South will prove no exception to the rule. To enjoy one's rights, one has to know them, and know how to maintain them; indeed, it is just as true that the law helps the educated and not the ignorant, as that the law helps the vigilant and not the sleepers. Forty volumes of statutes and ten constitutional amendments would profit a man little in the absence of the spelling-book.

The Prince of Wales has evidently a hard road to travel. He is so closely watched that he would need to be a very good man—better, indeed, than most men, and far better than any man ever was who had such wretched training, and was exposed to such strong temptations as he—in order to escape censure. A most amusing illustration of the difficulties of his position has just been afforded in the Mordaunt case. When it was heard that he was mixed up in it, and that his letters had been captured and were in court, the curiosity of the public became positively painful—more, indeed, than persons of weak constitutions could long bear. The young profligate was at last driven to the wall, and a lurid light was going to be thrown on the vices of the aristocracy. When published, however, it was found that the correspondence consisted simply of notes, containing polite commonplaces, and all, or nearly all, written in answer to communications from Lady Mordaunt, who was evidently bent on running him down, and even fortified her advances with small presents, including a "muffletee." They were, indeed, just such replies as any sensible, well-bred, and kind-hearted man might be expected to make under the circumstances, and the worst of it was, they were of a positively chilling propriety. This was a little too bad; so it is now said, what a stupid, silly creature he is to have nothing to talk about, when he writes to ladies, but ponies, and partridges, and balls. His defence of his virtue in court, however, seems to have been received with the applause which all audiences accord to personal vindications. It is only in the newspapers that people delight in displays of downright depravity.

FUNDERS AND FUNDING.

Mr. Charles Bowles, the American banker in Paris, publishes in the last circular of his firm a letter from M. Ernest Frignet, one of the council of the house of Rothschild, and a very well-known European financier, upon the condition and prospects of American credit in Europe, which is well worthy of attention. There is no house in the world which has had so much to do with the negotiation of government loans as the Rothschilds, and there is certainly none better able to say what can and what cannot be done in the European markets by national borrowers. We are just now discussing more earnestly than ever the question of funding the national debt at a lower rate of interest, and the public is more than ever inclined to believe that the process cannot be performed at home, but it is still in some doubt whether it is possible or expedient to have it performed abroad, and, if so, whether it can be done on favorable terms.

The difficulty that the public experiences in arriving at any fixed conclusion about the matter is one which surrounds everything connected with the national finances, and it arises out of the peculiar and, indeed, one may say unprecedented, way in which they are administered. We have nominally a minister of finance, but he is in reality a head clerk who obeys the orders of Congress. He has nominally the privilege of framing a "policy" of his own with regard to the mode in which the public obligations should be met, but in reality his policy is a simple expression of opinion in his reports, which exercises no more influence on affairs than the opinion of any other man of equal prominence in public life, probably not nearly so much as that of some editor of a newspaper. People read what he says and discuss it, but nobody feels under any obligation to act on it, or even attach any extra weight to it, because it is an official opinion. Each member of Congress, for instance, no matter what the nature of his previous training or experience, feels just as much entitled to regulate the administration of the finances as Mr. Boutwell; and amongst the leading men in both branches there is a sort of impression that they owe it to their position in the eyes of the country to bring in at least one financial measure in the course of the session, and expect the country to receive it with just as much respect as if it came from the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact, many of them bring in financial bills apparently for the sole purpose of illustrating and enforcing their opinions, and without the least expectation that they will be passed; and there is no denying that the public attention is much more readily fixed on a man's "views" when they are embodied in a "bill" and divided into sections, than when merely uttered in a speech. We admit, too, that in so far as the people are trained at all in the comprehension of financial matters by what passes in Congress, they are trained much more effectively by the perusal of bills than of speeches simply. But the result is nevertheless chaos. With ten or twelve totally distinct, inconsistent, and often mutually repugnant plans for lightening the public burdens and discharging the national obligations constantly before the country, each advocated by a man of prominence, sure that he is right and that all others are wrong, the concentration of opinion on any one is impossible. The one man whose special duty it is to look after the finances disappears from view, and his policy disappears with him, and the place he ought to fill is held one week by Brown, celebrated for his devotion to the colored man; next week by Smith, famed for his labors in the cause of temperance; and the next by Baker, renowned for having cowed the Baltimore rowdies—not one of the three having probably ever bestowed a thought on "funding" till the meeting of Congress, or having any better knowledge of financial questions than what he has got from a hasty perusal of adjacent encyclopædias and histories of the Bank of England. Finally, the national policy is settled, not by the labors of one expert, under the criticism of experienced lookers-on, or even by a committee of experts, but by the concurrence of two committees, made up promiscuously of members whose claim to the place rests on party influence, or connection with an "interest," or "claims of locality," and, only rarely, special familiarity with finance or taxation. If we were to go to any business man in this city, and suggest to him that this would be a good way of managing the affairs of a great railroad, or mine, whose receipts amounted to about $400,000,000, and its expenditures to about as much, he would be highly amused, and would be still more amused if we asked him to take stock in it. We are not ardent admirers of Mr. Boutwell, but we do hold that as long as he fills the place of Secretary of the Treasury his scheme, whatever it may be, is entitled to the exclusive attention of the country; his say ought to have more weight than anybody's say, and on it, and it only, judgment should be passed; or if Congress will not support him, and does not like his plans, it ought to select somebody amongst its own members in whom it has confidence, and follow his lead.

There is, perhaps, no prejudice about the public debt more widely diffused amongst those who desire to see it honestly paid than the prejudice against having it held by foreigners. We have frequently discussed it in the Nation, and tried to show its unreasonableness, and it is creating just now one of the great difficulties of the funding process. Money cannot be borrowed in this country, it is said, at the rate of interest Government wants to pay; and if it borrows abroad, our debt will be held by strangers, or, it may be, by enemies, who may any day demand payment and plunge us in confusion and ruin. It is to this fallacy that Mr. Bowles and M. Frignet address themselves in the letters before us, showing, as we have often endeavored to show in these columns, that the analogy between the position of an individual debtor and a national debtor, on which this repugnance to foreign indebtedness is based, is not complete, and is, therefore, pro tanto, misleading. An individual can be forced to pay what he owes by being sold out, and it is, therefore, a matter of importance to him who holds his obligations. A nation cannot be forced to pay, and, therefore, it is of no importance to it who holds its obligations as long as the rate of interest is low. Nobody can compel the United States to pay its bonds till it pleases. The worst dissatisfied creditors can do is to sell their securities in open market; it is true that this might be done at an inopportune moment, and, if done on a great scale, would perhaps cause a financial crash; but then, with peace and ordinarily good government, there is nothing less likely than a rush on the part of Europeans to get rid of American securities; nothing more likely than a steady increase in the eagerness of Europeans to get and hold them. The ordinary result of a European creditor's sending home his bonds for forced sale would be the acquisition of them either by American citizens or by the Government itself, at a very low rate.

The same thing is true, mutatis mutandis, of the foreign creditors of railroads and mining corporations. If Englishmen or Germans lend money to make railroads for us at five per cent., we, in the first place, have so much the more of our own capital, on which we can make fifteen or twenty per cent., disposable for other things. They cannot carry the railroads or mines away with them; if they force the sale of their bonds in our markets, we can buy them in at low rates; if they foreclose in the courts, we can buy the roads or mines at low rates; if they do neither one nor other, we have the use of their capital at very low rates; so that the incessant export of bonds, if we were only once back to specie payments, instead of being a subject of lamentation, ought to be one of rejoicing. Bonds are not sent abroad for nothing. They are either exchanged for money, which we sorely need, or they are sent in lieu of money which we owe and cannot conveniently part with. In either case they give us the use of cheap capital; therefore, when we talk of our owing money to foreigners as making us "dependent on foreigners," we talk wildly, as M. Frignet points out. He says:

> "By encouraging foreign investments in its bonds the Federal Government reserves the national capital for private enterprise. It also, to an equal extent, saves its public corporations and citizens from going abroad for the capital which they lack, and for which they would have to pay much dearer, because the credit of an honest government will always excel that of any of its subjects, corporations, or individuals, however rich they may be.
>
> "Finally, it aids directly in the just ranking of the public debt by multiplying its employments and making rare its floating obligations. It augments its credit by the confidence shown far and near, contributing thus to form that double current of favorable opinion which constitutes the good financial renown of a nation.
>
> "This is neither an untried policy nor one especially new to the Americans. It has been practised by all European nations who wish to develop more promptly their natural resources and labor. All have sought to join in their capital that of their neighbors, proud to find, in case of conflict, as many partisans as foreign creditors. All have gained, in recompense of this sagacious course, the appreciation of their obligations, far above the limits to which the national capital alone could have carried them.

"As examples, we may take Austria, whose credit must have long since perished had its resources been confined to its national savings; Russia, who owes to foreign capital the greater part of its internal success; Italy, whose credit had never been born without foreign aid; while, as an argument taken from the opposing view, let us remark Holland, who pays dearly to-day for the efforts she has made to concentrate her debt at home. She sees her national savings absorbed by a thousand exterior investments, and, instead of contributing to the expenses of the country, seeking continually outside obligations more easily negotiable, and more available for financial purposes."

Before passing from the subject, we cannot avoid commenting on certain "pivotal propositions," as he calls them, of Mr. Sumner's, laid down, or spun round, or whatever it is one does with a "pivotal proposition," in his late speech. Said he:

"I venture to assert that if we should at an early day reduce these sixes to fives, there are millions which would be released to seek investment in other securities at six per cent., especially to the relief of the West and South. The reduction of interest to four and a half per cent. and four per cent. would release further millions. Therefore, for the sake of public enterprise in its manifold forms, for the sake of that prosperity which depends on human industry, for the sake of manufactures, for the sake of commerce, and especially for the sake of railroads by which all these are quickened, we must do what we can to reduce the general rate of interest which is now such a curb on enterprise, and here we must begin with our own bonds. Without any adverse intention, the National Government is a victorious competitor, and the defeated parties are those very enterprises whose success is so important to the country. A competition so destructive should cease. Keeping this before us in the new loan, we shall adopt that form of bond by which the interest will most surely be reduced. Thus, while refunding the national debt, we shall open the way to improvements of all kinds."

This discovery, we need hardly tell any careful reader, is a pure product of the senator's imagination. No capital at all would be "released" by any conversion of bonds. The bonds lock up no millions whatever. The money they represent was spent in the war in munitions, provisions, and the labor of fighting-men—destroyed just as effectually as if sunk in the sea. When a bond is sold or transferred, what happens is that one man takes a certain sum out of business and gives it to another, who again puts it into business. If the six per cents were changed into five per cents, a certain amount of money would change hands, that is, be transferred from one kind of productive investment to another, but no "improvement" would gain by it, unless indeed the money came from abroad; but the money would not come from abroad nearly so readily for five per cent. as for six; and, indeed, nothing does more to keep it away than "pivotal propositions" of this kind emanating from financial authorities in Congress. A bond is simply evidence that a man is entitled to receive at some future time a certain sum from the Government; but that sum the Government does not now possess and has spent, and by transferring his claim he does not get it back, he simply puts another man in his place. The point is not of much importance in itself, but it is important as illustrating the necessity for leadership on all this class of questions, and the introduction of a new order of minds to the discussion of them in the national legislature. When we see a gentleman gravely instructing the Senate and the country how to "fund" and "convert," and when and where to pay their interest, and what are the conditions of national credit, in a speech in which he shows his own inability to think out one of the simplest processes of national finance, it is a sure sign that something is wrong.

A NEW PARTY.

Not long ago, intimations were heard in no less a place than the Senate Chamber that ideas were afloat which looked to the formation of a new party. Mr. Drake even insinuated that the notion had influenced the course of senators themselves. "I have heard of such things," said he, "as individuals taking it into their heads that the Republican party was to go to pieces, and looking out to see whether they could plant their anchors to windward in the new party that was to come up. Who knows—who can tell but that this idea may have entered the sacred precincts of this Senate Chamber?" Who indeed! The Senate Chamber would, in fact, be the very first place such an idea might naturally enter, since it is the place where party perplexities are most strongly felt. Scarcely one considerable question has been raised in Congress this winter on which the Republican party has acted with unanimity. There is scarcely an important measure now before either House on which party lines are likely to be regarded. Hardly a single recommendation made by the President has been warmly supported by his party friends in Congress, and the Administration has been responsible for a very small share of what its friends in Congress have decided to do. If the President had chosen it, or if he had understood the power of his situation, he might easily have had two Administration parties in the legislature, each swearing its fidelity and devotion, instead of, as now, combining to thwart and humiliate him. There was no reason why the President should have allowed himself to be treated as he has been treated this winter. The Virginia Bill might have been passed as it came from the House. Judge Hoar need not have been rejected. The foreign treaties might have been confirmed. Mr. Dawes's attack might have been avoided. Even Mr. Boutwell's financial policy, if he had had a financial policy, might have been treated with respect, if the Administration had been strong enough to take advantage of the condition of parties in Congress. But such balancing of political combinations was not in the President's character, and he preferred to endure with patience the steady series of slights inflicted on him by friends and enemies alike.

If the Republican party is in trouble, the Democrats are quite as badly off. Their internal dissensions are more dangerous than anything the Republicans have to suffer. If it were possible to throw aside all party affiliations, many leading Democrats would be glad to do so, and take their chance of a new cast of the dice. Now that reconstruction is passed, there is scarcely a point on which Democrats are agreed, not even that of the tariff; and to purify their organization so as to regain public confidence is a long and difficult task, unless they are aided by their adversaries' mistakes.

These are some of the reasons which have led many persons to consider in grave earnest the possibility of forming a new party—an idea which has led more politicians into political bogs and quagmires than even the opposite notion of blind party devotion. One party has commonly little superiority to another in its modes of corruption; and if Tammany belongs to one side, the carpet-bag gentlemen belong to the other. But at least we can measure present evils, and can work for a gradual cure; the swarm of flies that has now settled on the nation's sores, at all events, serves to keep a hungrier swarm at a distance. Old parties, too, have a name to uphold and principles to maintain. If they make mistakes, they can be punished; if they reform, they can be rewarded. Even the old Tammany is not so alarming as a new Tammany would be; and in the upturning of a new party, who can tell what scum would rise to the top? How long was the Republican party pure? and what reason have we for believing that, if the new party is pure, it can be successful, or, if successful, that it will be a shade purer than the present organizations?

But there are reasons, much more urgent than these, for questioning the practical utility of such a movement. The reason why both of the existing parties are crumbling to pieces is, that they are unable to agree within themselves on a course to be pursued. There are two great popular issues on which alone a new party could be based. One of these is, free-trade; the other is, hard money. Neither the Republican nor the Democratic party dares honestly face both these issues at once, and the consequence is that there is no longer any established line of opinion between them. A new party, to be worth existing at all, must plant itself firmly on both these positions, or it will have no advantage over its predecessors.

Now, it is a remark attributed to Mr. Amasa Walker, that, in travelling about the country, he had met many excellent men who were very sound and correct in their free-trade principles; and he had met many gentlemen who held right opinions in regard to the currency; but so soon as the free-trader began to discuss contraction, or the hard-money man to discuss free-trade, there was no possibility of obtaining an agreement. This remark applies to the East, but it applies still more forcibly to the West. The whole Valley of the Mississippi leans to free-trade, but is hopelessly opposed to resumption, if resumption means withdrawal of greenbacks. The public was startled a short time since by a direct vote of the House of Representatives, by a large majority, in favor of expansion, and, although there is some dispute whether greenback expansion was meant, there is little doubt that most of the members did intend precisely this. The explanation is simple. In the West, the national bank system is excessively unpopular. It is looked upon as an instrument in the hands of Eastern capitalists for grinding down the faces of the Western people. In fact, the operation of the bank system cannot be defended on any grounds, and it is very possible that the East might consent to a free banking law; but this concession, which is mere justice, by no means satisfies the West, where the great mass of voters warmly oppose offering encouragement to capitalists, like Senator Cameron with his bank of $100,000 in capital and $1,000,000 in circulation. They consider bank paper as capitalists' money, and greenbacks as their own money. To withdraw greenbacks entirely is equivalent to substituting bank-notes, whereas they would rather withdraw bank-notes and substitute greenbacks as the only currency. This tendency leads directly to greenback expansion. The current has been flowing in this direction all the winter, until the House of Representatives gave expression to it the other day. Neither party dares face it, and both parties are thoroughly disorganized on it.

A new party, therefore, could not be formed on both the issues of free-trade and hard money at once. It could not be formed on free-trade without going to pieces on the currency; and it could not be formed on the currency without dividing on free-trade. There remains the chance that the expansionists may themselves take the lead, and, failing to control the Government, may go into opposition. If this could be brought about, it would at once relieve the political deadlock; but this cannot be easily done so long as the subject of revenue reform produces a cross issue which requires immediate popular decision. There seems, therefore, no reason at present to suppose that the two existing parties can either be entirely broken up or entirely reorganized. Every one will probably continue to be a party by himself for an indefinite time to come.

These suggestions are offered gratuitously to senators and others who may be watching for a chance to drop their anchors to windward, and with these we venture to offer another which we recommend to their favorable consideration. If, instead of doing what they are now engaged upon since the last month of March; that is, instead of following their own individual devices, the President and his Cabinet and the Republican senators and Congressmen would accept the idea that they have a government as well as themselves to answer for; that the duty of the Republican party is to be responsible for the government; to have a policy, and, if possible, to understand it; to meet important issues, and to meet them honestly; to plant itself on a principle, good or bad, and to stand by it, instead of allowing the President to stand upon one, his secretaries on another, senators wherever they will, and representatives, as a rule, anywhere they can; if, in short, the Republican party will consent to face the future instead of dodging and blinking it, all difficulty will cease in a moment. Under ordinary circumstances, there ought to be but two parties in any healthy country, one that conducts the administration and one that opposes it; but if both these parties at once refuse to accept responsibility, and consent to drift at random or to sink, rather than use oars and a compass and enforce co-operation, certainly neither of them deserves confidence. At the same time, it is easier to find better leaders than better parties, and a mere rearrangement of material would answer all necessary purposes. It is absurd, for example, to separate by artificial lines two public men so closely in harmony with each other as Gen. Butler and Mr. Mungen. Such a pair were never seen so justly formed to meet by nature. Much as we should, on personal considerations, regret the loss of the former to the Republican party, we cannot doubt that he would simplify the situation by uniting with Mr. Mungen to form a new combination, and such a movement would receive universal support. This is the only form of new party which is at once practicable and popular. In time, it may not impossibly be carried out, since the currency question is likely to prove the next dividing line between political organizations, and Gen. Butler's political sagacity has for years foreseen this result. If, then, the Republican party is hesitating for a policy, it can decide upon no more effective course of political tactics than that of compelling the rapid development of this new combination.

THE SECRET OF THE RISE ON STEEL.

Some of our readers may have heard of that ideally happy mining company, with an office in New York and an indefinite location somewhere, which claimed to have struck a lode of gold of infinite richness, in the working of which they experienced but one inconvenience; in order to get at it they had to work through an upper stratum of silver of inestimable value. The situation of these fortunate exploiters was hard poverty in comparison to that of the iron and steel producers of this country in case of the passage of the amended tariff recently reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. Pig-iron will then but obscure the splendors of steel.

It is very safe to say that a quarter of a million tons of new railroad iron are now annually laid down in the United States. This costs in the neighborhood of $80 per ton, and, as a whole, is proverbially poor even at that price. American railroad iron is a class by itself in Europe. Of it Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, in his report on iron and steel in the Paris Universal Exposition of 1867, remarks, not more forcibly than truly, that wherever he went, he found that "the vilest trash which could be dignified by the name of iron went universally by the name of the American rail." Over this ingenious compound, made to hold together until laid down, the citizens of the United States risk life and limb and property with superb recklessness. They do yet more. They further insist on paying for this "vilest trash" at least one-third more than other nations pay for the best and most perfect results of an improved metallurgy. Of course, no one has any right to complain. Patriotism demands a disregard of danger, whether on the field of battle or in the railroad train, and one can never do too much for his country. American industry must be protected even at the price of periodical railway slaughters.

A few years ago our tariff on steel was arranged to meet the views of the steel producers themselves. They pronounced themselves satisfied with it. Well they might! The rates on steel were then increased more than threefold, until they amounted to from 45 to 100 per cent. ad valorem. Subsequently, the internal revenue tax was taken off without any reduction of duty, and thus it was not to be wondered at that the manufacturers prospered. We propose just now to confine ourselves to the question of steel rails. Under the present tariff these are taxed 45 per cent. ad valorem, which, including the cost of transportation, is equivalent to a protection of 55 per cent. The proposed amended tariff quietly converts this duty from ad valorem to specific, and increases it to two cents per pound, or, at present prices, about doubles it. What does this mean? The replacing of our rotten iron by steel rails is the greatest present necessity of our railroad system. On it depends the safety of life and limb to all travellers; and what American does not travel? On it, in a great degree, depends the cost of transportation; and on that depends the successful marketing of the future harvests of the West. The present cost of renewing railroad iron, say the Commissioners of Massachusetts, in their recent report on steel rails, "appreciably increases the danger to life and limb of all railroad travelling, and is one principal element of the increased cost of operating American over English roads." Steel rails, which never wear out, which go to the root of this difficulty, now cost, as is shown in this same Commissioners' report, $63 currency per ton, when laid down in the track across our boundary in Canada, or 20 per cent. less than the price with us of that "vilest trash" which is known abroad as "American rail." At the present price of gold (112) the same steel rails would cost not less than $90 per ton when laid down anywhere within the United States, and the proposed and amended tariff would increase this cost to about $113. Why is this? What does it mean? What is the increase for? Why the change from ad valorem to specific duties? Last year, it seems, some 40,000 tons of steel rails were imported from abroad, and some 15,000 tons were manufactured in this country. The demand for them has just begun; the necessity of using them wherever iron rails will not last over five years is only just recognized. Experience has shown that a demand for them, far exceeding the present capacity of this country to supply, will exist even at a cost of $100, in gold, per ton. In 1865 they were purchased at a cost of $142, in gold, per ton.

Why is the future price of this article of prime necessity, which is to-day put on shipboard in Liverpool at $43 per ton, thus sought to be fixed for the future by law in the United States at not less than $100? The answer is a very simple one; science seemed likely to do something for us in spite of ourselves. It is because a suicidal so-called protection of American industry demands that the ripe results of time shall be excluded from America. In May next what are known as the Bessemer patents expire. The world will then be free to enjoy, untaxed, the results of the great inventor's skill, and steel will replace iron on the railroads of the world—America, of course, always excepted. Here is the key to this change from ad valorem to specific duties. When the patent should expire, it was found that steel rails would fall to $40, or less, per ton, and the ad valorem duty, exchange, freight, and currency combined could hardly raise them above $70 in the tracks of the United States. Here was an appalling danger. This would never do; steel would become common and the "American rail" be but a name. Life would, indeed, be more secure; but what is life to lucre? Instantly the manufacturers of steel flocked to Washington; the Committee of Ways and Means was manipulated; the cry of "British gold" was raised; the spirit of patriotism was invoked—and not without success. While the duty was ad valorem, however indirect it might be, we nevertheless could not but in some degree participate in the advantage which the whole other world was freely to enjoy when the Bessemer patents expired. A duty of 45 per cent. on steel costing $40 per ton was, at any rate, less than the same duty on steel costing $60 per ton. The Committee saw to the closing of that loophole at once. A little change from ad valorem to specific instantly put a stop to all ideas of America participating in the benefit of an expired patent. The ad valorem duty, after next May, would have amounted to about $18 per ton—a mere bagatelle unworthy of the name of protection! The proposed specific duty of two cents per pound acts free from all such fluctuating measures of value, and affords the American producer something worthy of the name of protection. Well may he, strongly fortified behind this Chinese wall of $45 specific duty per ton, in place of, perhaps, $18 ad valorem, laugh at the expiring of patents. To be sure, this means an increased number of railway accidents; it means more Carr's-Rock and Long Island slaughters; more murdering, mangling, and maiming; it means less wheat exported; fewer acres cultivated; a perpetual tax on harvests, and the days of specie payment deferred. It means all of these, and it also means a great deal more. It means trial, and perhaps death, to other branches of American industry entitled to at least as much consideration as are the Moloch-producers of American steel.

There is a time-honored injunction which commands us not only to live, but to let live. It is not much regarded in certain schools of economical thought. If there is one branch of American industry of which we have a right to be proud, it is of our success in the manufacture of edged tools, and those other implements into which steel, the raw material, enters as a principal component. No longer ago than the 5th of February last, the London Times made this remarkable admission: "The manufacturers of the United States can import iron and steel from this country at a heavy duty, work up the metal by highly paid labor, and beat us out of the market after all with the manufactured article. . . . The Americans succeed in supplanting us by novelty of construction and excellence of make." This is certainly high commendation. The "heavy duty" here referred to on the raw material used by these ingenious and enterprising fellow-citizens of ours, is the present duty of two and a quarter or three cents per pound, equivalent to $50 and $67 per ton; it is now proposed to raise this to three and a quarter and four cents per pound, or $73 and $88 per ton. One class, indeed, is raised from 30 per cent. ad valorem to three and a quarter cents per pound specific, or from $13 to $72 80 per ton—a trifling increase of only 460 per cent. This is protection with a vengeance, but not exactly to American industry. The Times need no longer fear that the English manufacturer will be driven out of the market by the American. We have bravely provided against that.

While this process of protecting one industry into a costly life and two others into bankrupt graves is happily going on, it may not be out of place to enquire into the relative value and importance of the interests thus dealt with. The returns of 1867 seemed to indicate that the manufacturers of articles into which steel entered as a principal component were to us of at least thirty times the industrial importance of the manufacturers of steel, the raw material. The books of our leading dealers in steel indicate the same results. To one man engaged in the manufacture of steel, the raw material, there are twelve men engaged in manufactures into which that steel as a raw material must enter as the essential component. These last are those men who through "novelty of construction and excellence of make" have, the Times tells us made American tools known the world over. These men, representing our best brain and best muscle—the élite of American industry and American enterprise—are to be driven from the markets of the world in the name of protection to American industry. "Call you that backing of your friends? A plague upon such backing! Give me them that will face me."

Already, as is well known, the trade-marks of these manufacturers have been more than once pirated in England. The English courts have protected them; the American Committee of Ways and Means proposes to destroy them. We ourselves know that certain large foreign producers of steel have already considered the expediency, in case of the passage of Messrs. Schenck and Hooper's bill of amendments, of importing bodily—trade-marks, reputation, workmen, and all—some well-known American manufacturing concerns, and of thus securing the control of foreign markets; to make, in fact, American edged tools by American workmen and American ingenuity, of the untaxed steel of the Old World, and on European soil. Of course, it is argued and iterated and reiterated that our manufacturers should use American steel; that American steel is a "better article" than the foreign. Most unfortunately, those American manufacturers who have, according to the times, driven the English from the markets of the world, are of a different opinion, both they and their customers. They may be all wrong; they may unquestionably be taught to think as they do by "British gold;" we ourselves are neither steel producers nor manufacturers of steel, and can express no opinion as to whether the course of these individuals and those who buy their wares is dictated by natural perversity or simple corruption. The result is pretty much the same in any case, if they actually lose their markets. They generally know their own business pretty well, as is the case with most men who have achieved marked success. When they say that, under certain circumstances, they must surrender the markets of the world, they are to be presumed to know something of that whereof they speak. With the remedy of some recent legislation in protection of the copper interests still green in memory, we are disposed to believe them. We have heard of meats which were one man's food and another man's poison; we have ourselves witnessed before this many specimens of that protective legislation which may be one man's riches and is certainly ten men's ruin.

THE POLICE OF SOCIETY.

We took the liberty of asking last week whether Collector Grinnell had attended an entertainment given by Mr. James Fisk, Jr. We are very glad to say we have since been informed on the best authority that he was invited to it, but declined. It has been reported for two or three weeks that he, with several others who ought to have known better, had attended it, and if he had, it would certainly have been a great scandal. Our enquiry was not an agreeable one to make, and it was one of a class which we as a rule studiously avoid, but the making of which the code on which a good many "prominent men" of all callings seem disposed to regulate their social action will, we fear, force more and more on the newspapers—that is, if the newspapers are willing to do their duty.

To give an adequate idea of what that code is, and how it works, we shall have to give our remarks a somewhat ponderous, philosophical air, but there is nothing in disquisitions of this kind, as all Congressmen know, like laying the foundations broad and deep. We have more than once called our readers' attention to the fact that the rather old and well-known doctrine, that there is no absolute right or wrong, but that what passes under that name is human convention framed for the comfort and convenience of society—and therefore differs, and properly differs, in different places—has been revived, and is now held extensively by modern French materialists. But then these materialists believe that whatever the origin of the moral code of the community in which they live, its utility gives it an unanswerable claim on their respect and obedience. They, therefore, hold cheating and stealing to be, if not absolutely wrong, wrong ad hoc, and they help society to punish these vices not only by enforcing the law against them, in so far as the law reaches them, but by treating those who are guilty of them with disrespect, and excluding them from their society. Consequently, it cannot be said that France or any other country has suffered any perceptible damage from the new school.

Now, over here it is doubtful whether these opinions are held by any one; they are certainly not preached, but they are extensively practised. A large and increasing number of persons act, not as if they believed there was no absolute right or wrong, but as if they thought it was a question on which everybody was not only entitled to have an opinion of his own, but to act in any manner he pleased—which is simply reducing toleration to absurdity. That is, A. discovers that B. steals; but he refrains carefully in his intercourse with B. from indicating in any way that he regards stealing with displeasure. He thinks it wrong himself, but behaves as if he thought that B. was entitled to hold a different opinion about it, and put it into practice. A. will hardly defend himself formally in this way—because this would be an enunciation of the Frenchman's theory, which he, as a church-goer, and perhaps communicant, regards at least with ex-officio horror. What he says is that, if we knew all, we should probably find that B. was not so much to blame after all; or that, we all feel that under certain temptations we might steal ourselves; or that, B. "will come out all right in the end," and ought to have a chance; or that there are plenty of others just as bad as he, though not so notorious; or that, since he stole, he has given money to an hospital, or educated a poor boy; or, finally, that if the law does not reach him, A. is not going to do police duty about him. The general result is that B. has just as pleasant a time, and enjoys as much impunity, as if his friends and neighbors held the materialist doctrine in its bald simplicity, and that a crop of rogues of unprecedented enterprise, and audacity, and ingenuity, has grown up all over the country, and is putting in peril every kind of property, not to speak of things more valuable than property.

There are some, nay, a great many, good people who excuse themselves for their failure or neglect to support the moral code in their social intercourse by the plea, that they hate sin but cannot hate sinners, and that while they have a hearty abhorrence of thieving, for the thief they can feel and show nothing but kindness and indulgence. Now there is no fact in human experience better settled than that the mass of mankind are utterly incapable of separating attributes from persons, and dealing out different judgments on each. Such feats of distinction and refinement as this have, perhaps, been performed by persons of extraordinary subtlety of mind, and of settled habits of introspection, contracted and cultivated in contemplative solitude. They are possible, in short, to saints of the old type. They are not possible to the average modern man. Nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand of those who find a thief pleasant company end by thinking lightly of theft. In the stock market, and caucus, and court-room of our day, the vices have to be personified and embodied in living, breathing, acting liars or knaves to call forth or keep up any dislike of them strong enough to be of the slightest value to society. Moreover, it is one of the well-established laws of moral growth, that virtues can only be cultivated successfully by the active practice of them. It is vain to try to be generous, if we never give; to try to be pitiful, if we never succor; to be forgiving, if we never expose ourselves to receive injuries; to be courageous, if we never approach danger; to be strong, if we never strive. Nothing is easier to acquire, and nothing of much less value after it is acquired, and nothing commoner, than "the fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and seeks her adversary." We may therefore push our position further and say, that without the active cultivation of dislike of knaves, dislike of knavery will not long survive, except in rare natures, which will, of course, always be found in every society, but can no more save it or govern it than the flute can sound cavalry calls in action. In life's desperate battle, nothing but the trumpet can keep the ranks closed, and the laggards to their work, and even the trumpet must give no uncertain sound.

Whatever increase of dishonesty there is in commerce to-day, and whatever increase of corruption there is in politics, are due, in a great degree, we firmly believe, not so much to any increase in the bad tendencies of human nature, as to the abandonment or neglect, by those who know the right and love it, of the duty of applying social penalties to those who violate the rules of morality on which the social fabric rests. For much of this laches the philanthropic world is, by one of those strange perversions of which history is full, directly responsible, by giving a forced and unnatural value to such virtues as happened at the moment to be most necessary for their purpose, and making zeal in the performance of one duty atone for shocking disregard of most of the others. The result has been that the moral sense of the very best portion of the community has been, if we may use the expression, thrown out of gear, and one of the most puzzling questions of the day to many people now is to decide who is a rascal and who a saint. Fisk has done many doubtful things, but we have all seen, and all see, men who have done, and are doing, things quite as bad, wearing the halo of sanctity for having done something else that was good, and one can hardly open a party paper, or even a religious paper, without finding some very notorious violator of the principal moral canons spoken of with the greatest respect, all owing to his having had the 'cuteness to practise one or two popular virtues.

There are people who think that we can let the moral judgment get into this flabby condition in private life without evil effects on our politics and on the administration of justice. There never was a greater mistake. Politics is not an abstract idea simply; neither is justice. They really mean for social purposes a certain number of acts performed by a certain number of men. Government is not ground off or law administered by machine. They are both the work of men who hold the ideas and live by the morality of their time, and we cannot get any stronger sense of rectitude, any greater hatred of vice, into the legislature or the jury-room than we have in the market-place. We cannot, in short, if we have respectable merchants taking little suppers with thieves, and cheats and panders occupying high offices of government, expect legislators and lawyers to be very eager in hunting down criminals. If we did expect it, we should be greatly disappointed, for certainly people are not as particular about the company they keep as they were twenty years ago, and accordingly the things which depend on the moral fibre of the community are not what they were twenty years ago—the bench, the bar, the prisons, and the legislatures.

The time may come—heaven send it soon—when every man will be relieved from the duty of sitting in judgment on his neighbor, when the individual conscience will keep the world in order, and every man's weaknesses and errors be left between him and his Maker. But that has clearly not come yet. From the efforts which a great many good men have made to persuade people that it has come, and from the selfish laziness with which so many of us have accepted their conclusions, great evil has resulted. The police of society can never be abandoned by individuals until the wicked cease from troubling. That there are still plenty of knaves, and perhaps more able and astute knaves than ever were seen, still at work, everybody knows. There is hardly a field of human activity which does not contain whole armies of indefatigable scoundrels, and any strong man who embraces them and bids them go their way in peace, has on his soul all the spoiling of the helpless and grinding of the poor which they afterwards commit.

FRANCE.—OLLIVIER VERSUS GAMBETTA.

PARIS, February 11, 1870.*

AGAIN the rolling of drums in the streets, and columns of newspapers filled with details of so-called émeutes! Yet, according to my belief, all this, far from being dangerous, is full of healthy signs, for it proves to even the most apprehensive of Parisians that what they are pleased to term "revolution" is thousands of miles distant. Revolution is simply not "in the air," and that being the case, all the hooting and shouting and crying of "Vive Rochefort!" in the world will not bring it about. There are many practical reasons for the demise of "revolution" here in France, but the one great one is that it is used up. The French people as a mass, as an overwhelming majority of all classes, are tired of it—they have had enough of it. They have had revolutions of every kind and sort in the last eighty years, and that which any violent movement can achieve has been achieved, and what remains to be got cannot possibly be so by violence, but is pre-eminently a work of time.

It is probable that, had the old French noblesse been of a different character, all that has been wrung from them might have been peaceably obtained. It was not so, and to establish equality it is said to have been requisite to cut off men's heads. Well, let that pass. The heads were cut off, and the equality exists so thoroughly that in every serious career the man not noble has a better chance than he who is. (I am not speaking of the vanities and fictions of the world, but of serious and laborious careers.) The next thing after abolishing caste distinctions was to equalize wealth. This has been done with a vengeance. A man starts from his village with a five-franc piece, and in two or three years he is one of the "nouveaux riches" and marries his daughter to a duke, which duke's family receive him and his, and live with them now familiarly. All this has been obtained, and up to a certain point the revolutions of '93 and '30 and '48 are all explicable. Then we come to the coup d'état and the stolid, weighty despotism of the Second Empire. This, too, has been got rid of in principle and cannot be revived. But what the so-called "Republicans" of Belleville, or "Socialists," or demagogues, or whatever friends or foes choose to call them, are bawling for is something that all the fighting in the world cannot secure. They ask for the equality that nature wills not; for the equality of the strong with the weak, of the capable with the incapable, of the good with the bad; they ask for the absurd; and that is why they are not dangerous, and why the oftener they get up these small émeutes the more they show that the "public" is not with them; that the hard-working public has nothing in common with them.

* The publication of this letter has been delayed.—ED. NATION.

This is an undoubted gain. I am of those who think Ollivier has made many mistakes; but things have been stronger than his shortcomings, and the "logic of the position," as they say here, has supported him through what would otherwise have been his ruin. It was a great mistake to have demanded the permission to prosecute Rochefort, and, had the situation been other than it is, the Ministry might for such a mistake have paid dearly. But, as I said before, violence is dead for mischief; it may make a noise still, but it is all powder—no ball. After Rochefort's prosecution, the mildness of the sentence passed upon him almost remedied the whole evil, and he was beginning to fade away out of the preoccupations of the public mind when arose the question of his arrest. Here the whole glory was for Gambetta, whose speech is still the event of the day. For the first time, Ollivier has seen both sides of the House join together in attacking what he proposed.

"It is law which must be upheld," was the argument of the keeper of the seals; "a man has been condemned, he must be arrested—this is legal."

"You will be told that mere legality will kill you," cried the notorious Marquis de Piré, a member of the extreme Right.

"For Law, in such cases, substitute Policy," said quietly Gambetta. "No one disputes your right to do what you choose, armed, as you are, with a legal sentence. You may, legally, commit a tremendous mistake, if you don't perceive that it is one. But what kind of politicians are you, if you do not see what it is wise to do, and do it?"

In this tone Gambetta made his entire speech, and produced an impression such as no one else has produced for perhaps half a century. It was concise, sternly eloquent, and went to the real core of the question, which all others had avoided. It is the first time that men of this time in France have heard the language of genuine statesmanship, and the effect was such that the very members of the so-called ministerial majority every now and then broke out into irrepressible applause, and only checked themselves when the reflection came that the speaker was not "one of them." I repeat it: this speech of Gambetta's has been really and truly an event, and helps evidently to show what the tendency of the Chamber must and will be in the proximate future.

The falseness of Ollivier's position has not only now been clearly shown, but the combination that will naturally succeed him shows itself also clearly. Had the new Ministry, which (by courtesy) people call the "Ollivier Ministry," gone straight to work and done the duty to do which it was expressly called to office, it would now have been so strong that the chances are Gambetta, with his vigorous political instinct, would have gone over to it. To have achieved this status Ollivier had but one thing to do: he had to frame and present a new electoral law, or to resign then and there. This kind of resolution lies not in his nature, and he allowed himself to hesitate and "the moment" to escape him.

It was not the "dissolution" that was the measure absolutely necessary—that was a contingency. It was perfectly possible to have kept on the present Chamber for a year, so as not to convulse the country by fresh elections yet, and from the present Chamber obtain the reformed law that would eventually destroy it. It would be by no means the first case of an assembly voting its own destruction simply because each individual conceives that the new and reformed state of things will not be unfavorable to him. Well, then, the reformed electoral law was the one sine quâ non. Had Ollivier declared this to the Emperor in the very beginning, he would have kept the control over events in his own hands, for either Napoleon III. would have resisted, and Ollivier, resigning power under these circumstances, would have become the Inevitability of a long future, or the Emperor would have consented (which is almost certain), and Ollivier would have at once reigned, and been able to carry out any good France might require.

Instead of this, what has he done? He has consented to "wait," which is always fatal where despots are expected to aid the liberal ministries forced upon them; and he has drifted into an alliance with the Right, under the threat half implied by M. Thiers, that the Ministry and the majority were distinct. The Left, that is, the men whose secon lary consider ation is the precise form of the government, whether monarchy or republic, so long as there exists self-government—the Left has now manifestly the future in its hands. Either this Ministry, to save itself, will, at the last hour, be obliged to dissolve the Chamber and issue the writs for new elections, under a modified electoral law; or it will try to do as M. Guizot did in 1848, and, in the support of the status quo, be itself destroyed, though quite peaceably so. In either case, the Left must inevitably be called in; for any attempt to recede and rely upon M. de Forcade and his colleagues would be simply provisional.

The instant the men who follow (and sincerely obey) Gambetta shall be established in power, the electoral reform will be brought forward, and a genuine new order of things will be inaugurated. But for this really new order of things Ollivier has incapacitated himself, and since Gambetta's speech has thrown its broad, steady light over things and men, it is clear that Ollivier's part is played, and that he himself will be "played out" when he retires from office. He who came in as the advanced member of the Cabinet, as the Minister whose ultra-Liberal tendencies his more routine-loving colleagues dreaded—he has so completely descended to their level that, in any defeat now, they would regard him as one of themselves.

"He had not the will for this conjuncture," said an ex-diplomat of him, last night, at the fête of the Hôtel de Ville.

"He has not the chin for it!" added a lady sitting close by. "Look at his profile!" It is true, seen in the strong light of a thousand lamps, Ollivier's side-face had the weak, chinless outline of Maximilian, of Mexican renown!

Correspondence.

AN EXPLANATION FROM THE "LOOKER-ON."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I beg the favor of your columns for some reply which I believe I have to make, on my own account, to the attack of the Woman's Journal on the first article entitled "Notes on the Woman's Rights Agitation," already noticed in the Nation. And first, dropping the grateful mantle of the plural pronoun, I declare that I am she (persistently called a "he" through one whole column of the Journal) who wrote the article alleged to be from the pen of a man darkly plotting with his fellow-conspirators in the editorial chair of the Nation to stab the cause of Woman's Rights with a blade awkwardly concealed in the folds of a lady's gown.

With the style of compliment heaped on the assumed performance of this precious masquerader, from the elegant heading of the review, "Barking up the Wrong Tree," through all its fables of "Wolf and Red Riding-Hood," of "beggars, uncertain whether they want cider or water," of "Adam's wife, pitched within and without with pitch"—with these graces of diction I feel too utterly unable to cope to propose to recall them otherwise than as it may be necessary in connection with the charge that has moved me to take up my pen in answer. The Journal asserts that I have not uttered a syllable which has any bearing whatever upon the Woman's Rights Agitation. This is the affirmation that I would consider.

When any question is brought before the public, involving wide-reaching issues touching the whole social and civil fabric, is not the presentation of all matters affecting that question clearly in order? With the prominence which this agitation has assumed to-day, I consider, when I now read an essay in any journal, book, or magazine, on divorce, co-education of the sexes, employment for women, masculine and feminine distinctions of character, that I am reading an article bearing on that subject known to the general public under the general name of "Woman's Rights." I consider that, if such article has been recently written, the author wrote it thinking of woman's rights, and expected his readers to read it so. And I, as a daughter of Massachusetts to-day, read such article in the view of some added help towards making up my mind whether or not I shall petition the Legislature of my State for the right to vote.

The platform speakers on this question have their place and time, and their own order of debate—an order, too, by the way, which almost inevitably leads to certain faults glaringly conspicuous to those outside the more or less heated arena where they move. These outsiders may, perhaps, be in considerably more sympathy with the essential convictions of the advocates than these latter imagine, and in the very ratio of such sympathy will be their sensitiveness to all the disfigurements with which the orators injure the common truth, which we, equally with them, would like to see elicited and established.

The present writer is not a platform speaker on woman suffrage; if she were, it would become her bounden duty to make some special studies before having a right to enter on the campaign. But any woman who reflects at all has been making some studies all her life, not without relation to to-day's topic; and if she has a fancy for wielding the pen, she has a right to set forth the results of these, and to expect from those of her own sex whose very claim is for freedom, freedom to speak her mind, however poor a mind it may be, without being arraigned on the most odious of all charges, that of dissembling and playing a part.

If marriage and divorce are not discussed in woman's rights meetings, I do not know what is discussed there. If a strained presentation of the depravity of man and the sainthood of woman—not corresponding by any means to the facts of life, as women know them, whether men do or not—if this is not conspicuous in the harangues of the reformers, I know not what is conspicuous in them. And verily, if the scales have not been sufficiently pulled to one side to justify a rather impetuous jerk to the other, by a hand that has some small impulse to set things even, then there never was partial pleading in this world; and it seemed to me that the criticisms which justice required in this direction were more fitting for women to make than for men. I suppose it may be according to the ideas of the Woman's Journal to ask me here, Why did you not call your articles, then, "Views on Divorce," on "Female Genius," etc.? Why take the name of the Cleveland Convention and of Woman's Rights in vain at the outset of your irrelevant disquisitions? I answer, because that identical Cleveland Convention was the very thing that wound us up and set us going on these subjects at all. We were not there, certainly, but you were, having a most particular eye on us, too, as we very soon found out. On us, American women, scattered all over these Massachusetts hills—over the hills and through the valleys of how many other States of this Union—you called with a most direct and personal summons to arise and prepare the way for the chariot of woman's suffrage, and make its paths straight. We should have supposed you would have been glad to know that we had received your circulars, and read them; that some of us had verily begun to take a look at the highway, and see what rubbish was there likely to block your wheels. Certainly we could not be sure all in a moment that this was the very celestial advent to our sex; but a good many of us had wished for an advent of some kind. We had realized some pretty grievous bondages, fetters of the old Past, which this more gracious, enlightened Present might have skill to unclasp, with large gain to us and no damage to the race. This last item, however, we believed was to be taken into the reckoning we had to make; that the final interest of humanity includes our best interests; that there was no possibility here of a party cause. This was one of our convictions, fixed as the everlasting hills.

You will say, perhaps, that it is in the strength of that very conviction that you fight, that your creed is that not only individual women, but all women and all men will profit by this change; we do not deny your creed, we listen to much that you say with a good deal more attention than you give us credit for, but—we wish to listen awhile longer, and we hearken to the other side also, and ineffably silly things we hear said there, too, very often. But still, to a firm decision we cannot instantly come; be it from superstition, timidity, or crass stupidity, such is the fact.

The word "neutral," then, so reviled by the Woman's Journal, is the word which, in the poverty of speech, must needs represent our position, and is it necessary to explain to intelligences exalted to editorial dignities that neutrality in spiritual things, in matters where the soul wavers between conscience and desire, is one neutrality, and neutrality where the understanding is yet perplexed between a thousand conflicting claims is altogether another? Attention to both sides, a suspense of judgment between the two, is the attitude that foreruns all intelligent choice, and I ask, if we who as yet can sincerely take no other on a most intricate question, are therefore in such brimstone company that we must be called "the devil's allies," over Henry Ward Beecher's head, or anybody's else? As for the sacred Teacher also quoted against us, there is one thing for which we do often groan even in our New England spirit, and that is a small dispensation of Romish priests to nail the Bible up on a shelf so high that its divine meanings can no more be plucked out and twisted into profane wads by every hand that has shot to fire.

Well, it occurred to one member of that nether fellowship, so anathematized of the Woman's Journal—it occurred to one of that sulphurous society as absolutely the most obedient thing she could do to the call of the circulars to take up her pen and say—what she did say, in short. This response to the summons you had made not to one, but to all women, might not have the perfect fulness that you desired, but the dead are they who answer not at all; even the sleeping (for we are derided as being asleep, among our other deridings) who talk in their dreams and wander as dreamers do are not the most hopeless of subjects, since they at least show themselves alive enough to mutter. Truly, you might have found some scrap of good omen in the bare fact that we were so far alive to your question as to be thinking it over, after our fashion. It was not a deaf and dumb audience that you wanted, and surely you were not seeking the assent of puppets, since the very claim of your cause is that women are beings endowed with the full complement of human faculties, therefore capable of some independent convictions.

For the rest, I named my remarks mere "Notes;" I stated in their beginning the simple, literal fact as to the circumstances which led to their presentation. I chose for the main topic of the first number a topic more fitting, to be sure, for others to argue than myself, but still chose it because I knew of nothing in the whole range of the discussion which so prejudiced the best of the community against the cause as the oracles continually delivered on it by those who professedly fight under the banners of Woman's Suffrage. I know not what there was therein which wrongly accused any; it had no personal applications, save to exhort the true in this army to repudiate most vigilantly all their bad allies, and to warn such allies that we would none of their abominations.

The Woman's Journal held its sublime head above all our disquietudes; verily, it had never heard the rumor before of any of these low things; it described itself as being aware only of "the majestic advance of a conquering host which, officered and engineered by the grandest thinkers and purest moralists of the world, with banners flying, the stately music of a full and accordant band, was pressing on to victory;" and it rapped on the head the simple taker of "Notes" as a being emerging from a back alley, breaking in with a horrid "tin-pan and fish-horn clangor," and shrill reports of "vulgar wrangling and misdeeds" to disturb its ecstatic march of triumph. We are glad the Woman's Journal finds the world such a glorified parade-ground. It must be very jolly. We begin to have misgivings lest it dwells in a region of vision into which we cannot ascend. The back alleys, however, have got into our wretched heads as places to which the new law will also require to be fitted—yes, to the back alleys and the front avenues, to the highways and the byways, and for all the feet of the weak and the wicked and the miserable that go up and down them, there must be no new snares laid, even that the strong and the pure may walk in more perfect freedom.

But this imbecile man who writes in the Nation, struggling to personate a more imbecile woman, succeeding only in being "incoherent, rambling, weak, illogical, and unscrupulous." Alas! how shall the suggestions of such an outcast and desperado hope to be heard. "There is another type of woman abroad in the world now," is the smashing supplement to the above string of adjectives, with which we are finally remanded to the depths from which we had dared to arise. Yes, we should say that nobler "type of woman" was abroad—very far abroad indeed—out probably on that tremendous training show—most certainly not at home in the editorial chair of the Woman's Journal on the day when "Barking up the Wrong Tree" was written.

LULU GRAY NOBLE.

WILBRAHAM, MASS., Feb. 24.

PERSONAL REPRESENTATION AGAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your article of February 3 upon "Personal Representation," you express your surprise that I should take exception to your identifying the New York plan with the "theory of delegation." But at the end of your article you admit that any system of minority representation which will enable "the railroad interest or what not to combine to run in a member" is "just what we want." As this grants all that I could claim, I must conclude that I misapprehended the scope of your original criticism upon this point.

You now say that you had supposed the "theory of delegation" to be the "peculiar merit claimed for the New York plan; why else should one member of a legislative body have double the voting power of another, if not because he is supposed to reflect the wills and opinions of double the number of votes?" My answer to this is, because we hold (and I shall now indicate the grounds of our belief) that, by giving to legislators the power of voting in proportion to the number of their constituents, we should greatly improve the chances of securing the presence in the Legislature of members of the highest character. You will admit that this is the real aim to be sought after in any project of representative reform. Mere numerical symmetry is of comparatively small importance; nay, such symmetry, I am convinced, would be purchased at quite too dear a rate by the adoption of any of the numerous plans of minority representation with small districts. These projects are mostly so contrived that they would practically result in the election only of the candidates nominated by the party managers on each side; and as it would be provided by the system that each party should be assured of electing its numerical proportion of members, the people would lose the advantage they now have in the competition of the two parties for each district. For my part, I prefer to bear the ills we have rather than experiment with any new plan which clings to the "small district system." It is the consciousness of the tenacity with which this system is rooted in popular favor that has made many of us unwilling to urge any practical change in the plan of representation, until discussion shall have demonstrated to the public the necessity of yielding its prejudices upon this point.

The most essential feature of a good representative system is, then, that it shall ensure the presence in the Legislature of the highest attainable stamp of men, and I have indicated why most of the plans proposed would leave us no better off, or even worse off than at present, in this regard. It remains, therefore, for me to point out what would be the practical advantage of the New York plan in this respect.

Supposing that the New York plan were now adopted, I would engage that the opening of the fall campaign should see at least two of the foremost men in this State proposed as candidates for the Legislature—men of such personal character, such recognized standing, such well-known abilities—in a word, men so esteemed by all, that each of them would go to Albany as the trusted representative of at least fifty thousand voters. Such men, if once thus enlisted in the public service, would never leave it, save by their own desire. Their conduct of public affairs at Albany might be such as to increase or to diminish the number of voters by whom they would be returned at the succeeding election, but they would run no risk of being "left out in the cold" by the petty manœuvres of a nominating convention at the next canvass. In the Legislature itself they would sway the influence not merely of the large number of votes entrusted to them, but likewise the perhaps greater authority which they would exercise by their presence and their character. They would carry with them what is known among Quakers as "the weight of the meeting;" and I think you will agree that it would be found in practice to be a point of trivial importance whether they gave their votes according to the number of their constituents, "in all divisions," or only "in all votes by yeas and nays." How many a silly or fraudulent project would wither at a word from one of such members of the Legislature!

Now, we claim that our plan would give us not merely two members, but many members of a character corresponding more or less with this ideal. The power and influence which a really first-class man would wield under our system, and the security of tenure he would enjoy, would be such as to justly attract the ambition of men of the highest order.

You will allow that it is no just criticism to allege that in a Legislature chosen on our plan, Mr. Sweeny, Mr. Tweed, the Erie clique, and the Twenty-third Street gang would all be represented. Of course, they would be there, but they would be represented only by the numerical strength of such a number of voters (large at the first elections) as might be induced to give their ballots to candidates nominated under such auspices, when really first-class men of both parties were in the field. And these candidates, when elected to the legislative chambers, would find themselves under the vigilant eye of a class of men to whose supervision (except through agencies like the public press) they have hitherto been strangers.

We shall be accused of extravagance in such prognostications, but to us it seems a practical truth that first-class men can best be secured for our legislatures by offering to their ambition such inducements of great power and fixed tenure as our plan contemplates. You will observe likewise that both the quantity of power thus swayed, as well as the fixity of tenure, are wholly dependent upon the approval of each legislator by the people at large, and are entirely independent of the machinery belonging to any political party.

We further believe that, setting aside all the minor disadvantages of the other plans of representative reform, they will all be found immeasurably inferior to ours in this essential point; for, to state our case in its weakest form, it is undeniable that our plan gives the people at least a chance (whether they choose or not to exercise it) to elect such men as I have described, and we think it equally clear that, as a practical question, such men will rarely be found willing to spend the winter in Albany, representing only a small constituency, and struggling to assert their influence amid a crowd of inferior men, each with equal legislative power.

We want to see in our legislative body many men of at least the character and ability possessed by our late senator, Mr. Folger—men who, when nominated by their friends, would be sure of polling a great vote without any assistance from political arts or any need of a canvass. We want to arm these men with the power, not of any restricted constituency, but of all those citizens who respect and trust them. We want to free them from all dependence upon any nominating convention for re-election. All these objects would certainly be most desirable, and we believe that they would be most certainly attainable by our plan.

One of the New York Personal Representation Society.

THE TARIFF ON BOOKS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your comments on my communication—"Ideas by the Pound"—in the Nation for March 3 would seem to require a few words in reply. In common, I suspect, with most of your readers, it never occurred to me that your previous articles on the projected book tariff were directed merely against a little tract which summarized the arguments in favor of a specific rate of 25 cents per pound. The Nation is so little in the habit of erecting windmills to tilt at, that I think I was justified in asking your attention to the discrepancies between your remarks and the rates actually proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, together with the details of those urged by the publishers, all of which were accessible to you. They can hardly be called "totally irrelevant" to the discussion of the subject.

You must allow me to assert that my calculations were "vitiated" by no "curious error." I showed that the proposed rate of 25 cents per pound would leave a profit of 73 per cent. between the cost in London and the wholesale price in America of Bohn's Libraries, though, by the importers' own showing, on these books the proposed rate would make an increase of duty double that which would arise on the average of books. Whether the English publisher would secure the whole of this himself by dealing, as many do, direct with jobbers and retailers here, or whether he would divide it with an American importer, is a matter of the smallest possible concern either to the argument or the public. A business which pays 73 per cent. is not going to be abandoned because a proposed change in the tariff may reduce its profit to that figure from 172 per cent., and, therefore, such a change cannot be termed "prohibitory" or "ruinous" in either an absolute or a "relative" sense.

It appears to me that you accept the statements of the importers with very little of the scrutiny which you bestow on the arguments of the publishers. Thus, you quote without examination, to show that no additional protection is needed, a calculation of the importers' memorial which fixes at 55 cents the cost of manufacture in America of a volume similar to those in Bohn's Libraries, when that calculation not only underrates the cost of paper and print, but actually omits altogether the outlay for composition or stereotyping—an item which your printer's bills must probably have shown you to be a most important element in the cost of publication. In the very article in Old and New on which you comment, you might have seen a calculation, including all expenses, which shows that on an ordinary edition such a volume would cost the American manufacturer $1 02 if a reprint, and, of course, considerably more if an original copyright work.

Permit me, in turn, to point out a "curious error" which "vitiates" the statement you have endorsed as to the enormous increase of duty consequent upon the specific rate of 25 cents—an increase asserted in the Nation and the importers' memorial to range from 41 to 200 per cent., and to average 96 per cent. You quote the "heaviest importers of Bohn's Libraries" to the effect that it is exceptional for the London publishers to give "a discount even approaching 50 per cent." Now, if you will examine the importers' memorial, you will see that in every instance the existing ad valorem duty is calculated on an assumed discount of 50 per cent., and that all its assertions of increased duty under the specific rate are based on this assumed existing valuation of 50 per cent. Which are we to believe—the assertion in the Nation of March 3 or the assertion in the Nation of Feb. 24—the importers' communication to you, or the importers' memorial to Congress? A PUBLISHER.

[If "A Publisher" is satisfied that his charge of "blind denunciation" was unwarranted, we shall not press the irrelevancy of remarks made in support of such a charge. We fail to see how, on his part, he has disposed of the "curious error" we pointed out, or why it is "of the smallest possible concern," in a calculation touching the profits of American importers (who certainly have some rights that American publishers are bound to respect), whether or not they are to be identified with the English manufacturers, whose customers merely they are. The assumed cost of making a book in this country such as one of Bohn's, which was set down in the memorial, we had the less hesitation in accepting because, apart from our faith in the honesty of the authors of it, we knew them to be large manufacturers as well as importers. In a dispute of this nature we do not profess to take part as experts; but we can understand the memorialists when they tell us that they omitted the cost of composition and stereotyping (in a word, the cost of making plates) because, first, no publisher would undertake to reprint a foreign work which he did not think would pay for the plates, and, secondly, because the plates, once made, become a part of the capital stock, and are properly reckoned so in the accounts of every publishing house. If this were not the case—if the plates of a book are to be considered as sunk—then we should probably see "A Publisher" giving them away to the first applicant, after the sale of the edition. So far would he be from doing this, that he would sell them for as nearly what they cost him as he could get—realizing two prices for them: that recovered by the sale of the edition, and that obtained from the subsequent purchaser of them. "A Publisher" may perhaps remember that Mr. Abraham Hart, of the firm of Carey & Hart, made himself nearly a millionaire by the sale of his plates alone. The estimate of Old and New divided the cost of plates between an edition of 2,500; but it is easy to see that this is quite arbitrary, and that we have only to suppose a case in which the sale of a reprint reaches ten, twenty, or thirty thousand—as it might—to have the cost of the plates reduced practically to nothing. This element, therefore, is properly eliminated from the calculation, as is that other item of "advertising and editors' copies" inserted by Old and New. If it is permitted to introduce such variable quantities as these, exact computation becomes impossible, as a book may be made to cost anything. They really are no more in place than would be salaries and store expenses. If it is objected that the cost of the plates might not be recovered, the answer would be that neither tariffs nor any other contrivance ought to shield men from the consequences of bad judgment, and consequently mistaken investments. Finally, the importers assure us that they can make for 36 cents the same kind of book which, out of liberality towards their opponents, they rated at 55—of course excluding the plates, for the reasons given above. And as to the alleged discrepancy between the memorial and the Nation, on the point of discount, it is simply necessary to state that both are right; the memorial resting its estimates on 50 per cent. discount, because the Government consents to admit books at one-half the valuation, while the fact remains that this is a discount rarely granted on the other side to American importers. We may add that this is but another instance of the fair and generous dealing of the memorial.—ED. NATION.]

PROTECTION FOR LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was much interested in the article and correspondence on book-taxing in the last number of the Nation. The encouragement of American literature by cutting off the foreign means of culturing Americans is truly worthy of the spirit of "protection." So absurd and extravagant do the claims become, that one finds it difficult, without second thought, to tell who are treating the subject ironically and who are not.

Once the dogma of protection takes hold, the mind becomes enthused; and for the mental infirmity which supervenes there appears to be no remedy. As in the admission of "spiritual control," there is no stopping till the entire mind is given up as an instrument for the supernal powers to play on; so in the admission of "protection," there is no stopping till there is a universal clamor of all competitive interests for legislative assistance. Each virtually insists that all the others shall be taxed for its own behoof as an indispensable condition of national prosperity. Nothing can be trusted to its own natural vigor. America is assumed to be the weakest of all places on earth, and nothing can thrive here without protection. Even its republicanism must be protected by a tax on foreign ideas. God's law of natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, is utterly ignored. There is not the least symptom of consciousness that such a law in nature and life exists now or ever has existed.

In view of the great and pressing need of protection for superexcellent things nowadays, we are led to wonder how ever the geological world got along for so many million years before man came to invent "protection." Indeed, it was for want of this very thing that the saurian supremacy of a very ancient age went down! When those big lizards began to grow weak, and foreign forms, though it may be of a higher type, but foreign nevertheless, began to obtrude on saurian territory, then there was need for protection; but, alas, there was none; and the world and its peopling grew better and better through the workings of a simple law—the survival of the fittest!

Your readers need not be told that this applies to literature; the strongest will survive. If the Government is spoiling for business, let it foster freedom and honesty in the book trade; and publishers and literary men could not do better than cultivate a higher standard of justice in estimating the relative merits of authors as an offset to the prejudice of clique and country. The universal struggle for literary existence demands an "open field and a fair fight."

Do what we will we cannot equalize the chances of individuals. Some of us are poor and have families to support. Our tastes may not attract us to that kind of literature which is in popular demand, and which "pays." We must live where we can most readily earn a living. Hence, we cannot settle around the great libraries and centres of learning. We are compelled to buy the books we use. We want German, French, and English authorities; but our paternal Government steps in and says, "You must pay me first for the privilege." Our misfortune is we are poor, and we bewail anew the fate of poverty in this plain republican country of ours.

A student well known to the writer has special tastes for anthropological studies. There are few American books on the subjects in which he is most interested; the English, French, and especially the German works of most use to him are not sufficiently popular to justify republication in this country, and the consequence is, if he gets them, he must send abroad for them. How else are to be had most of the anthropological works of Huschke, Welcker, Vogt, Wagner, Bischoff, Büchner, and the like? The contemplated tariff imposes a special tax on our student's intellectual tastes, and, because he is poor, it ordains starvation for his brains. He has waited for the appreciation of our currency, so he could afford to take foreign scientific papers, and has now ordered four from the old countries for the current year—ought he to weight them down with gold for somebody's protection before he is allowed to read them?

But what of all this? The fault cannot be in "protection," for protection is the sine quâ non of all thrift. The fact is our student has no business to be poor, no business to live away from libraries and have a family to support, no business to love studies that don't pay in available cash; in short, he has no business to be a student at all.

The great trouble with America is not that our bookmakers are not encompassed round about with a bulwark of protection. The trouble lies deeper. The taste for culture of the more solid sort is not yet sufficiently prevailing. There are too few interested in the higher bearings of scientific study to warrant the republication in this country of the solidest of foreign books even when there is no cost for copyright. Hence, to make it more difficult by means of legislation for poor students to obtain such books, is only another instance of the injustice which legislation, under unctuous names, may be made to subserve. The effect of the contemplated tariff regulation would be to cut off a part of the very best literature of the world, thus excluding our people from the rightful means of a deeper and nobler culture. We are not to have free use of all the means of catching up and keeping pace with Germany, France, and England. No; it is contemplated to "canton a little Goshen" for ourselves, that our literature shall drivel eternally. A COUNTRY WRITER.

March 4, 1870.

[We believe the sober protectionists do not contemplate raising the duty on books in foreign languages; but the wild men, of course, must believe that American institutions run as much risk from Continental ideas as from English ones, and to be consistent ought to keep them out by taxation also. The position in which their demands present the United States to the world would be a painful, if it were not a ludicrous, spectacle.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce as ready for immediate delivery Volume II. of the Journal of the American Social Science Association. From some knowledge of its contents, we can say of it that it more than sustains the promise of the first volume, and has the double character of a periodical that may be read with interest and a work of reference to be carefully preserved. The body of it consists of the papers read at the General Meeting in this city last October, almost every one of which was of first-rate excellence, and even authority, and which together covered a large part of the field of social science. These are followed by an editorial survey of the year, remarkable for its comprehensiveness, both in domestic and in foreign matters; and the points thus grouped together are again separately developed in contributions from specialists in the various branches of reform. Among the tables inserted are the statistics of the libraries in the United States (taken from the Boston Public Library's report), the list of lectures in the several faculties at the University of Berlin, and the statistics of the people's banks in Germany. Finally, the bibliography of the year, so far as it relates to social science, is given with some approach to completeness.——The same house has nearly ready an "Annual Catalogue of Books" for 1869—the first published here in many years. It contains, in a corrected and enlarged form, the very complete monthly lists of their Trade Circular and Literary Bulletin for the year just elapsed, with a supplement to cover unavoidable deficiencies; but the obvious inconvenience of the arrangement is removed by two indexes, very laboriously prepared—the one, alphabetical, of every author or book; the other classified according to topics, with alphabetical arrangement under each head. The body of the Catalogue gives full particulars of size, price, place of publication, and publisher's name of each book. Should this deserving experiment be sustained by the trade and the public, Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce their intention to make their next Catalogue alphabetical throughout, disregarding the division into months. We trust they will receive the requisite encouragement.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will publish on the 12th Gail Hamilton's "Battle of the Books," which, under fictitious names, undertakes to set forth a controversy between this lively authoress and her former publishers, Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. This roundabout mode of assault is consistent with Miss Dodge's severe literary impersonality or pseudonymousness; but whether it will answer her purpose as well as she anticipates may be doubted.——The First, Tenth, and Twenty-ninth Maine Regiments (Tenth Battalion) have formed a common organization, which embraces all who served in either of them, and intend to publish their history in a single book, which the secretary of the association, Major John M. Gould, of Portland, is to compose. While waiting for those memoirs of general officers, which we spoke of the other day as so desirable, we shall welcome regimental histories, as at least the next best material for the comprehensive war history that will probably not be written till the army of survivors has largely reinforced the army of the dead.——We receive too late for examination a "Catalogue of the Library belonging to Mr. John A. Rice, of Chicago," prepared by Messrs. J. Sabin & Sons, of 84 Nassau Street, this city, for the auction sale which is to take place on Monday afternoon, March 21, and the five following days, at the rooms of Messrs. Bangs, Merwin & Co., 694 and 696 Broadway. We can only say now that the Catalogue is in itself worthy of permanent preservation, being admirably printed on fine paper, and that the collection is one of the finest ever offered here.

—In our notices of the March magazines last week, accidental omission was made of two, which we may here repair. Old and New being still in its infancy, it is scarcely yet time to say much about it. Thus far it has been noticeable for its Unitarianism and for a sort of hop-skip discursiveness rather than for anything else—unless indeed we think of its cover, which is so neat and pretty that the reading matter under it would have to be specially good to be better in its way than the cover is in its way. The characteristic of Old and New which is at once noticeable and of good promise to the reader is the "Record of Progress"—a certain number of pages filled with what we may call social science. This month it has short articles on the proposed museum of art in Boston; on the scheme of the Riverside Improvement Company of Chicago; on the Tosti collection of engravings in the Boston Public Library; on the various public works in Chicago; on a certain "free religious" society at the Cape of Good Hope; on the Lilienthal Hebrew-Unitarian movement in Cincinnati; on Sunday in its relations to society; on some recent discoveries in America of remains of prehistoric animals; and on some of the national legislation of this past winter. A little less variety of topics, if that be necessary for a more exhaustive presentation and discussion of those selected for mention, would seem to be desirable if this department of Old and New is to do as much good and be as interesting as it might. "The Examiner" is the title given to that part of the magazine devoted to reviews of new books, and the separate notices in this number are well done. The general character of the department is, however, so exclusively religious and Unitarian that we should suppose it would be easy to make "The Examiner" a great deal more attractive to the majority of the people who will buy it. Of the articles in the body of the number before us none is excellent. The pleasantest is that entitled "In Search of a Climate," which has in it some invalid groaning and growling which is good, though perhaps the evident genuineness of it may offend some nervously sensitive people. The most instructive paper is doubtless Mr. J. H. Trumbull's essay on the Algonquin word "manit" or "manitou," in which the author appears to dispose very conclusively of the notion that the Indians had any clear conception of "The Great Spirit" whom the missionaries used to say that our unaided child of nature had thought out for himself. Mr. Sidney Andrews's account of the operations of the Bureau of Education is also worth having, and connects itself closely with the "Record of Progress"—the portion of Old and New which, as we have suggested, seems to furnish the best justification for the existence of the magazine. The only seriously bad articles are Mr. A. D. Mayo's helter-skelter talk about "Religion in Schools," and an equally wild-headed argument (anonymous) in favor of our getting a truly American literature by keeping American men of letters in ignorance of what non-resident men of letters are thinking and saying. There is also some tolerably bad poetry by Dr. Parsons and Mr. Paul Hayne.

—The new Harper's is not only good in its own approved way but also has one or two things which will repay the attention of a class of readers who do not habitually read this most popular of the magazines. Mr. M. D. Conway's second article on the Isle of Wight discourses of John Sterling, and contains an excellent long letter by Professor F. W. Newman, who was Sterling's most trusted friend, and who appears to have known him better and appreciated him more exactly than his biographer, Carlyle. Certainly one or two of the biographical strokes which he makes in the letter just mentioned are not equalled by anything in Carlyle's "Life." "What he admired most in some ladies who tried to evangelize him in illness was, he said, 'their timid omniscience.'" This is only one sentence, but it throws as much light on Sterling's intellectual and spiritual nature as any dozen pages of the biography, as we remember that work. It is, however, as a whole that the letter has its value. Of Keats, too, our traveller has something to say; and of course it would not be Mr. Conway's way to go down to the neighborhood of Faringford and not present letters to the poet-laureate. How well that very extremely thin-skinned gentleman will be pleased with his visitor's garrulity we think we could guess. And indeed he seems to be rather sharp in his generation in doing what he can to discourage people who know him from telling too precisely what manner of man he is. "Mrs. Henry Taylor told me," says Mr. Conway, "that she was one of a party with whom Tennyson went to see some grand naval review at Spithead, and that Tennyson seemed to be really hurt at every gaze fixed upon him. 'See those people there—they are looking at us now.' 'Yes,' laughed the lady, 'and we are looking at them.'" Another contribution to the March Harper's which will be found profitable and pleasant is Mr. Curtis's criticism of the new comedy "Ours," now playing at Wallack's, and the same writer's remark on Mr. Jenkins and on letters of introduction reminds us to say, what we might say every month, that if the next generation of Americans are very full of good manners it is Mr. Curtis that they will have to rise up and bless. It is not always easy to forgive so very much sweetness of temper as Mr. Curtis inevitably shows, but certainly it stands him in good stead in the "Easy Chair" which he regularly wheels over so many corns.

—The Rev. Dr. McClintock, President of Drew Theological Seminary, at Madison, N. J., died last week at the too early age of fifty-six. He was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania in 1835, and from that time up to the day of his death was actively engaged in intellectual pursuits, as professor of mathematics and subsequently of Greek and Latin in Dickinson College, at Carlisle, then (1848–1856) as editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, pastor of St. Paul's Methodist church in this city (1857-60), of the American chapel at Paris during the war, and finally (1867) as the head of the newly-founded institution first-named. He filled all these positions with usefulness and lustre, and especially was able to render great services to the American cause in Europe when it was sadly in need of friends. His scholarship was of a high order. He was one of the translators of Neander's "Life of Christ," and a co-laborer with Dr. Strong in the "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature," a novel and important work, which he leaves unfinished. Dr. McClintock's personal character secured him the esteem of all who knew him, and socially, as well as in professional walks, he will be greatly missed and sincerely lamented. It was during his professorship, and probably about the year 1847, that his humanity was enlisted in behalf of a fugitive slave whose case caused some excitement in the border neighborhood of Pennsylvania, and the manifestation he then gave of anti-slavery sentiment, before the public conscience had been stirred by the Fugitive Slave Law, exposed him to odium and even to persecution. The event, perhaps, had some share in his subsequent advancement; but it was none the less a test and proof of his manhood, than which he has probably bequeathed none finer to his children.

—The Maine Historical Society has lost its foremost member, Hon. William Willis, of Portland, a connecting link between the last century and the present, combining the best characteristics of each. He was born in Haverhill, Mass., in 1794, was fitted at Exeter for Harvard College, where he was graduated in 1813. For two years he practised as a member of the Suffolk bar, and after that removed to Portland, where he spent the remainder of his days. For twenty years he was law partner of the late Senator Fessenden. He joined the Maine Historical Society some time between 1822–31, and was first its recording secretary and afterwards its president. In 1831–32 he published a history of Portland, supervised the issues of the Society's collections in 1847 and 1853, and the publication last year of Dr. J. G. Kohl's account of the discovery of Maine, to which he contributed the Introduction. Works of his not published in connection with the Society were: 1849, a new edition of the journals of Parson Smith and Dr. Deane; 1863, a history of the courts and lawyers of Maine—a very elaborate work; 1865, a new and enlarged edition of his "History of Portland." Says the Portland Advertiser:

"During all this time he was a frequent contributor to the journals of the city. Methodical and regular in all his habits, he had collected a vast fund of biographical and genealogical information, all carefully arranged and available at a moment's notice. He seemed at last to accept it as a duty to write obituary notices from time to time, and if by accidental absence or illness he was prevented, apologized as punctually as if he had been a salaried writer, though the employment of the greater part of his long life was really for the public benefit without fee or reward."

All this occupation did not prevent Mr. Willis from taking part and even the initiative in politics, in business enterprises, and in public charities. He was elected Mayor of Portland in 1857, and in 1868 had the degree of LL.D. conferred upon him by Bowdoin College. The "Bibliography of Maine" was the work he had last proposed to himself, and in the midst of which he died, retaining the full vigor of his faculties to the last.

—"An Author," whose letter to the Boston Advertiser we criticised a fortnight ago, writes us to say that we have fallen into a great error in ignoring the practical side of the book-making and tariff controversy, besides misunderstanding his particular views as expressed in the letter referred to; and as for the pamphlet, "England's New Colony," he sums it up with the statement that "it aimed not at an exclusion of English books with English ideas, but at giving American books with American ideas a fair chance; and it deprecated a tendency in the book market which looks to a transfer of our book stores to the London publisher." He will be glad to learn that want of space alone prevented us last week from considering what he calls the "material influences on literature." In fact, two pages of his pamphlet were devoted to the "taxes on book-manufacture." From these it appears that the type-metal, or the type itself, if imported, pays a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; the plaster for stereotyping, a duty of twenty per cent.; the various acids, metals, etc., used in electrotyping, duties ranging from ten to thirty-five per cent.; the ink, a duty of thirty per cent.; the material of the rollers, twenty per cent. (glue), and eight cents on the gallon (molasses); "the coal which raises steam in his [the manufacturer's] taxed engine, to drive his taxed presses, has paid either forty cents per ton," or else, as Mr. Edward Harris complained the other day in the Tribune, is loaded with the cost of transportation from the mines whose owners have kept out the cheaper foreign article. The binder must then pay thirty-five per cent. duty on his boards and on his cloth; forty per cent. on his thread and twine; twenty per cent. on his glue, and a duty on gold-leaf; and, in short, "every American book, by the time it reaches its reader, may fairly be estimated to have paid an average of forty several imposts," of one kind and another, but principally in the shape of duties. That is to say, the book industry exhibits in a striking manner the secondary effects of the tariff upon interests quite remote from those in whose favor it was devised—effects which would never have been known in their full extent and variety, or even suspected, by the public but for Mr. Wells's researches, and which, when made known, have done more, we venture to think, than all other facts or arguments to reveal the contradictory working of a protective tariff, and to increase the sentiment favorable to free-trade. The book-makers, having thus contributed their statistics in support of Mr. Wells's, proceed to furnish another illustration of the insatiableness of protection; and, instead of seeking to mitigate the excesses of the tariff under which they labor—by compelling the Lake Superior mining interest, for example, to relinquish the duty on copper and its sulphate, either wholly or for something lower—they demand additional taxation of rival but legitimate American enterprises, and so enhance the prohibitory tendency of the tariff. But what is to be the end of this sort of thing?

—As all the world knows, Mr. H. R. Revels is a colored man whom the Legislature of reconstructed Mississippi has sent up to the Senate. And as all the world knows, Mississippi is the State which, in the days before the flood, sent to the Senate Mr. Jefferson Davis. When it became certain that Mr. Revels would be admitted, there was at once a curious display of that appetite for the rhetorical which possesses the Congressman: Mr. Revels must not only be allowed to take his seat, but he must be put into the self-same chair and at the identical desk in which and under which "the perjured head of the slaveholders' rebellion" used to sit and used to stretch his legs. And if there is any of our readers, young or old, who cannot sit down and write out a specimen flight of the eloquence we should regularly have heard from certain honorable senators had "this striking act of poetic justice" been done, we disown such reader and advise him to begin his studies over again. As it happens, it was not done. The chair formerly occupied by Davis is now occupied by the Traitor Ross, of Kansas. We suppose we may call him the Traitor Ross; he prevented Honest Old Ben from going into the White House, and Mr. Seymour too. This Ross declined to give up his desk. It is a refusal which, as one of his colleagues civilly remarked, was to have been expected: "Where else should the man sit who saved Andrew Johnson except in the seat of Jefferson Davis?" The wonder is not so great after all that the gods are not fond of "poetic justice," and latterly have given it up to the correspondent and the upper galleries of his Thespian temples.

—Gentlemen who expect to be engaged in "popularizing science" next winter might do worse than put themselves into communication with Professor Richards, of Chicago. As we see him reported in the Chicago papers, he has nothing to learn from Dr. John Lord himself; he appears to be competent to instruct any of the apprentices to "the platform." Hydrogen was Professor Richards's subject last Friday week, as we learn from the Republican, and he began by remarking to his numerous audience that he would introduce this gas as the Matter Queen. She might properly be introduced as the Water Queen, or as the Fire Queen; but inasmuch as it was in her alliance with Oxygen, the Matter King, that her regality was most manifest, it was as the Matter Queen that he would ask for her the attention of his hearers. He then proceeded to "present hydrogen in the remarkable properties of extreme levity and inflammability, and playfully defended her from the charge that these qualities were unqueenly." Next came "an exciting account of Messrs. Glaisher and Williams's celebrated ascent in 1862," and the display of some models of balloons. "His description of the nuptials of King Oxygen and Queen Hydrogen in the beginning was very thrilling," the reporter says, but he omits to quote the lecturer's language. In the course of the evening Mr. Richards instructed his hearers as to some of the lighter uses of science: "Remarkable imitations were given of mourning cats, and of the cries of fallen angels," and, as if this were not entertainment enough, the professor mimicked "the plaint of a Bridgeport Romeo, followed by the splash of a bucket of liver," and illustrated "the effect of hydrogen on the voice by means of his assistant, whose remarks sounded like the lucubrations of a hand-organ." The more one hears about it, the more one is moved to enquire anxiously how near its end is our American lecture system.

MODERN RUSSIA.*

THE author of the book before us remarks very truly, in one of his chapters, that "few can surmount the difficulties which a work written by a Russian about Russia must present to German, English, or French readers; they do not know the premises from which every book starts that is produced by a Russian mind." All travellers who visit Russia find the same difficulty in getting true impressions, and it is only by a long residence and constant intercourse with all classes of people that this can be overcome. Even their books and narratives leave very different impressions on the reader who has never been in Russia and on one who has made the country an object of study. But it is equally true that it is necessary to know something of the premises from which any book starts which concerns Russia; for, though the author may write without animus, everything depends on the way he will be likely to see things. In this case, for instance, the reader should never forget that Dr. Eckardt is a native of the Baltic Provinces; that he was for a time editor of the Riga Gazette; and that, being deeply mixed up with the Baltic polemics, and violently opposed to the spread of Russian ideas and institutions, and charged with intrigues with Prussia, he left Riga and established himself in Germany. This does not imply any intentional distortion—we merely show the color of the spectacles through which he looks.

It is not difficult to expose the argument which underlies the different parts of the book. Under the reign of Alexander II., Dr. Eckardt would demonstrate that Russia is a prey to all sorts of wild socialistic and democratic theories, and that all the reforms are illusory, of bad effect, and of wrong theory, as giving up the whole direction of affairs to the middle and lower classes and taking it away from the aristocrats—the natural governing class. In the chapter on communism, we are taught the bad effect of the agrarian theories now predominant in Russia, and their absolute opposition to civilization. The article on the Greek Church aims to show the incapacity of the Russian for religious development and religious freedom; and, finally, in the concluding part we are treated to a glowing picture of the Baltic provinces, with the feudalism and dark shades put clean out of sight, and we naturally agree that it is an outrage to reduce so much enlightenment—"the outwork of Western civilization"—to the combined dangers of tyranny, anarchy, and socialism.

In spite, however, of his tendencies, Dr. Eckardt has produced an interesting and, in many respects, a valuable book, because it contains accounts of events, like the literary agitation in Russia and the Austrian propagation of dissent, which have never been so well set forth to Western ears, and details which are unknown even to many who live in Russia. If the reader will continually bear in mind the peculiar position of Dr. Eckardt, he will hardly fail to be benefited by the perusal of his work.

One of the strangest parts in the history of the present reign is the Russian uprising in 1863, called out by the Polish insurrection. It is only a new example of how an external attack will unite an internally divided nation, and how an interference by foreign powers in the domestic policy of a government strengthens its power and brings about a reaction on its side. At that time, as we remarked last week, Hertzen and his Kolokol exerted a tremendous sway on opinion in Russia—a sway so great that even the simplest story of it seems like a dream. The very silence with which the Government ignored him seemed to add to his power. At the height of his influence he took sides with the Poles, and at once his power ceased. Katkoff, a former professor in the Moscow University, and then editor of the Russian Messenger and of the Moscow Gazette, attacked him openly in his journal, on the ground that his efforts would tend to destroy the country. It was the first time that Hertzen's name had been publicly mentioned for years, and the revulsion in feeling was wonderful. It was not merely the attack which ruined him, nor the fact that he took sides with the Poles; but the Russians began to see that they were getting a free press at home, where they could express their ideas and their wants, and the need of the London organ was gone. The Kolokol ceased to be brought over the frontier, or only in rare copies, and Hertzen had from that time till the day of his death not an iota of influence in Russia. His paper was soon published in French for the benefit of foreigners; and, when he died the other day, all the Russian press noticed his death as that of an agitator who had done immense good, but had never sympathized with the true needs of the country. The Moscow journalist rose in power; and when he came out with his series of articles calling on all men and all parties to unite and crush the rebellion, he arrived at a more enormous influence than any subject in Russia had ever possessed—a great part of which he still possesses. His word was almost law. At that moment, too, the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff, in which he snubbed England and France for their threats of interference, thrilled all Russia, and gave him that personal popularity which he has never lost. All parties united; the nobles, discontented by the emancipation, stilled their cries for more reforms and ceased to ask for a parliament. The very motions which had been received with enthusiasm in the nobility assemblies but a few months before, were voted down by immense majorities. All forces were joined to strengthen the hands of the Government, and the untimely sympathy of England for constitutional government in Poland retarded it in Russia for maybe fifty years.

All this has been tolerably well set forth and explained by Dr. Eckardt, but he has not given Mr. Katkoff the credit for sincerity which he deserves. Katkoff's persistent efforts to Russify the Western and the Baltic Provinces have caused him, as well as Samarin and Aksakoff, to be regarded by the Germans, and by most people abroad, as a socialist and revolutionist. Dr. Eckardt and other Baltic politicians are sincere on one side, but cannot understand sincerity on the other. Katkoff is a mild and amiable man, acting only from a sense of right, and as sincere in his belief as any of our oldest anti-slavery reformers. He moreover aims to be a moderate liberal, and by all the most radical men in Russia, comprising the majority of the very young men, is regarded as a conservative, only little better than the extreme reactionists and Dr. Eckardt himself. Katkoff's party, however, contains the vast majority of thinking men in Russia, and the Moscow Gazette very truly represents the bulk of the Liberals. The literary agitation as described by Dr. Eckardt would lead one to think that democracy was more rampant in Russia than is really the case, while the socialistic doctrines of the more extreme journals have really little sway, and their organs are barely able to exist. At the same time, many read them merely for their boldness. It is curious that in many respects the extreme conservatives and the extreme radicals in Russia approach each other, and the Dyelo, a very wild "nihilist" journal, is an exception to most Petersburg papers in being under the censorship which is wielded by the reactionist clique.

In the discussion of the emancipation reform, the author has in the main spoken justly, though he has, we think, laid too little stress on the many difficulties which are thrown in the way of the peasant who wishes to quit his land, even after March 3 (Feb. 19), 1870, the period when nominal freedom was reached. These enactments were put in to prevent the northern part of the empire from becoming depopulated, and the peasants from leaving distasteful agriculture and flocking to the cities. The Government, while giving land in large quantities to the peasant, added the obligation to make use of it. The effects of emancipation the author has preferred to discuss in a separate volume (published in German), mainly translated from brochures of Russian conservatives. That the peasant, while morally bettered, is physically worse off now than before, is not the effect of emancipation, but of the present tax-laws, which throw on him nearly the whole burden of the empire's taxation. Until these are changed—and a commission is now at work—we can hardly hope for better results.

The account of the judicial reforms is substantially the same as that which has appeared in these columns (see the Nation, No. 200). Not the same justice is done to the Zemstva, or diets. The author in one passage (p. 143), says that "matters of a merely agricultural nature were consigned to provincial jurisdiction," and immediately enumerates matters much larger in scope than those belonging to the government of our counties, and almost as large as the powers of our State legislatures, including the building of railways, with what is an anomaly in all minor self-governing bodies—the power to levy taxes for the objects of which they have cognizance without let or hindrance. Dr. Eckardt lays great stress on the fact that the merchants and peasants united can always have a control of their diets—which, considering their number and interests, is but just—but forgets that in reality the nobles always have preponderated in influence, and have controlled the proceedings. The diets have done far more than could have been expected in the first four years of institutions so new to the country, as an inspection of any interior province will show.

Of the many minor reforms there is hardly a word in this book, and there is no mention of the desire and efforts being made for the education of the masses. Most political economists will probably agree with Dr. Eckardt that communism produces bad agriculture, and Russians who know most about the present state of Russia declare that communism will not last thirty years. At present it seems to be a necessity of the tax-laws; but the author is mistaken in thinking that because the commune is alone responsible to the Government for the taxes, therefore the individuals comprising it share equally in their payment. A member of the commune who thinks to evade his share of the burden will find his horses and cattle seized and sold by his fellow-villagers, and he will be compelled to pay. It would be a little unfair to make the present state of Russia a crucial test for communism, and those who were interested by the arguments of Baron Haxthausen in his last work will not allow that Dr. Eckardt has refuted them with the ease he supposes. After all, is good agriculture or are good manufactures the chief end of life? May not an entire absence of poverty be better than great wealth in the hands of a few, and the proletariat of England?

* "Modern Russia; comprising Russia under Alexander II., Russian Communism, the Greek Orthodox Church and its Sects, the Baltic Provinces of Russia. By Dr. Julius Eckardt." London: Smith, Elder & Co. 1870. 8vo, pp. 388.

The chapter on the Greek Orthodox Church and its sects is exceedingly interesting, and the account of the troubles caused by dissent, and the embarrassments with the Austrian hierarchy, will serve to explain the cautiousness of the Government in laying the reforming hand on the church, even in apparently so simple a matter as the change of the calendar or as reducing the number of feast and fast days. Dissent among a population so ignorant as the Russian has disagreeable accompaniments. Our author makes many errors in statement, even in such well-known things as the position of the hierarchy and the state of the clergy, and we have only space to say that when a priest's wife dies, he is not obliged to enter a monastery, but remains as he is, and that the Church-Slavonic "jargon," as Dr. Eckardt chooses to call it, is, so far as the church-service goes, perfectly understood by the peasantry. Even a foreigner who knows Russian can understand it after a few days' practice. The great reform of 1869, which entirely abolishes the priestly caste, and fuses the wives and children of priests, deacons, and church servitors in the other classes of the population, took place too late for mention by our author. And in discussing the evil influence of monasticism, he has made no reference to the bold utterance of Count Tolstoy, the Procurator of the Holy Synod, in his report for 1868, when he said that many people throughout Russia demanded the total abolition of monasteries, that the feeling of the people would never allow this, but that there was the most evident and urgent need of great reforms. This is the first public mention in Russia of this subject.

Dr. Eckardt gives a very interesting account of the settlement and position of the Baltic Provinces, but makes no reference to the Russian version of the controversy now raging about them both in Russia and Germany. We have no desire to discuss these questions with him, for there is much to be said on both sides, and we commend his book to the reader, as giving him more knowledge of Russia than any recent work, asking him only to bear in mind that Germany and civilization are not necessarily synonyms, and that feudal institutions are no better because they are German. We have no space to speak of the curious system of spelling Russian words adopted by our author, which seems due to an imperfect knowledge of English orthoepy.

SHERIDAN IN THE SHENANDOAH.*

It is somewhat strange that almost the completest, certainly the most picturesque campaign of the late war—Sheridan's campaign in the Shenandoah Valley—should as yet have found no ambitious historian on the Northern side to undertake its separate narration. True, the materials are still wanting for a full and trustworthy history; but enough is known and enough also may well be imagined for a brilliant narrative of historical value or not. The scene and the result would sufficiently excite the writer's fancy when facts were in doubt, and he might hope that details would not be closely scanned in a glowing picture of victory in the plain, splendidly framed by mountains. Either we are very indifferent how our war was fought, or the noise and smoke have dazed all possible portrayers of it, or we should surely by this time have had some sort of sketch, good or bad, of this campaign.

Colonel Walker's book, now before us, is the only substitute we have seen for what seemed likely to be forthcoming. "The Vermont Brigade" belonged to Getty's division of the Sixth Corps, and took part in all that Sheridan's army did in the valley, and in some rapid movements hither and thither before Sheridan was sent to meet Early. The mettle of this brigade was well known "at the front," and it deserved all the applause that can now be bestowed on it. We may cordially agree, as all their fellow-soldiers would, to the modest claims of Colonel Walker for his comrades. In the campaign of 1864, under Grant and Meade, and afterward under Sheridan, in this brigade of six regiments, in fact of five only, for a part of the time, "the total number of Vermonters killed and wounded during that brief period reached the terrible aggregate of three thousand one hundred and sixteen." No better troops ever fought under any flag.

The career of the brigade in the Shenandoah Valley runs like a bright thread through the woof of Sheridan's operations there. Following it up, with occasional glimpses at the larger surface in which it is woven, the complete pattern of the campaign may be readily made out. Colonel Walker's account is very intelligent, and he has a good idea of the whole field in which the Vermonters manœuvred and fought, and of the strategy of the rival Generals, Sheridan and Early. He is liberal, and sometimes lavish, in praising his superior officers, and he is perfectly fair in his comments on other troops. His story is graphic, with only an occasional flight into other and less agreeable strains, and he has an edge of that dry humor which was easily caught in army life if not possessed before. We doubt not he has faithfully recorded the gallant exploits of his own brigade, and he mentions himself only as being a Major of the Eleventh Vermont, afterward breveted a Lieutenant-Colonel. He is not always correct when speaking on matters beyond his personal knowledge, but he is a good guide over the field till one shall come whose scope as an eye-witness was larger, and who has seen all the proofs that may happily have been preserved.

We learn from this book that the main body of the Sixth Corps, detached from the Army of the Potomac to resist the invasion of Early, Ricketts's division having already gone on the same errand, reached Washington on the morning of July 12, 1864, and immediately went out on the Rockville Pike to Fort Stevens, where Early's troops were found confronting. There was a grand council of war at the fort, President Lincoln, Secretary Stanton, General Halleck, and others assisting. General Wright, commanding the Sixth Corps, threw out a skirmish line, and, a fight ensuing, the President insisted on standing on the parapet to see the result, though an officer was wounded at his side. When Early retreated, General Wright followed rapidly to the Shenandoah Valley, through Snicker's Gap in the Blue Ridge. There Early was lost sight of, and was supposed to have hastily returned to Richmond; so there was a rapid countermarch all the way back to Washington. Early meantime attacked our forces at Winchester, and the Sixth Corps was hurried again to the Shenandoah Valley, passing through Harper's Ferry, and camping at Halltown, just beyond, "wondering," as Colonel Walker says, "in army dialect, why this was thus." Thence, "the pace almost a gallop," and the heat overpowering, back once more to Frederick City to check Early, who had burned Chambersburg, and was again threatening Baltimore or Washington. The 6th of August brought General Grant, and later in the day General Sheridan, who was left to take charge of all the forces operating against the invaders, relieving General Hunter, who had lately "somehow turned up at Harper's Ferry in command."

The troops were at first a little afraid of Sheridan, "as his only reputation hitherto was that of a desperate, reckless fighter." We have room in our narrow limits for only one or two marginal notes on Colonel Walker's narrative of the stirring campaign in which Sheridan soon won the confidence of those who had most distrusted him; and our few comments shall be on the battles of the Opequan, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek. Colonel Walker says that it was noon before Sheridan advanced his line of battle on the 19th of September, at the Opequan. From various causes of delay it was nearly noon, it is true, and Early's army was not caught unprepared or divided. Sheridan reported that it was not until "perhaps nine o'clock" that the order to advance was given, and Early says that the attack on his lines was made "about ten." These generals were busy, and time flew by them fast. Twenty minutes past eleven was the hour, as numerous subordinate commanders have agreed in testifying. Why this first advance was not successful, but terribly otherwise, Colonel Walker plainly shows by simply describing what happened in his own brigade. What could a general do when nearly all his troops, his best with his worst, ignored the line of battle and forsook it, and took to fighting by brigades and regiments, some fighting the enemy, some fighting the air? Sheridan, not being superhuman and able by omnipresence to prevent such madness, could only be as much of a man as was possible while his rash soldiers took the victory into their own hands, and, plunging on disordered into woods and ravines, soon left it in the hands of Early, who hurled out from his lines a superb, audacious countercharge. That Sheridan won the victory back again later in the day is a feather in his cap quite as fine as that of Cedar Creek. His army at the Opequan was for a time in very little better care than he found it on the 19th of October after his famous ride.

* "The Vermont Brigade in the Shenandoah Valley, 1864. By Aldace F. Walker." Burlington, Vt.: The Free Press Association. 1869.

Colonel Walker's account of the battle of Fisher's Hill is excellent. It puts in a clear light the ingenious and dashing manœuvres by means of which Sheridan, with trifling loss, routed Early from an almost impregnable fortress, which nature had provided by closing in the mountains till the valley, compressed into billowy heights, hardly bursts through the gap. "A half-written letter," says Colonel Walker, "found in the works after we had carried them, spoke of the rebel army as secure in a 'haven of rest.'" We doubt if any participant on either side will write a very much better description than Colonel Walker's of this battle.

The best tribute that we can pay to "the Vermont Brigade," at parting, is to say that it stood fast at Cedar Creek with Getty's division when all the rest of the infantry had crumbled away to the rear. Sheridan, on coming up, found only this division, besides the cavalry, confronting the enemy; and if it had not been for Getty's troops Sheridan could scarcely have kept his promise to the retreating soldiers he met on the road, that they should sleep in the old camps that night. The worth of Getty has not been sufficiently noised abroad. The trumpet of fame which blared so many names of mock heroes in our war has been almost silent in his praise. He always proved himself to be a most excellent soldier; and at Cedar Creek, with a lost battle raging around him, he was a model even for the Vermonters to copy. He kept a great defeat alive until a world-famous victory flashed up from it.

Colonel Walker vexes himself with the question: What was the relative strength of Sheridan and Early's forces? We will not follow him into that. There is no record yet available to show what Early's strength for battle really was. It is true, we think, that Sheridan's army outnumbered his, from first to last, but this detracts nothing from the merit of the Union general. If it was demanded of Sheridan that he should answer for his superior numbers in overwhelming success, the annihilated army of Early is an eloquent witness how well this demand was met.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Behind the Scenes: a Story of the Stage	(N. E. News Co.) $1 25
Clyde (A.), Under Foot: a Tale, swd.	(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Gynæcological Journal, Vol. I., 1869	(James Campbell) 2 50
Hall (Miss M. L.), First Lessons in Geography	(Edwin Ginn)
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Courtship and Marriage	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Leech (John), Pictures of Life and Character, Fifth Series	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Madvig (J. N.), Latin Grammar	(Ginn Brothers & Co.) 2 00
Mulock (Miss D. M.), The Unkind Word, and Other Stories	(Harper & Bros.)
The Sunday-School Teacher, Vol., IV. 1869	(Adams, Blackmer & Lyon)
Winchell (Prof. A.), Sketches of Creation	(Harper & Bros.) 0 50

Fine Arts.

THE CARBON PHOTOGRAPHS.

THERE has been frequent mention in these columns of the photographic pictures taken by the so-called carbon process, and more particularly of the autotypes, or fac-simile copies of drawings, as the most remarkable result of the invention in question; also of what few pictures had been offered to public inspection before the establishment of the agency in Philadelphia, and of the agency itself when it was started a few months ago. Since our note calling attention to it, the agency, under the charge of Mr. C. F. Hazeltine, has got into working order, with sample portfolios of all works produced hitherto, and a stock on hand approximately complete. As a natural result, the dealers in prints and picture-frames all over the country begin to have a few specimens "in stock" and to take orders for more, and the establishments in the large cities for the sale of foreign and domestic works of art begin to enlarge their previously too small assortments of these valuable and inexpensive reproductions. As yet the knowledge of, and interest in, them are not as widespread as they will be; but yet, as anybody in the land can get from one to a thousand of them in a couple of days, the community may be supposed in presence of them—as the residents of a city are all supposed to be in the presence of a gallery of paintings on exhibition in that city—and, in like manner, prepared to read a critical examination of their case. New Yorkers may now study them any day at Goupil's.

The manner in which these pictures are taken is partly known, but some important steps in the process appear to be kept secret. At least we have not seen anywhere any description that can be supposed accurate and complete, either of the invention or of the practical working of it. An interesting article in the Evening Bulletin, of Philadelphia, gives some account of the modus operandi, but it is not very clear; and, if we understand the writer, he professes to describe a process invented in England, which may or may not be precisely the one employed by Mr. Braun. For it is Mr. Adolph Braun, of Dornach, on the Upper Rhine, who appears as the sole maker of the pictures we are considering. Not that he alone takes photographs by the carbon process; these are taken in London by Candall, and probably by others. The copies of Albert Dürer's engravings, illustrating Mrs. Heaton's book, reviewed in No. 241 of the Nation, and the head of Vashti by Mr. Poynter, in No. 1 of the Portfolio (Mr. Hamerton's new art journal), are "autotypes." But Mr. Braun has had the sole right of copying the drawings of the old masters in the collections of Paris, Vienna, Weimar, Bâle, Milan, Venice, and Florence; and it is the collection of these copies which is our present subject. Mr. Braun's name must be pretty well known to all buyers of photographs, for it is to be seen printed in pale color on the lower margins of panoramic photographs of the mountains of Savoy, the lakes of Switzerland, and the picturesque towns of the Rhine, which have delighted us all for ten years past. His place of abode is a little village ignored by Murray and rejected by the atlases, but situate in the French department of the Haut-Rhin, some thirty-five miles southward from Strasburg, and as far northwest from Bâle. Thither are brought the negatives taken by his scores of employees in all parts of Europe, and there are printed the pictures we admire. Nothing certainly can exceed the excellence of the workmanship and the admirable skill shown in all the work turned out by his establishment.

The copies as offered for sale are very even in quality, and are carefully and solidly mounted; the color of the boards has been well considered, and the quality assured. So, too, the little frame of black lines and a faint tint of color around each picture, and the name of the artist below in slightly drawn open letters, have been studiously imagined and combined. It would seem that those who have directed the inauguration of this splendid enterprise, the reproducing of the important monochromatic drawings in the galleries of Europe, have felt no doubt of a welcome and none of success in every way; so thoroughly and well the first steps were taken. One assurance they have felt in regard to the permanence of their work. The carbon pictures appear to be proof against the ordinary influences that cause other photographs to fade or change. Perhaps nothing but time can really prove them to be permanent; but meanwhile it is stated positively that the sun cannot dim them, and that two copies of a picture will remain alike in tone though one is kept in a dark drawer and the other exposed every day to the sun's rays. This, however, one can believe the more easily when it is known that the picture is a deposit of imperishable earth-colors; of Indian red, if the original is a drawing in red chalk; umber or sienna (say), if the drawing is brown; lamp black, or, in other words, pure "carbon," if the drawing is black. Anybody can try the crucial experiment for himself; a uniform stripe of Indian red in water-color, laid solidly upon a piece of paper, may be cut in two, and the half hung up in the sun will not be found to have changed when compared with the half put away in the dark. But this same peculiarity which gives to these pictures the permanence of solid, pure earth-color, gives them also their variety of tints; for, as will be seen, a drawing in red chalk can be copied just as easily as one in black crayon, the only difference being in the difficulty there is in reproducing the exact shade of red used, while black is either stronger or weaker, more or less grayish, and not different in quality.

There are, says Murray, fifteen thousand drawings in the Albertina collection at Vienna—the collection, that is, of the Archduke Albert. The handbook continues (and, when a Murray handbook and another authority differ in matters of fact of this kind, we generally find the red manual right, or nearest right) by stating that there are one hundred and twenty-two drawings by Raphael, thirty-six by Angelo, one hundred and thirty-two by Dürer, etc.; and goes on to describe the famous drawing by Raphael, made as a study for his last painting, the celebrated "Transfiguration," in which study the figures are posed and grouped as in the picture, but all nude. Whether this was done as a tour de force, to show what he could do, or whether he was accustomed to build up his pictures in that way, or whether he tried it for once, to assure the rightness of the pose of each figure, is not now our enquiry. There is the drawing, and all Europe goes to see it, as should be, for it is one of the most curious things that the art student has to study. Another of the Raphaels is that renowned drawing, in red chalk, of two nude figures, which the Roman sent to Albert Dürer, of Nürnberg, "to show his hand;" a friendly gift to a far-away painter and engraver, whose noble engravings had reached and delighted the giver of it. Of Dürer's own work, one of the most interesting pieces is the portrait of himself at the age of fourteen; this is the one which we recently mentioned as forming the frontispiece to Mr. W. B. Scott's delightful book on Dürer, having been etched by that artist from the original. Well, these drawings are all before us. Even in this country, with our tax on intelligence, the three we have mentioned can be bought by any one for less than ten dollars. In the drawing sent by Raphael to Dürer every touch of the red crayon—a rather smooth one, kept sharp and handled carefully, on paper more free from grain than is commonly used for such a drawing—can be understood and felt. The artist's way of work is as visible to us as it was to Dürer, or would be, if we had the same eyes to see it. To a certain extent the lines are rubbed and blurred, and the chalk spread about on the surface of the paper; just how far the photograph exaggerates this indistinctness, if it does so at all, we are not prepared to say, and only a close comparison would enable one to say; but, probably, the difference between original and copy is almost inappreciable. The copy of the "Transfiguration" drawing is not quite perfect, inasmuch as it was not perfectly "focussed," being one of the few which are faulty in any such respect. We expect to hear that another negative has been taken. The Dürer drawing is perfectly copied.

The list or catalogue of the reproductions of drawings in this one collection contains one thousand and ninety-eight numbers of drawings or sheets, some of the sheets being leaves of sketch-books, containing several subjects each. These represent one hundred and thirteen painters, engravers, and sculptors. Ninety-seven of the numbers are under Dürer's name, seventy under Raphael's, sixty-three under Rembrandt's. It is natural to suppose that they are the most showy and striking subjects that have been selected.

This is particularly the case in the Louvre collection. The Musée des Dessins at the Louvre is one of the first in Europe, and especially notable for the high character of the works that it contains. Visitors will remember the rooms where sloping table-cases contain the most interesting drawings, margined with that bluish-grey paper, the color of which Mr. Brown has copied for the mounts of his autotypes. The catalogue of copies in this case contains only nine hundred and twenty-eight numbers. But in looking over the portfolios containing these, one is struck by the large number of life-size and other striking heads, and complete groups of vigorous interest, all highly finished drawings, fit to adorn any walls, however stately. These, though not necessarily the most valuable to artists and to students of art, will probably have the most general educational effect.

JUST ISSUED.

Lea's Studies in Church History.

STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY—THE RISE OF THE TEMPORAL POWER, BENEFIT OF CLERGY, EXCOMMUNICATION. By Henry C. Lea. In one large royal 12mo volume of 516 pp., extra cloth, $2 75.

"There is something marvellous in the industry through which so many intellectual treasures have been placed at our service. In the three essays which compose the present volume, the sources, humanly speaking, of the prolonged influences of the Church of Rome on the destinies of mankind are unfolded with a wealth of illustration which leaves the reader little to desire."—Lippincott's Magazine, March, 1870.

"They are careful studies by a thorough scholar in the most interesting of all historical fields, made without passion or prejudice, and recorded with honesty. The whole volume is of the deepest interest; the style is masculine and animated, and great skill is shown in weaving in anecdote and picturesque stories, without impairing the flow of the relation or the proper dignity of the composition."—Hartford Courant, Jan. 22, 1870.

"We recommend the book as a highly instructive discussion of matters which are always of interest to scholars, and which are just now clothed with a special importance."—N. Y. Nation, Feb. 3, 1870.

PREPARING FOR EARLY PUBLICATION.

SUPERSTITION AND VICE. By Henry C. Lea. Second edition, revised, 1 vol. royal 12mo.

CHAMBERS ON THE INDIGESTIONS. Third American edition, revised and enlarged by the author. 1 vol. 8vo.

HENRY C. LEA, Philadelphia.

George Routledge & Sons' NEW PUBLICATIONS.

I.

COMPLETION OF REV. J. G. WOOD'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY OF MAN.

The Natural History of Man (Volume II. just published): Being an Account of the Manners and Customs of the Uncivilized Races of Man. By the Rev. J. G. Wood. With Designs by Zurcker, Angas, Danby, Handley, and others; engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. Two Vols. super-royal 8vo, cloth, price $7.

 This work forms the continuation of Rev. J. G. Wood's Illustrated Natural History.

II.

A NEW EDITION OF

Jane Austen's Novels.

Neatly Printed and Bound in Extra Cloth, 5 Vols., per Set, $4.

Pride and Prejudice.
Sense and Sensibility.
Northanger Abbey.
Persuasion.
Mansfield Park.
Emma.

III.

A NEW EDITION (Price Reduced to $5).

Russell's (W. H.) Diary in the East during the Tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Illustrated with Chromo-Lithographs and numerous Woodcuts. 8vo, cloth.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Publishers,
416 Broome Street, New York.

GOULD & LINCOLN,

59 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON,
Will issue, on the 5th of March,

The Annual of Scientific Discovery;

OR,

Year Book of Facts in Science and Art, for 1870:

Exhibiting the most important Discoveries and Improvements in Mechanics, Useful Arts, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Astronomy, Meteorology, Biology, including Zoölogy, Physiology, and Botany; Mineralogy, Geology, Geography, Antiquities, etc.; together with a list of recent Scientific Publications, Obituaries of eminent Scientific Men, etc. Edited by

JOHN TROWBRIDGE, S.B.,

Assistant Professor of Physics in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; assisted by Samuel Kneeland, M.D., Professor of Zoölogy and Physiology in the Institute; and W. R. Nichols, Graduate of the Institute. With a fine Likeness of Prof. Benjamin Peirce.

12mo, cloth, price $2.

The forthcoming volume of the Annual will be an unusually valuable and interesting one, embracing as it does a Record of a vast number of remarkable discoveries, important facts—curious, entertaining, and highly instructive—for the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, the Lawyer, the Physician, the Statesman, the Clergyman, the Scientific Man, the Artist, the Teacher. And no School, no Academy, no College, no Town, no State, nor any well-selected Private Library, should be without this work.

☞ A few complete sets of this work can be furnished, embracing years from 1850 to 1870 (twenty volumes), with the Likeness of some distinguished Scientific or Literary Man in each, bound in uniform style, with a neat, substantial box. Price $36.

☞ Each volume is complete in itself, and contains ENTIRELY NEW MATTER.

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

ARGUMENTS IN THE CASE OF

The Board of Education of Cincinnati.

WITH THE

OPINIONS AND DECISION OF THE COURT.

1 vol. 8vo, pp. 420, cloth, price $2; or, on tinted paper cloth, gilt top, $2 50.

Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the price.

ROBERT CLARKE & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
Cincinnati.

VAN NOSTRAND'S Eclectic Engineering Magazine,

No. 3, Volume II., for March.

CONTENTS:

The Bessemer Process Under Pressure (Illustrated); On the Laboring Force of the Human Heart; The Tide Motor (Illustrated); The Fairlie Engine; Art in Engineering; Locomotive Piston (Illustrated); Measurement of Distances by the Level (Illustrated); The Heaton Steel Process (concluded); Long and Short Pillars; The Cost of Steam-Power; Pumping Money; The Working and Ventilation of Coal Mines; Mechanical Engineering in 1869; Building Materials and Appliances; The "Little Wonder;" Festiniog Railway (Illustrated); Presentation of the Rumford Medals; Bridge Construction, 1869; The Hagan Process; Somerset House Accident (Illustrated); Burning Powdered Coal; The Resistance of Vessels; The Black Forest Railway; The Marquette Mining Region (Frontispiece); Portable Condensing Engine; The Action of House Sewage on Lead Pipes; On the Distribution of Rain; The Guns of the Hercules; The Central Imperial School at Paris; A New Water-Column Machine (Illustrated); Air in Coal Gas; The Economical Purification of Zinc Containing Iron; The Water Supply of Paris; True Basis for the Construction of Heavy Artillery; The Clifton Bridge, Niagara; Estimates about the Suez Canal; Paragraphs; Iron and Steel Notes; Railway Notes; Ordnance and Naval Notes; Engineering Structures; New Books; Miscellaneous.

TERMS:

Published Monthly at $5 per Annum.
Single Numbers, 50 Cents.

An extra Copy will be supplied Gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers, at $5 each, sent in one remittance.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray Street, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1870.

The Week.

THE Senate finally passed the Funding Bill on Friday, by a vote of 32 to 10. It has discussed the House Georgia Bill as reported back by the Judiciary Committee without alteration, Mr. Trumbull paying his respects to Gov. Bullock and defending the shelved senator, Mr. Hill, by contrast with Mr. Blodgett, whose Unionism is not nearly above suspicion. On Thursday, Mr. Ferry tried to introduce a very sensible and practical resolution to the effect that treaties of annexation of foreign territory should hereafter be considered in open session. On Friday, Mr. Fenton brought in an important bill to regulate the use and tariffs of ocean cables. Mr. Sumner offered on Monday a resolution directing the national banks and the Treasury to prepare for resumption of specie payments on January 1, 1871. The Army Reduction Bill has formed the staple of discussion in the House, and was passed on Thursday with feeble opposition. Mr. Kelley, happening to differ with Gen. Logan, was twitted as to his disagreeable and rather resonant voice, which gave him an opportunity of saying that, harsh as it might be, it had never harmonized with the clashing of chains and the groans of bondmen. To this the War Democrat retorted that he had stricken off more chains than Mr. Kelley himself or his ancestors had ever done, and he wouldn't mind even throwing in the posterity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Tariff Bill had a brief period of debate on Friday, the Deficiency Bill getting much more attention. In the course of the debate on the latter, Mr. Cox sought to irritate Mr. Dawes by enquiring why he made so good a financial record for the Administration in New Hampshire, after his famous attack upon it in the House. The question was perhaps not wholly impertinent. The House voted to admit Texas on Tuesday.

Mr. Sherman's funding bill has passed the Senate. Under it, $400,000,000 five per cent. ten-forties, the same amount of four and a half per cent. fifteen-forties, and the same amount of four per cent. twenty-forties, are to be issued, and the national banks are to be compelled to substitute them—one-third of each denomination—for the five-twenties they now deposit with the Government as security for their circulation, and as many new banks as please may start on deposit of the four per cent. bonds to be issued in return for greenbacks. Not one of these loans is likely to sell at par, so that not one of them will pay simply the nominal rate of interest assigned to it in the act, and except as regards the bonds the banks are to be forced to buy, all the interest the Government will save by the conversion will be what it will save on the bonds deposited by the banks, or about one and a half per cent. on $300,000,000, amounting in all to about $4,500,000. Indeed, even this saving will be cut off by the funding of greenbacks for four per cent. bonds by new banks, as this will convert a non-interest-bearing into an interest-bearing debt. This funding of the greenbacks would, of course, involve contraction of the currency—a feature which will probably be stricken from the bill in the House, or cause the defeat of the measure, though it is really in the nature of a compromise, as 80 per cent. of greenbacks called in would be reissued in bank bills.

The Georgia Bill, or rather the Bingham amendment, has been debated vigorously in the Senate, Mr. Trumbull doing most of the work on Monday. The galleries were crowded with colored people, an announcement having been made by mistake in the Washington colored churches, last Sunday, that Mr. Revels would speak—an incident with a good deal of pathos in it, whatever the quality of the speech may be, and however much one may wish, for the sake of his race, that he had fairly won his position, instead of being, as it were, flung into it. Mr. Trumbull went over, once more, the history of the reconstruction of Georgia, the following of which really begins to require mental training of no common order. We have frequently made feeble efforts to carry it down to the reorganization of the present Legislature by military officers, and the election of a second brace of senators. Here we take up the wondrous tale under Mr. Trumbull's guidance. It appears that in this new patent Legislature there are members who never went through the little formality of being elected at all by anybody, but who sit, like the European monarchs, by the grace of God. Nine members got in by having the next highest number of votes to candidates who were afterwards declared ineligible, but whose ineligibility was not known or thought of at the time of voting—an ingenious perversion of the parliamentary rule, which declares invalid all votes cast for persons obviously ineligible. One member elect was entrapped into signing a petition to be released from his political disabilities, by being made to believe that he was laboring under disabilities when he really was not, and then, on his petition, was ousted from his seat. And now come Governor Bullock and his confederates in office, and ask Congress not only to admit the State to the Union once more, with a Legislature thus constituted, which Congress, for the sake of peace and quiet, is willing to do, but to seat these worthies in their offices for two years beyond the time for which they were elected. The object of the Bingham amendment is to prevent this monstrous swindle. Mr. Trumbull gave it as his opinion that, if this could be done, there was nothing to prevent Congress keeping them in office for an unlimited time, as we took the liberty of remarking last week. To crown all, the present Legislature has elected two senators, who should rightfully be chosen by the Legislature to be elected next fall.

The whole process, since the Senate decided to begin reconstructing the State the second time, has been one well calculated to alarm as well as disgust every friend of free government on this continent. It has consisted in the surrender of a great community, fresh from a civil war, to probably as bad a lot of political tricksters and adventurers as ever got together in one place, to have all its places of trust and profit scrambled for by them under military superintendence, and by means of nearly every device known to the gambling-house, the mock-auction room, and the thimble-rigger's table; and all this in the presence of a large, newly enfranchised, and very ignorant constituency, to whom the very forms of Government, not to speak of its principles, are still unfamiliar. And to make the shame and humiliation all the greater, all this has been done under pretence of establishing "a republican form of Government," and securing "equal rights for all." We must say, that we think the silence or acquiescence of the Republican press, with a few honorable exceptions, in this disgraceful procedure, does it little credit, and certainly has not helped the party, as time, we know, will show.

The cry now comes from Washington that not only ought the Bingham amendment to be struck out of the bill, but the whole State ought to be relegated to military government, pure and simple, and kept there for the next four years, owing to the outrages on the line of the Brunswick and Albany Railroad, and the threats of the "rebel press" as to what they will do when they get the State into their own hands once more. We should like to ask, seriously, those who talk in this way, whether they really believe that at the end of the four years the condition of public sentiment in the State would be any better than it is now, or as good? Whether they ever heard of a community being trained into peaceableness, love of order, and respect for law by a "military government," which was simply another name for the rule of a hated and despised faction, composed largely of worthless adventurers? Whether there is any State in the Union in which people's blood would not be made to boil in their veins by such a spectacle in their capital as that which the Georgians have been witnessing in theirs during the last three months? Whether they really believe in the old European doctrine that men can be cudgelled and bayoneted into good behavior, and have totally abandoned the American one, that all the political and social virtues, like nearly all the other good things of this world, are the results of growth, and slow growth too? How long do they think the political habits of the American people—which have hitherto been the salvation of the Government—their respect for the forms of law, their love of peaceful discussion, their willingness to abide by the results of elections, their confidence in official integrity, will survive if the policy now pursued, or threatened, in Georgia be persisted in? If a minority has only to cook up stories of "outrages," of "riots," and denials of justice, and run with them to Washington, to be able to get the State Government overturned, how long would it be before we were in the condition of Mexico, with a distinct and well-marked civil war in each State, our Federal army roaming from one to the other, fighting a little here and fighting a little there; setting up "a republican form of government" in one place, chasing a dictator in another, and so on? General Butler is said to be busy with his bill providing for the application of the Georgia policy to Tennessee, and its introduction may now happen any day; but, if the Republican party commits itself to any more of these follies, it may as well make up its mind to receiving its quietus the next time the country gets a chance at it.

The Commercial Advertiser, of this city, by-the-by, expresses its surprise that we should make such frequent reference to this worthy gentleman, and thinks some private grief must be at the bottom of the attentions we lavish on him. Let us say once for all, that the chastisement of personal enemies in the Nation is a luxury which nobody connected with it permits himself. We are aware that some members of the editorial fraternity think the opportunities which editing affords for venting private spites one of the principal advantages of the profession, but we believe the better portion of the civilized world looks on all such use of a newspaper as ruffianly and cowardly; and we share that opinion. We have no acquaintance with General Butler, never have had, and never shall have; and have received no injury from him except such as we have received from Messrs. Tweed, Sweeny, Fisk, jr., and Mr. Justice Barnard. The reason why we make such frequent reference to him is, that he is an active and prominent member of the House, makes from two to three speeches a week on public affairs, has a following of Republican members who aid him in attacks on the public credit and other works of mischief, and enjoys the confidence of a great many "moral" brethren up in Massachusetts, and has for some time past been altogether one of the most potent powers of evil in the Republican party. Our political criticism, we wish it to be distinctly understood, we do not serve out, as some people think we ought, like grog in the navy—so many gills a week to each man, and no favor to any; we make distinctions. Upon the lively and restless and influential we expend, as is proper, more than on others; and this is the duty of all newspapers. It is not their business to distribute praise and blame in equal rations, but to inform the public judgment about the most prominent political phenomena, and especially to keep public attention fixed on the knaves. The good men and the simpletons may occasionally be allowed to get out of sight, but your thoroughpaced knaves need constant watching.

The Worcester Spy accuses us of having done Mr. Sumner injustice in our comments on his "pivotal propositions" about the conversion of the public debt, and then aggravates the matter by some absurdity of its own. The fact is, we dealt very leniently with the "propositions" in question. We cannot spare space to quote them entire again. They will be found in last week's Nation. The first proposition is that, if you "reduced sixes to fives, millions would be released [from what?] to seek investment," etc. The second, that "the reduction to four or four and a half per cent. would release millions more." The Spy says that the orator here meant that foreign capital would flow in to take the place of native capital, and thus release the latter—a process of which the Nation had just been approving, Suppose he did, what would the propositions amount to then? Why, simply to an assertion that the reduction of the interest would draw foreign capital, and that, the more we reduced it, the more millions of it would come to us; in other words, it is the high rate of the present interest which now keeps it out! The speaker, therefore, became quite pathetic in calling on Congress to cut down the interest, for the sake of enterprise, commerce, manufactures, railroads, and all sorts of things. But we shall now show that the orator did not mean what the Spy says he meant. He says, further on, that, "without any adverse intention, the National Government is a victorious competitor, and the defeated parties are those very interests whose success is so important to the country." Now he here evidently supposes, either that the Government has certain money which its creditors would withdraw if it lowered its interest, or that it is in the market trying to borrow at a high rate of interest, neither of which is true. It has no money belonging to anybody, and it is not a borrower in the market. It is, therefore, not a competitor of any kind with anybody. It did borrow money during the war, but it has spent it all, and owes it now. The only competition that goes on about its securities goes on between private investors. If it issued a new loan at a lower rate of interest, it would not affect investors at all, unless it repudiated as against actual holders; new purchasers would only buy at their own rates, and the relation of its securities to railroad and other securities would remain exactly where it was. We have, therefore, not been unfair to Mr. Sumner. No newspaper could pass over such statements, coming from a man in his position, who is actually giving people lessons in finance, without neglecting its duty to the public. He has at this moment two financial bills before Congress, and is evidently devoting himself seriously to the subject.

The so-called Piegan massacre has been much talked of during the week, and Gen. Logan has seized upon it to withdraw the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department from his bill to reorganize the army. It it difficult to consider dispassionately an event which is, and cannot but be, a distressing one, and yet we fear that the blame—as indicated by Gen. Logan's action as well as by the comments of the press—has thus far been fixed upon those not justly responsible. The fact is, that Montana is a military district with probably the greatest number of Indians and the fewest number of troops, and that last summer the Piegans became conspicuous for their depredations and outrages, but, for the reasons just given, could not be subdued. The Interior Department explicitly surrendered the charge of them to the War Department, and the mode of dealing with them then fell under military rules and necessities. Gen. Sheridan's plan was to wait till they were encamped for the winter, and in a condition to be surprised with the least resistance, and then to attack them suddenly and inflict the heaviest sort of punishment. This was what Col. Baker, an able officer, accomplished, though, as it appears, he found but few of the Piegan warriors in camp, and killed a large number of the women and children, among whom small-pox was also at work. His prisoners consisted of about 100 of the latter, whom he presently let go on account of the disease. As there is no evidence to show that a non-combatant camp was purposely selected, the only question is, whether more women and children were killed than was absolutely unavoidable in an indiscriminate attack. On this point we do not get light, and it may be some time before we shall, though Gen. Sherman has ordered an exact report from Col. Baker. Meantime, it is well to remember how difficult it is among Indians to distinguish the sexes by their dress, especially when in their lodges, and in the early hour of morning at which it was deemed prudent to make the assault. That there was some restraint is clear from the fact that the whole body were not sacrificed; perhaps there might have been more, but we have not now the means of judging.

The real cause of grief and shame is contained not in the military manœuvre per se, nor even in the excess of bloodshed that may have attended it, but the fact that we are still, after so many years, at war with the Indians, and without any manifest intention, as a nation, to keep our faith with them and protect them from border ruffians. In the fall of 1867, Gen. Sherman, at the head of a commission authorized by Congress to make peace with the Indians, met them and made treaties afterwards ratified by the Senate—all in the most formal and authoritative manner; indeed, the tribes had never before been approached on such an errand by so weighty representatives of the Government and people. The Secretary of the Interior has just called the attention of Congress and the country to the pledge made by both Houses that the treaties of 1867, when ratified by the Senate, should be binding, and to the persistent refusal of the House, ever since, to make appropriations necessary to carry them out. The consequence has been that the Indians who wished to be peaceful have gone unfed, and have had the strongest temptations to plunder. That they have not done so more generally is not to be attributed to the immediate resistance they would have encountered. The House, from its now habitual jealousy of the Senate, by pretending that it never sanctioned the treaties recognized by act of Congress, subject to the Senate's ratification—which was given, as we said—is really responsible for the miserable state of things now existing in the Indian country.

The custom of Congress, if not Congress itself, is chargeable directly with the fate of the Piegans. Last August, Gen. Sully, the Indian Superintendent at Helena, wrote to Commissioner Parker as follows:

"I intend to do all I can to arrest some of the citizens, who, about ten days ago, committed the cowardly murder of a harmless old man and a boy about fourteen years old at Fort Benton. They were Piegans (a part of the Blackfeet nation). These Indians were shot in broad daylight in the streets of the town. I think I can arrest the murderers, but doubt very much if I can convict them in any court. Nothing can be done to ensure peace and order till there is a military force here strong enough to clear out the roughs and whiskey-sellers in the country; but I will do all I can, with the limited means in my power, to prevent a war or any serious difficulties between the whites and Indians."

Now, will it be believed that the Indian Committees of both Houses are generally so constituted as to have a majority of members from the representatives of these "roughs and whiskey-sellers"—that portion, at least, of our border population which is thoroughly and bitterly hostile to the Indians, and desirous of their utter extermination? Yet such is the case, and, so long as it is, we venture to believe that we shall never see the end of our Indian troubles. If the experience of half a century of Indian agencies, broken treaties, squatter encroachments, massacres, and wars little better than massacres, has not taught us that the white population of the border is essentially unfitted to do justice to the tribes or to live in peace with them, then it is plain we shall never learn anything; and the Kansas representative has a prescriptive right to be put on the Committee in whose hands, more than in any other, the American character for good faith, humanity, and belief in its own ideas now reposes.

The heavy fall in gold, mainly owing to our large cotton and other exports, and to the Treasury sales, combined with the slight reflux of silver from Canada during the last two or three weeks, excited the expectation in a good many people's minds that we were going to get back to specie payments by mere momentum, and without anybody taking any special pains in the matter; and sneers at the "political economists" and the "theoretical financiers" began to be heard, and more of that wise old talk about abolishing "the Gold Room" by law, as the cause of all the mischief; on the theory, apparently, that, if you "stand by," as the sailors say, and, the minute gold reaches par, shut up the doors of that accursed den with a bang, at par gold will stay evermore hereafter. Without dwelling upon the plan of getting out of a gale by smashing the barometer, let us say that the gold's reaching par in the Gold Room in speculative sales, or sales of small quantities, would not enable the Government or the banks to resume specie payments. To resume specie payments, it is not sufficient to show people, when they bring in their paper, the latest bulletins of the Gold Exchange; you have to pay the coin over the counter, and not on one day or two, but as long as people choose to demand it. You have, in other words, not only to resume, but to keep resuming. If the Government and the banks were to offer gold for paper, and the public thought, as it certainly might fairly think now, that their supply of it was too small to hold out, there would be a rush to get what there was, and the resumption would last just long enough to create what is called a "financial flurry." A turn in exchange at this moment, which might occur any moment, under the influence of a rapid revival of speculation in Europe, or a falling off in our exports here, would give gold a rapid upward tendency; and, in fact, such a tendency has appeared within the last two or three days.

The report of the evidence taken at Yokohama regarding the loss of the Oneida, goes to show that the captain of the Bombay knew he had done serious damage to an American ship, an English naval officer at Yokohama proving that he said to him after his arrival that "he had cut the quarter off a damned Yankee frigate," and that it served her right, or words to that effect. This indication of his state of mind undoubtedly goes some way to explain how it was he did not go back to the succor of the crew of the sinking ship or hear her signals of distress. He was evidently in a rage, and was not disposed to hear or see anything that would put him to any inconvenience. Upon the question who was to blame for the collision, we are not competent to pass an opinion, but experts say that the Oneida, being under sail, had the right of way. A piece of worse brutality than his performance is hardly to be found in the annals of the sea, and it merits what we fear it will not receive—a conviction for manslaughter, and the heaviest sentence the law allows. But then, if he is not to blame for the collision, the worst probably that can happen him is the loss of his situation and the withdrawal of his certificate, which would also drive him from his profession, and, as he is an elderly man, would not be a light penalty, but yet not a sufficient one. We doubt if he can be made criminally responsible, because the law does not compel a man to be actively humane. The one consoling feature in the affair was the behavior of the Oneida's officers and crew, which seems to have been perfect; and to behave perfectly at death's door is all that man can expect of men.

Some of the reasoning on the affair—not much we admit—has been of a slightly mysterious kind. In the first place, the disaster hardly affords a sufficient basis for the generalization, which we have seen hinted at in one or two papers, that ramming the ships of friendly powers at sea, and then leaving the crews to drown, is a common practice in the British commercial marine. Nor do we see why the statement of the captain of the Smidt, that, while lying-to in a tremendous gale, two English ships passed him and failed to show their ensigns in answer to his, should, on account of the Oneida affair, be printed in italics. Is it supposed they had thoughts of sinking the Smidt, and didn't want any possible survivors to know who had done it? Or were they pirates? Moreover, we do not see how the conduct of the Bombay strengthens Mr. Pumpelly's account of the running down of the Chinese boat which he witnessed on board the Shanghae steamer. Mr. Pumpelly's position is, as we understand it, that the American and British residents in China, like Americans and Englishmen everywhere, not only disregard the rights of men of races which they consider as "inferior," but do not entertain towards them the common feelings of humanity, and run down junks in the Chinese seas with little or no compunction. Had Captain Eyre thought the Oneida was a junk, his conduct would undoubtedly help to support Mr. Pumpelly; but it appears that he knew what the Oneida was; and, even if he did not know to what nationality she belonged, his long experience in Eastern seas must have made him familiar with the difference between an American frigate and a Japanese junk, whether seen by night or by day. It is, we believe, not maintained by Mr. Pumpelly, or anybody else, that Americans and English seamen look on each other as only fit to be food for the fishes, or as they look on Chinamen.

A fresh complication has been introduced into Spanish affairs by the killing of Prince Henri de Bourbon, in a duel, by the Duc de Montpensier, the effect on the Duke's pretensions to the throne being likely to prove unfavorable. Besides this, there is no news from Spain of much consequence. Mr. Fish has made a statement of some importance with regard to her relations with the United States, which he declares are very cordial—the Spaniards having shown every possible regard for American "susceptibilities," as the French say, short of stopping the war in Cuba. He also adds, that a large number of the stories received of outrages on American citizens in the island have either been inventions or gross exaggerations.

The remainder of the foreign news is not very interesting, except that from Rome. Count Daru has made, unofficially, some very strong protests against the doctrine of infallibility, and hints that, if adopted, it will be impossible for the French troops to remain in Rome. Austria is said to have joined France in demanding the admission of lay representatives of these powers to the Council. The Pope and his adherents, however, are said to be as obstinate as ever.

THE ROMAN MOTH AND THE ROMAN CANDLE.

It seems that, at the very outset, the public assumed a wrong attitude with regard to the Œcumenic Council. No doubt, to the artist or to the poet who loves the images of the past, such a grand mise-en-scène of a long-shelved drama is justly interesting. The philosopher, too, delights in such unsought opportunities to study the workings of that divine instinct which, though dimmed and overruled in private life by man's freedom of will, reappears so strikingly in the collective doings of mankind, weaving "God's garment" (as the Earth Spirit says to Faust) with unconscious shuttles that know not why and whither they move. But this kind of interest is called forth by the mere fact, by the knowledge that in 1869 an Œcumenic Council was convoked, by the strangeness of its avowed aims and purposes, and perhaps, æsthetically at least, by the imposing spectacle of its opening ceremony. The actual doings of a Roman Church parliament, the details of its daily history, are not only of very questionable importance, but are, in this case, most carefully and, on the whole, successfully concealed from the world.

Now, in private life, we are in the habit of respecting other people's secrets, provided we know them to be innocent and harmless secrets. When two begin to whisper, the third steps aside or opens a book, and, when the two whisperers have closeted themselves in the adjoining room, who would think of listening at the door or peeping through the key-hole! It is different, of course, in cases of danger. In warfare, espionage and bribery are held legitimate, and nobody would blame an oppressed people for keeping an army of spies round the stronghold of the oppressor. But in this case of the Roman Council we have to do only with a would-be oppressor. Those who are apparently oppressed by him are so only because and inasmuch as they wish to be oppressed. For mental slavery is very unlike social or political bondage. The mental slave is free, only he does not know it, as Hegel says. If these slaves became conscious of their freedom, they would, at once, cease to be slaves without any fight or struggle, and would consequently require neither spies nor soldiers. Much less would contented slaves require such services. In the absence of any appreciable danger and of any reasonable ground for defensive espionage, we must conclude that the listening at the door is, in this case, a sign of ordinary curiosity. This is the more probable, as most of those who have gone to Rome for this purpose are persons that have outgrown the object of their curiosity, who neither love nor hate nor fear him, and who would listen to the thunders of the Vatican with the same æsthetic emotions as the Parisians listen to Meyerbeer's perfect thunder in the Africaine.

All that is really interesting and noteworthy about this Roman Council lies on the surface, or, at any rate, in depths accessible to any ordinary thinker, whether he be bodily present or not. It lies in the characteristic wantonness and imprudence suddenly displayed by a power which for centuries had shown itself to be a model of tact and shrewdness. It lies in this, that the convoking of this assembly was an uncalled-for, inopportune, and dangerous step, as will at once be seen on examining its possible results. And it lies in the fact that this uncalled-for, inopportune, and dangerous step was suggested and advocated by the adepts of that very order whose leading principles are masterly inactivity, expediency, and caution. When Jesuits blunder—in the highest sense they always do so—but when they blunder in the worldly sense of the word, they must be ill indeed, and badly off. And this is (in medical parlance) an interesting case, which may well test one's powers of diagnosis and prognosis, though it would be an idle occupation to note down every word that falls from the sick man's feverish lips.

But have the Jesuits really committed a blunder? A few considerations will suffice to show that they have.

The Roman Church pretends to be the trustee of absolute truth. Immobility must, therefore, be her principle, or rather her nature. That is consistent. But, if you put anything immovable into this world which cannot help moving, friction is the unavoidable consequence. The Roman Church has not failed to perceive this, either, and to take it into due consideration. She has, from time immemorial, endeavored to lessen this attritus chiefly by retarding the movement of the outer world, but also by lubricating her own surface and by imparting to it a very considerable degree of elasticity. In fact, the Roman Church is easy-going, on the whole, and rarely mean. She is ever ready to waive minor points, and, though shaving and draping her priests at Rome, allows beards in Armenia and secular frocks in partibus infidelium. She does not like thwarting or offending anybody. She never says no, if she can possibly help it, and, if hard pressed for an answer, does not go beyond the non possumus, the mildest form of the negative. To avoid saying no, she avoids conflicts, and, above all, discussion, and generally prefers passive resistance to active opposition. This singular aversion to saying no has been one of the most characteristic features of Roman diplomacy in secular as well as in ecclesiastical matters. When the name of a foreign bishop or canon designated by his government is sent for approval to Rome (which is done, according to existing treaties, either through the ambassador or through an agent appointed ad hoc by the Papal See), the unfortunate nominee has always to wait a very long time, even for a favorable reply. But should he not be deemed acceptable, Rome does not refuse her sanction, but simply confines herself to saying nothing at all either in word or writing. So well established is this custom that it is generally understood that, if no answer has arrived in two years, the chances are against the candidate. And when four years have elapsed, a new nomination may safely be resorted to. Such is the urbanity of the Roman Shepherd; at least the sheep of his flock, however rustic they may be, accept it as such, and it has worked remarkably well so far. Unlike the human eye, which owes its long range of vision to its power of accommodation, the Roman Church owes its power of accommodation to its farsightedness. By never refusing, by never arguing, and by letting well alone as long as possible, it has managed to outlive the intellectual storms that have raged around it, and to preserve, if not its life, an imposing continuity of historical existence.

But, if this oiliness was found so useful in the olden times, when the secular wheel revolved but slowly, it obviously became doubly necessary in the midst of modern fastness. Formerly the axle-tree could, by not oiling itself, act as a brake, and beyond a little creaking there was no unpleasantness. But should it begin jarring now, with a fly-wheel spinning round it, it would "infallibly" catch fire. Hitherto Rome seems to have been rightly guided by its instincts. Up to the sixteenth century, the church used to open her lips for argument and discussion at the rate of rather more than once in every century, nineteen Councils having been held in fifteen hundred years. But, when the day of modern civilization began to dawn, these lips were closed, and have remained closed for three hundred years, no Council having been held since the Council of Trent. Now, it is a fact that, during this long period of silence and passivity, a good many usages and habits of thought have become traditional among the faithful. These usages and habits of thought would probably require revising and sifting in the interest of truth. But the Roman Church itself could gain nothing by such a revision, and might lose much. Even some creeds have become traditionally established. The uneducated masses know nothing about the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals or about the Decretum of Gratian; but a confused echo of those old controversies reaches somehow their unlearned ears. If they misinterpret it, their mistake, provided they err on the right side, is not likely to be corrected by the priests, and the consequence is that generation after generation is allowed to grow up in certain ideas, and even doctrines, which become dear to them by the very force of habit, but which never had any legal foundation or official sanction, which were, in fact, never proclaimed by the church, but which, on the other hand, were never refuted, condemned, or even declared questionable.

One of these purely traditional doctrines is that of Papal infallibility. It is quite certain that, until last year, the great bulk of the Roman Catholics believed, as a matter of course, that the head of their church must either be infallible, or cease to be viewed as the vicar of Christ. There was good logic in this. Learned theologians may have had some doubts about the matter, or may have made some subtle distinction between personal and ex-cathedrâ infallibility. But, if they made such distinctions or had some doubts, they certainly kept them to themselves. The world knew nothing about it, and the Pope enjoyed his infallibility as undisturbedly as he could ever reasonably expect.

Why, then, not let well alone? What could the Roman Church gain by swerving from its time-honored habits of caution, to which it owes so much, merely for the sake of ratifying a doctrine which had already become, to say the least, a popular belief, and by thus opening the eyes of the faithful, for the first time in their lives, on the questionable soundness of what they had justly considered as a fundamental axiom, and as a corner-stone of their church? If the new dogma was intended as a means of overawing Gallicanism, and of gradually withdrawing the privileges and concessions granted in former times to the national churches, the miscalculation was so obvious and so gross as to be unworthy of even the youngest of Loyola's novices. The sullen attitude of the German Catholics, and the really threatening attitude of the Armenians, go far to show this.

Again, one must ask, What possessed the sovereign head of the church, who wielded absolute and undisputed power, to rake up the question of competency, and to begin talking of the constitution of the church, of the balance of its authorities, and the rights of the Council? If the Pope, as the whole Catholic world admits, has alone the power of convoking the Council, and if at the same time he has the power of never convoking it at all, the power and the rights of this Council become obviously as nugatory as its existence; and to raise the question as to whether the Council is superior to the Pope, or the Pope superior to the Council, seems idle and fanciful. None of the venerable bishops now assembled in Rome ever dreamt of being invested with legislative powers; and, if they had not been called away from their flocks and homes, such ambitious ideas would surely never have entered into their heads. In 1849, Mazzini wrote a pamphlet, under the title "Dal Papa al Concilio," proposing an appeal from the Pope to the Council. But in 1849 the Pope was an exile at Gaeta, and the Romans, though not appointing an anti-pope, had, in a fit of petulant humor, excommunicated the Pope. Consequently, in the Roman dictator's eyes, there was no Pope at that time, and an appeal to the ever-potential Council, as a kind of constituent power, seemed natural enough. The bishops may constitute themselves as a revolutionary body—the case is at least imaginable. But a Pope cannot be expected to invite them to sit in judgment over him.

One is, in fact, at a loss to understand the motives that may have prompted the Pope to convoke this assembly. The only plausible hypothesis is that the church has lost her old instincts. The Jesuits have for once overshot the mark, and the Pope, who lives in blissful ignorance of the spirit of the age, and who has always been fond of playing with the insignia of his power, has eagerly availed himself of a rare opportunity for displaying the pomp of his court and the vastness of his empire. His famous Encyclical and his still more famous Syllabus show, however, that a wide and deep gulf—nay, a daily widening and daily deepening gulf, separates him from humanity and civilization. Till then the gulf had remained partly hidden and might have been ignored. But now who could walk across it without feeling giddy? The promulgation of the Syllabus was unmistakably a sign of despair, of impotent despair. To see in it an act of aggression or a formidable challenge would betray either a bad conscience or a weak mind. On reading the Syllabus, we know at once that by it the Vatican has played its highest card. It can say nothing stronger. The world knows the worst, then, and has heard the loudest thunder without being the worse for it. What, in fact, has happened during these six years that would not have happened without the Syllabus? Has Rome gained in influence and power, and has the world lost even an inch of ground, in consequence of its promulgation in 1864?

Why, then, protest against it in diplomatic notes, or confute its curious theses by any show of argument in books and pamphlets, in newspapers and public speeches? Even those two learned and accomplished gentlemen who have put their heads together, occipitally, at least, to form a Janus-head, what have they to say worth knowing in their four hundred pages, unless it were some mouldy learning leading to no standpoint and opening no new vista? It cannot be supposed that the Syllabus produced no impression on account of its not having the binding force of a dogma. If it had not, the lay world was not aware of the defect, and accepted the document as emanating from the highest authority on earth. If the Council is now invited to give to some of the paragraphs the official dignity of a dogma, this very invitation, however fully obeyed, must still further weaken the already feeble effect of the Syllabus. The same may be said of the dogma of the Assumption, which, having been assumed so long, might have been left untampered with now. After having celebrated the 15th of August for fifteen centuries, the Catholic world must feel shocked and alarmed at the retrospective possibility that so many fireworks may have been let off in honor of an erroneous assumption.

And as to the infallibility, its discussion, having been neglected in the Middle Ages, should never have been brought on in the nineteenth century. If the Council is to decide, it can either ratify the doctrine or abrogate it. In the former case, the Pope would obtain nothing but what he practically had before. In the latter case, he would suffer a loss of power and prestige which might ultimately lead to curious changes in Roman Catholic ideas. In either case, to the outside world, the decrees of the Council would be what the Index is to the literary world—rather less than a curiosity.

THE NAVAL CONTROVERSY.

A CONTROVERSY has long existed between the two classes of officers in the Navy known as "the line" and "the staff." Many pamphlets have been written and much ink has been expended in the newspapers on both sides of the question, seemingly without convincing either party that the arguments of the other are inconclusive. During the past year the dispute has waxed warmer and more earnest than ever. Several bills have been presented to Congress, the provisions of which are designed to settle the contest, and the Naval Committees of both Houses have these projects under serious consideration.

The staff-officers—surgeons, paymasters, engineers, chaplains, professors of mathematics, naval constructors—urge that they are essential to complete naval organization; that, inasmuch as all their professional functions are performed for a military result, and under the requirements of military laws and tribunals, they are military men, and that their commands or orders to subordinates of their respective vocations are military, because they can be enforced only through the processes of military law. Their commissions are printed from the same plate, filled up on the same blanks, as those of the line. They are formally and legally alike in this respect. Both are appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; they alike hold their commissions under the same laws and conditions. They participate with the line in all the discomforts, privations, and perils incident to the vicissitudes of naval life both in war and in peace. The records of the late rebellion prove that staff-officers are killed and drowned in battle, die from exertion in the line of official duty, and suffer imprisonment at the hands of the enemy, like those of the line. Only one officer of the line and one of the staff escaped from the disaster which overtook the ill-fated Oneida in the waters of Japan. The notorious case of Passed Assistant-Surgeon Green shows that staff-officers are not exempted from the inflictions of military tribunals.

For such reasons staff-officers believe that their right to be considered military men is established. Being military men, they claim a position in the naval organization just as definite and fixed as the position of every officer of the line, which is to him individual and distinct, and impenetrable, for no two officers of the line can occupy the same position at the same time, because each is either superior or inferior to all others. Technically, the position of an officer is termed his rank. Practically, it is the measure of his authority, responsibility, privilege, and immunity; and, incidentally, of his personal convenience and comfort. The staff-people represent that they are unhappy, and suffer many inconveniences and slights at the hands of the line, because they possess no rank which the latter will recognize and respect.

While Secretary of the Navy, Mr. George Bancroft, in the year 1846, conferred on medical officers, in a general order, degrees of "rank with" certain grades of line officers; and with a view to abate their opposition to the measure, and in a spirit of compromise, he in serted in the order a provision that "commanding and executive officers of whatever grade" should have precedence of all medical (staff) officers. Subsequently, the same degrees of "rank with" were conferred on paymasters and engineers; and all those general orders were legalized by Congress. Shortly after the commencement of the war of the rebellion several new grades were given to the line; and Mr. Welles, Secretary of the Navy, in 1863, gave to staff-officers, with the assent of the Cabinet, increased degrees of rank, in a general order or regulation. Within a few days after the advent of Vice-Admiral Porter to participation in the administration of naval affairs, this regulation of Mr. Welles was annulled, and consequently the staff-officers were degraded to the degrees of rank mentioned in the legalized general orders.

The line contumaciously opposed and evaded the practical observance of those general orders. It was, and is still, argued that there are no staff-officers in the navy. In a spirit of disparagement line-officers called them "non-combatants," although they were killed in battle; "civil officers," although they are held amenable to military laws and military tribunals; and, lately, "mere auxiliaries" and "necessary evils in the service." They urge that the words "rank with" mean, at most, "assimilated rank," and really signify nothing. If the Secretary had said, "shall have the 'rank of,'" no one could have cavilled about the meaning of the order. Even had he said "rank of," the proviso giving precedence to commanding and executive officers practically annulled the rank, because all officers in the performance of duty issue commands, and therefore all officers of the line are commanding officers, and, according to the expressed terms of the order, have precedence of all staff-officers. Again, every line-officer who executes an order is an executive officer, and entitled to precedence of all staff-officers. This must be the true construction, because the laws of the navy nowhere recognize or mention a grade of executive officers. The logical conclusion of the line from these premises and arguments is that the rank of staff-officers is purely nominal and possesses none of the properties of rank properly so called.

Another argument is, that rank and command are inseparable, although it is patent that line-officers of every grade are on leave of absence or waiting orders, and, consequently, are without command. Rank is determined by the commission, and is permanent under all circumstances; but command, or right to command, is derived from the orders of the President or Secretary of the Navy, which always describe and limit its sphere. Yet the dogma that rank and command are inseparable is pertinaciously adhered to, and put forward as a conclusive argument why it is impossible to give any rank to staff-officers. They say, to give them rank is, in fact, giving them the right to command ships, which would be most unreasonable, and very dangerous to the nation's interest in the Navy. It is alleged, too, on the part of the line, that naval discipline must be impaired, and the safety of our public ships imperilled, by giving a fixed position in the military body to mere civilians, who scorn to be regarded as men of inferior caste. One distinguished gentleman states that, in times past, he served when naval discipline was in high condition, and then the rank of "civil" officers was far inferior to what it is now, implying that the quality of discipline is contingent upon the degree of rank of staff-officers. "Flogging in the Navy and on board vessels of commerce" was abolished September 28, 1850. Prior to this date, it was urged that the abolition of the lash would be ruinous to "the discipline and good of the service," whatever that may be. But experience has demonstrated that those anticipations were as groundless as the evils which, it was said, must follow the Emancipation Act and the abolition of slavery in the United States.

It is pretended that, whatever degrees of rank Congress in its wisdom may confer on staff-officers, it is absolutely necessary for the "good of the service" that the executive officer, no matter how inferior his lineal rank may be, shall have precedence of them all. This is a pet notion, and has no more foundation in fact than had the arguments against the abolition of the lash and of slavery. There is no grade known as executive officer. His position in a ship is the same as that of an adjutant in the army. His function is to execute the general orders of the officer in command, in relation to the police routine and regulations. His duties could be discharged by the junior as well as by the senior line-officer, and without conferring upon him any precedence additional to that which pertains to his lineal rank. As well argue that letter-carriers must have precedence of all officers to whom they convey orders from the Navy Department. The executive officer is simply the agent or actuary of his commander for certain purposes. The "officer of the deck" or "officer of the watch," who corresponds to the "officer of the day" in the army, may be of any grade or rank in the line. But no one ever refused to obey an order of the "officer of the deck" or of the "officer of the day" on the ground that he was of inferior rank to himself, and could not take precedence of him. By assumption, on one hand, and tame acquiescence, on the other, the executive officer has grown to be a dangerous rival of the commander. He calls himself "second in command." There are instances of executive officers who are said to believe that success in battle was due to themselves exclusively, and that they, and not their commanders, are entitled to the reward of merit.

A consequence of this long-continued controversy is that there are fifty-four vacancies in a body of medical officers which numbers two hundred when full, and there are few, if any, properly qualified candidates to fill them, while there are at least two hundred asking admission into the medical staff of the army. Besides lessening the attractions which belong to an honorable service, and so far increasing the Government's difficulty in procuring suitably qualified professional servants, it is detrimental to that spirit of brotherhood which is an element important, if not essential, to the efficiency and harmony of military organization.

"In the army," General Sherman says, in a recently published letter to Vice-Admiral Porter—"in the army, all our staff-officers have actual rank. They hold commissions from the President as generals, colonels, majors, captains, etc., which fix their pay, allowances, precedence, and privileges generally. But the sixty-second article of war establishes who is to command. If, upon marches, guard, or in quarters, different corps of the army shall happen to join or do duty together, the officer highest in rank of the line of the army, marine corps, or militia, by commission, then on duty or in quarters, shall command the whole, and give orders for what is needful to the service, unless otherwise specially directed by the President of the United States, according to the nature of the case. Therefore—and it frequently happens—when a captain or lieutenant finds himself senior, he commands the whole, though there may be under him surgeons, paymasters, quartermasters, etc., with commissions of colonel or major, who must obey his orders. So long as a line officer is present for duty, he must command. He cannot waive it, for the Government holds him especially responsible for whatever duty or enterprise the command may be engaged in. This is true as to the commanding officer; and is practically true as to the officer of the day, who corresponds with your officer of the deck, as also the adjutant, who simply executes the orders of his commanding officer. In all other respects the staff-officers have the full advantage of their rank. On the whole, our army system seems to work well in practice."

The staff-officers of the Navy ask Congress to place them on the same footing as staff-officers in the army. They feel assured that the system which experience has proved to work well in practice in the army will work equally well in the Navy. At any rate, it might be tried, for, if it should fail after sufficient trial to test it, Congress is always competent to remedy its defects by subsequent legislation. Numerically, the staff-officers are nearly equal to those of the line. They are equally interested in the efficiency of the Navy, and equally delight in the glories and popularity it has fairly won, and may still increase. They know that the brilliant fame of Farragut, Porter, and others throws some of its lustre upon themselves, because they believe that their faithful and zealous labors contributed to our heroes' success in the hour of danger and battle.

THE MYTH OF HAMLET.

How many of those eager listeners who have hung on the words of Booth or Fechter, night after night, have imagined that the Hamlet whom he so well presents to us is only a mythic impersonation of the ripening ear of grain or of the lightning flash? We bow to the advance of scientific investigation, and give up the pretty fable of Llewellyn and his faithful Gellert, for we find it almost word for word in the Hitopadesa, where the Indian story teller narrates it of a Brahmin and his otter. We are even glad to have the contested identity of William Tell settled by finding that he is a representation of the sun whose rays shoot unerringly. But Shakespeare has breathed such life into all his characters—we know so well all their actions, we have seen them so often before our eyes, that we are sure they once existed. We relegate them, perhaps, when hard pressed, to Keltic England or to the early ages of Denmark; but they must have for us a local habitation and a name. We perhaps shall best note what progress mythological science—a creation of a dozen years—is making if we find that one of our most thoroughly-known heroes is shown to be a myth. It is singular what an effect the disproval or explanation of some familiar belief or character has on us; we are at once ready to give up most of our others; we admit, without a struggle, that Homer is a collection of popular ballads, and that the rape of Helen has some connection with the rising of the sun. Seeing that we must give up the theory which some of our pious school-teachers gave us, that Hercules was a reworking of the story of Samson, we begin even to suggest a mythological origin to Samson himself.

The story of Hamlet, as we well know, was derived by Shakespeare from the old Danish chronicle of Saxo Grammaticus, who tells many legends and tales of the old Danish princes. The story, as there given, is much the same as it is in Shakespeare, but the conclusion is different; for Amleth, as he is there called, burns up the palace with all the courtiers, and safely kills Feng, his adulterous and murderous uncle, after which he marries the daughters of the kings of Britain and Scotland, and lives a long time happily and well. The father of Amleth is Orwandil, the mother Gêruta, and the uncle Feng. Polonius and Ophelia both appear, but are unnamed. In the original, as well as in Shakespeare, Hamlet counterfeits madness in order to kill his uncle, and this slyness and cunning was a quality held in high esteem by the northern heroes. There is not in the original story the slightest trace of that indecision of character which in Shakespeare forms Hamlet's chief characteristic; but, at the same time, the long delay in revenging his murdered father, his nearest and first duty, seems to have been regarded by those hot-blooded, quick-willed Scandinavians as a proof of weakness. That is shown from a passage in the Hrôlf's Saga: "This sword is for no Amlôdhi;" i.e., for no irresolute man, as the context makes plain. He is, however, not such a character, but thoughtful, slow, and sure.

Saxo knew but one part of the Orwandil legend, which he to some extent arbitrarily reworked. There is in the younger Edda another part of this saga, which, as Uhland showed long ago, is one of the cycle of myths relating to Thor. It is to this effect: When Thor returned home from his victory over the Giant Hrungni, he still carried in his head the piece of his antagonist's stone weapon, which had entered there during the fight. Thereupon the prophetess Grôa or Grôdha, the wife of Orwandil the Bold, was asked to cure him. She comes and sings her magic runes over Thor till the stone in his head becomes loose. Thor, feeling the relief, rewards her for the cure with the glad message that Orwandil will soon come home to her. He himself carried him in a basket on his back over the ice-stream Eliwâgar, in order to free him from the power of the Frost giant. But one toe stuck up out of the basket and froze. He thereupon broke it off, threw it up to the sky, and made out of it the constellation "Orwandil's toe." Grôa is so rejoiced at this news that she forgets her incantations. So the stone still sticks in Thor's head.

Both Uhland and Ettmüller agree in the explanation of this legend. Thor is the god of agriculture, and therefore fights with the giants who injure it, and especially with Hrungni, the hard rock, that resists all cultivation and breaks him in pieces with his hammer—the thunderbolt. Grôa is growth. Her husband Orwandil (arrow-working) is the embryo which, when the seed bursts, sends up its arrow-like leaves. Thor carries him over the ice-stream; i.e., he protects the seed during the winter. Orwandil sticks out a toe which is frozen; that is, the seed sprouts too quickly. Grôa is a prophetess, because from the growth we know the future harvest. The stone left in Thor's head is what we still find in the fields, and which the growth of the grain cannot wholly overcome.

The great objection to this explanation is that it is too perfect. Pretty as it is, it is not borne out by analogy nor by the necessary explanations of related myths. Orwandil corresponds to the Anglo-Saxon word earendel (earhvendel), a beam or ray, and means the lightning spark; the ray of the spring weather which Thor carried through the winter to join his consort, the green sprouting vegetation. After the darkness of winter Thor relights the moons and stars with his lightning, just as Indra, in the Sanskrit mythology, lights them up after his contest with the dragon. And in the same way Indra carries Kutsa (the personified thunder-bolt) in his car when he goes out to fight the demons.

A relic of this myth is still preserved to us in the legend of St. Christopher bearing Christ over the river: the saint takes the place of Thor, has the "terrible face," the red beard and hair of the old god, is propitiated by the sacrifice of cocks, and is a defender against lightning and hailstorms. By a natural process common in all mythologies, the personified thunderbolt became a hypostase or other form of the thunderthrower, and Orwandil was turned into a second Thor. As Orendel he became a popular German hero—"the oldest of all heroes," the Saga of Trier calls him—wandered throughout the world, and had a series of adventures which bear a striking resemblance to those of Ulysses, so that it is to him probably that Tacitus refers when he says that Ulysses came to Germany, and that there are temples there in his honor. Though perhaps never canonized by the church, he had the reputation of a saint in the middle ages, as many legends and the name "Sant Orendels salle" show.

The god of the thundershower, Orwandil or Horvendill, passed into Denmark, and made himself there a sort of patron and protector of the country. It was but natural to trace the descent of all the Danish kings to him, and through him further back to Thor. We find now told of him nearly the same story told of Thor, which is in the same way a nature-myth, for he goes off on a warlike expedition, and meeting Kallir (the cold), King of Norway, in an island green with the spring, he challenges him to single combat, and, throwing away his shield, wounds him in the foot and slays him. After several such adventures, Orwandil marries the king's daughter, Gêruta (the spear-versed), the Gertrude of Shakespeare, and has a son whom he calls Amleth (old northern Amhlôdhi, one who collects with trouble, the unceasing worker). Dr. Ettmüller would have Amleth represent the grain-ear, but he is only a new expression of the thunderbolt. Feng (the grasper), the brother of Orwandil, envying Orwandil the possession of his wife, kills him and marries her. In other words, the power of cold and darkness, at last, when the year draws to an end, overcomes the life-giving, preserving force, and obtains the mastery of the earth and of its growth. Fortunately, the principle of the good god is still existent in the person of his son, and the contest begins anew.

This time, however, it is not by physical force that the struggle is decided, but by cunning. Hamlet plays the part which we know so well from the familiar tales of Jack the Giant-killer, the Stupid Hans, Aschenputtel, and Tom Thumb, the heroes of which are merely other forms of the same personification, whether we call him Thor or Apollo. The way in which he accomplished his end we all know, but in the legend as given by old Saxo we have no end of sly tricks, such as we find in all the popular tales of similar meaning. The very revenge which Hamlet takes on the courtiers of his uncle by burning them alive points out anew his connection with the thunderbolt. His subsequent career is varied and glorious, but most of the particulars told by the Danish chronicler are parts rather of the heroic legend than of the nature-myth.

Correspondence.

MORE AUTHORS' GRIEVANCES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In one of your recent numbers appeared an "Appeal for American Thought," so clear, so affecting, that I will venture to say not a few of those whose interests it was written to serve rose from the perusal with tears in their eyes. Every word it contained is true. American intellect is languishing at the present time, not merely from the detestable free-trade in ideas against which it has to fight, not merely from Shakespeare with ten centuries at his back, but from the grasping and sordid system of our own publishing-houses, and the bargaining spirit of the age, which cheapens ideas as it might a ribbon, and taxes a sonnet as heavily as a cigar. If your patience and courtesy can spare a corner, I should like to tell my experience. It is by no means remarkable. Many of your readers will recognize it as analogous to their own; and for the rest it is well that the public generally should know more of the sorrows of that inky realm whose products adorn and brighten so many of their homes!

I, then, am an author, possessing what may be styled a "fair to middling" degree of talent, which, from the circumstances of my birthplace, must be distinctively American, and which I constantly burn to commit to paper. Circumstances over which I have no control prevent my being a genius, which fact I lament, but scorn to deny. It is not, therefore, of those who possess this mysterious quality that I venture to write. No eye sees genius when it is a-building, no ear catches the clink of hammers; suddenly and in silence the miracle is wrought, and the astonished world beholds in a tenth edition that being who yesterday was nowhere. But in the case of middle-class talent one recognizes distinct stages of growth. It needs cultivating as much as a peach-tree; there must be approving rustles among the leaves, the sunshine of popular favor resting upon and ripening the blossoms, and liberal nourishment at the root. The first two may be contributed by the public—the last a publisher only can supply. Man shall not live on air alone. It is not enough that "children cry for you." Something more substantial is needed.

Imagine, then, a young and hopeful writer, conscious of something to say and a certain trick or knack at saying it, and starting with these as stock in trade upon the serious business of literature. Every way she—I am a woman—looks the doors seem barred. With fatal facility her MSS., like curses (or chickens, which is it?), find their way home to roost. She tries a lower flight, and at last some "Lines to a Cat" meet the eye of the discriminating editor of the Blanket Sheet, and a neat printed form enclosing $5 is the result. Raptures ensue. But "Lines to a Mouse," which follow, are not equally successful, and the idea of converting all the animals depicted by Goldsmith's "Animated Nature" into stanzas is speedily abandoned. However, the children's column presents itself as a mine to be worked. Her stories take. Delightful oblongs bearing the magic words $10 appear not infrequently. What more could be desired? Alas! When is man—still less woman—satisfied? Success intoxicates. Ambitious visions of the Caribbean Sea, of the Bagpipes, of the pale gray cover of the Zodiac, the pea-green of the Aboriginal, flit before her eyes. What bliss to figure in those inspired pages! So taking breath as for a "header," she makes the plunge, and comes up in the world of grown-up literature, a MS. in her hand.

Ah that MS.! The Caribbean Sea will none of it. Nothing can be more concise or more beautifully printed than the circular by which, after six weeks of alternate hope and despair, this fact is signified. Next the Bagpipes, three-headed like Cerberus, samples the article with three several chews and spues it politely forth, accompanied with a neat, wire-wove sheet upon which in well-couched phrases is set forth its regrets and disclaimers of any but the most strictly private and personal reasons for the refusal. At the bottom a few "hints to contributors" stare her in the face. She reads that the editors of the Bagpipes desire among other things "short and entertaining stories, sketches of character, etc." "Dear me," she gasps, "how strange! This of mine is exactly what they say they want!" Now she tries the Zodiac. Another interval—another circular. Then the editor of the Judicious Mixture has the grief of returning it. His sorrow at the necessity is expressed upon satin paper, with a polished amplitude of apology insensibly distressing to the feelings. But by this time circulars have ceased to charm. Their vagueness, their dreadful politeness, chill her very marrow. It is harrowing to receive again and yet again "John's Boot-jack," in which she has laid herself out to be "light and entertaining," and read each time at the bottom of the accompanying sheet that "light and entertaining stories" are particularly wanted by the Messrs. So-and-so. "How can I improve under this sort of thing?" she asks herself in despair. "If only they would write 'Stupid,' 'Improbable,' 'Deficient in incident,' or 'Not enough conversation,' it would be worth something to me—but now!" At last success crowns her efforts. Either she writes better, or her judges, like him in Scripture, are by her continual importunity wearied into compliance. One fine day a delicate rose-colored envelope gladdens her eyes and reflects itself like a bow of hope on her cheeks. What characters were ever more delectable than that well-known signature which has carried peace and plenty, bread and butter, into so many homes? Later a violet and white enclosure begins delightfully to diversify the mail-bag. Modest industry is typified by the landscape which meanders in pleasing arabesque around the address, and, within, a gorgeous monogram in black and silver, whose component letters might do duty for "Peace, Bliss & Co.," presides above an urbane suggestion that a receipt for the enclosure would be acceptable. Ah! with what swift alacrity is it complied with! Lastly a plain white envelope, its contents written, not printed, informs her that Messrs. Blank accept the verses entitled "The Sigh of the Scrofulous," and hope to find space for it in the course of a few months. Could anything at first sight be more charming, more flattering? But the end is not yet. She has yet to learn what that means; for, adapting Wordsworth,

"Two years she waits in sun and showers," and then the "Sigh" makes its appearance, and contemporaneously a fat package containing two blanks and a bank-note. Blank No. 1 sets forth that the editors of So-and-so have the pleasure of enclosing $3, and request that the "accompanying paper" may be forthwith signed and returned by mail. Said "accompanying paper" is a legal form by which the "Scrofulous Sigh" is bound over for a term of years, like an apprentice, to their sole use and behoof, and is in no wise to be reprinted, either separately or in a collection, without consent formally demanded and given, and affording Messrs. Blank the opportunity of printing said volume, if they should at the time be so inclined. The lips of the author form an inaudible whistle as she peruses this "iron-clad oath." Soon, remembering that "The Sigh" is after all but an example of her "early style," as they say of old masters, and it is by no means likely anybody will ever care to see it again, she rallies, affixes her signature with due solemnity, and despatches the document upon its homeward way. If a similar pledge is exacted from each contributor, and any dependence is to be placed upon the numbered corner (one-billion and-thirty-three, it was) only conceive what stacks and stacks of treasures that editorial sanctum must contain. Let us hope it is fireproof, otherwise a single night's work might scatter these oaths and promises to the wind, and release from imprisonment vast hordes of odes, sonnets, and tales of the affections, to prey afresh upon the community.

By this time "the editor" per se begins to loom upon her imagination as a dire, majestic eidolon, to be revered, propitiated, or abhorred, as the case may be.

"Truest friend or subtlest foe, Best angel or worst devil."

And then perhaps she goes to New York, and, sitting in some quiet corner, sees defile before her in dress-coats and white ties these arbiters of destiny. "What," she cries to herself, "that dapper boy the conductor of the Blank? that the celebrated So-and-so? Are these the bolt-laden Joves I have deprecated? Impossible!" But then she recollects that ignorant Irishmen are entrusted with the duty of carting nitro-glycerine about the country, and she lays her hand on her mouth and is silent.

As time wears on, things grow funnier. She gets inside the veil a little. What she sees makes her laugh. She sees editors attaching a new meaning to the word "acceptance." If a thing may in the course of human possibility be wanted—if only it is too good to fall into the hands of the rival over the way—their remedy is easy, they accept, and lay it aside. Should it not appear before the very close of the Christian era, should it linger, as did a certain legendary tale she wots of entitled "The Fair Firebrand," twelve long years before making its appearance, what course is open to the luckless author but to pocket his $20, and suppress the rising tendency to "calculate" that put out to usury almost anywhere the sum must at the very least have grown by then to thirty-five. She sees the conductor of that enterprising monthly, the Flat, embark for a year's tour in Europe, leaving his organ in the hands of a small boy, who forwards in answer to all applications a printed form stating that during the absence of Mr. G. it is impossible for him to "purchase" any MSS.; but adding in a foot-note, as out of his own head, that, if the article were gratuitous, it is accepted, and will appear immediately! Everywhere she meets the dreadful circular. And what she wishes to ask the editor of the Nation is this:

1st. Can anything be done to promote a general adoption of the system of payment on acceptance? or, failing this,

2d. Can a statute of limitations be established which shall force an editor to print or pay for an accepted article at the end of a given time, say one year, and give the author or his heirs and executors the legal right to sue him if he don't?

3d. Can anything be done about the circulars?

ONE OF THE SUFFERERS.

THE CHINESE AND THE FOREIGN RESIDENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a letter published in the Nation of March 3, Mr. Edward Cunningham criticises certain statements which I have made in regard to the relations which existed between foreigners and natives in China, during and previous to the year 1863. In making these statements, I chose chiefly such occurrences for illustration as came under my own observation, and which were attended by no palliating circumstances, and it so happened that the "main incident" contained in itself abundant material for generalization.

The passengers on the Surprise were there as invited guests of one of the most prominent firms in the East, and as they were, I think, more than one hundred in number and included both English and Americans, it seems safe to say that the foreign residents of that period in China were well represented. The fact, which I emphasize again, that there was no expressed disapproval or remonstrance on the part of the passengers, would seem to justify the inference that little value is placed on the life of Chinamen.

Mr. Cunningham thinks there must have been "some peculiar circumstances of tide," etc., which rendered the accident unavoidable. Even if this had been the case, which I do not admit, there was no possible excuse for the absolute and merciless abandonment of the drowning Chinamen. Mr. Cunningham makes me say that "three lives certainly, and probably four," were destroyed; my words were: "Going to the stern, I could see but one of the four Chinamen, and he was motionless in the water. Among the faces of the foreigners on the crowded decks there were few traces of the feelings which every new-comer must experience after witnessing such a scene." The fact is we immediately steamed away so fast that it was impossible to tell whether any of the four could have been saved or not. The whole affair bears an awful resemblance to the abandonment of the sinking Oneida; the difference being in the fact that, while the latter was a fine vessel filled with Americans who perished in the dark, the other was merely a scow with four despised Chinamen, whom a pleasure party of Europeans could leave to their fate in broad daylight.

Mr. Cunningham remarks that "Mr. George F. Seward was at that time, as now, the American Consul at Shanghae, and he has so resolutely and persistently defended and protected the Chinese in all such [collision] cases, that he has obtained the reputation in China of leaning to the Chinese side—a reputation he lately confirmed by declaring in a decision on a collision case that he would award to the Chinese, even when at fault, if the foreign navigator had unnecessarily passed so near the native craft as to cause the steersman to lose his presence of mind." The position thus taken by a disinterested official after nearly ten years of experience in China should seem of itself sufficient proof of the unnecessary frequence of these occurrences. There is no doubt that the Chinese are often recklessly slow in getting out of the way of foreign vessels, but it is equally certain that many foreign ship-captains are not overscrupulous about taking a terrible retaliation for this tardiness by needlessly sinking junks. I made five journeys in Chinese waters, including this pleasure excursion; on two of these such "collisions" occurred, viz., the one referred to by Mr. Cunningham, and one in which the English mail steamer sank a dilatory boat, containing one man, on the Peiho.

I was also an eye-witness to another occurrence, of which Mr. Cunningham doubts the possibility. In walking through the crowded streets of the Chinese settlement at Shanghae, I observed a large and rather portly man, past the prime of life, who carried a heavy cane, which he moved constantly up and down before him. Those who saw this badge of foreign superiority in time avoided it and made way; those who did not see it felt it. A friend who was with me told me that this was a respectable foreigner, and that this was his habit, a statement which I thought sufficiently corroborated when I saw him again doing the same thing.

If those things have changed for the better since the time of which I wrote, no one can rejoice more than I. But the improvement has been chiefly effected by the very policy which has made Mr. Burlingame and Sir Frederic Bruce exceedingly unpopular among a large part of the foreign mercantile community in China; and, so far as Americans are concerned, it is due largely to the unswerving co-operation of Mr. Seward in this just policy to such an extent that, according to Mr. Cunningham, he has "obtained" and "confirmed" the reputation of leaning to the Chinese side. There was a time, however, when it was very difficult for a Chinaman to obtain justice, for the foreigner is entirely removed by treaty from Chinese jurisdiction. During that time, some nine or ten years ago, an English merchant punished one of his Chinese servants for falling asleep in a hall-chair by throwing him into a cistern of water and keeping him there till he was almost lifeless. A complaint to the British Consul resulted in a farce of a trial and the imposing of a trifling fine of a few dollars. Fortunately, Sir Frederic Bruce, the British Minister, saw the report of the trial, and he found the conduct of the merchant so brutal that he reversed the decision, reprimanded severely the Consul, and inflicted a punishment more in conformity with the character of the offence. This merchant was a Mr. Richardson, who afterward, during a visit to Japan, was killed by the retinue of a Japanese prince, for trying to force his way on horseback through a column of soldiers, instead of leaving the road, as he was motioned to, while the cortége was passing. In retaliation for the killing of this gentleman, the English squadron, with most unwarranted haste, bombarded and burned the large city of Kagosima, destroying thousands of lives. And yet, Mr. Richardson had not the reputation of being brutal, and had he lived he would probably have returned to England, and there been neither better nor worse than his neighbors.

Mr. Cunningham is one of the comparatively few residents of China who have had the strength of character to raise themselves above the prejudice of race, to which most succumb, and he was, and probably still is, one of the warmest advocates of the policy inaugurated by Mr. Burlingame and Sir Frederic Bruce. It is therefore with no little surprise that I find an attack which I might expect from other quarters coming from him. Mr. Cunningham's appeal, in which he asks whether there are any evidences of extreme brutality in the conduct or character of those who return after a residence in China, is one that might equally well have been made in behalf of our former slaveholders, and which in both cases would be answered in the negative.

To carry the parallel still further, I can account for Mr. Cunningham's position in this matter only by comparing him to the many really kind and humane Southerners who could not see the evils around them, because they were blinded by a long residence among them.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

RAPHAEL PUMPELLY.

FITZ JOHN PORTER'S CASE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a constant and a careful reader of the Nation, and I generally like the tone of its discussions. My political conclusions are different, but it is refreshing to read a paper which, while it professes a party bias, yets admits the possibility of an honest conflict of opinion in politics, and is reluctant to stigmatize dissenters as immoral men. Thoughtful, fair, and unprejudiced debate of public questions is not so charmingly prevalent in our newspapers as to have ceased to be a theme for thanksgiving when it occurs. I was therefore a little surprised to read a paper upon Fitz John Porter's case in your number of March 3, which betrayed, I thought, more prejudice than the Nation is used to suffer in its columns. I quote the closing paragraph: "We hope that he will not be reinstated in the army, that his disabilities will not be removed, and that he will not be recognized as a person having any claim whatever to the clemency of the Government." And I gather from the whole article that the writer regards Mr. Porter's appeal as a pleading for a favor rather than for simple justice. Now, if I understand the intent of Mr. Porter's prayer for relief, this article presents it unfairly. The real gist of his appeal is to be reheard, and not primarily to be replaced—for a new trial, and not for pardon or amnesty. Undoubtedly he wishes to be reinstated also, but only as a consequence of the restoration of his fair fame. He complains, and, if I am correctly informed, a very large body of intelligent men incline to agree with him, that he did not, in fact, have a fair trial. He says, further, that, by reason of the heats which then pervaded society, men's minds were so warped from a judicial rectitude that it was not possible to try his case fairly. And he urges yet further the fact that evidence essential to his defence which he now exhibits was then absolutely inaccessible to him; and that from this cause, also, the finding of the court was erroneous. Now, new trials, based upon this same principle, are granted daily in the civil courts. But on the wider principle of the general welfare, is it not worth while to set at rest, if possible, the suspicion which so generally prevails in regard to this particular case, that injustice is maintained here to subserve a merely party purpose or to spare a party pride? Surely we agree that the United States cannot afford to do injustice, and I think we shall not differ in the opinion that our system renders it essential that the justice of the Government shall be made plain and manifest. It is not sufficient to tell me that the relief asked is unusual and inconvenient, for the case was essentially singular. Nor can we quash the whole proceeding by the mere assertion that no possible condemnation will ever satisfy the discontented. I firmly believe that substantially all of us malcontents will rest entirely satisfied if, as Mr. Porter himself suggests, the President, the Secretary of War, and the General of the Army, or, as I venture to suggest, the Generals Sherman, Thomas, and Meade, or others such as they, after a full hearing, concur in a refusal to reverse the judgment of the court. I confess that I give but very little respect to the objection to reopening the ancient strife of parties. I do not see so much of a sweet and lovely communion now between the parties that the prospect of introducing a little more discord need distress any one. And I admit that the precedent may be applied to other cases. If they resemble this case, they are better reopened than kept closed. There is a strong prejudice abroad in favor of fair play, and even the most hardened of us partisans sometimes doubt whether a lie well sworn to is, after all, in the long run, exactly as good as the truth. And pray tell me what the alleged inclination of the court to a death sentence has to do with this present question of a new trial? It is not charged that the court was cruel; it is claimed that it was unjust or mistaken. If it be published now to spread the belief that Mr. Porter had, upon the whole, a lucky escape, I can only admire his moral constitution who believes that Fitz John Porter was guilty and yet conceives that his punishment was mitigated by sparing his life. If he was guilty of the crime for which he was condemned, he should have been shot like a dog. But we have no right to presume that the court paltered with their oaths and were false to their duty in recording a judgment which had been tampered with by the pleasure of the President. And finally permit me, on my side, to make an impertinent suggestion. Is it wise to run the risk of degradation to the morale of the army which would result from the reinstatement of Fitz John Porter as a political and party measure? Yet, if public sentiment is not sooner set at rest, such an event is probable in case the Opposition ever comes to power again. I never saw General Porter, nor ever studied the merits of his case, but, if from any cause there is fair ground for doubt whether the terrible infamy of his sentence was deserved, I think it only common prudence to dissipate the doubt. This is to my apprehension the whole real prayer of the condemned.

Respectfully and truly yours,

J. Q. A.

Quincy, March 8, 1870.

[Courts-martial, especially for the trial of such offences as misbehavior before the enemy, have to be held in time of war, and a time of war is always, or almost always, a time of prejudice and passion. To argue that a tribunal of this kind, therefore, should not sit on charges against a soldier until the public mind has grown calm, is really to argue that he should not be tried till the return of peace. In fact, there is not a single reason given by Mr. Porter for reopening his case now which might not have been urged with equal force against trying it at all in 1862. What would become of discipline, however, if every officer were assured that, no matter what misconduct he might be guilty of in the field, if he were conspicuous enough to rouse popular feeling either for or against him, he could not be called to account till the memory of the affair had grown cold? Of course, any such understanding would have the effect of assurance of impunity. Nobody would obey any orders he did not choose to obey, and would trust to something turning up in the years that would probably elapse before his trial, to justify his refusal. Moreover, if it were well understood that the sentences of courts-martial sitting in time of war were open to review afterwards on this ground, no sentence not touching life would carry any weight. Loss of rank or expulsion from the army, under such sentences, would be little or no punishment, for it would carry with it no stigma, and the culprit would believe, and all his friends would believe, that he would yet have his revenge on the scurvy crew who had convicted him. As regards the fresh evidence said to have been discovered, all we have to say about it, and all we need say, is that, if it throws no fresh light on Mr. Porter's state of mind on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August, 1862, it is entirely irrelevant. Whether there were 100,000 or 1,000 men in his front on the 29th, matters not; the question is, What did he believe, and under what motives was he acting? Suppose any officer were found running away after he had received a positive order to advance, and he were tried and convicted for it, would it be open to him to ask for a new trial, on the ground that an overwhelming force of the enemy, of which he only heard four years later, was on that occasion in hot pursuit of him? Consider what monstrous absurdities this would lead to. We do not understand from Mr. Porter's appeal that he is now in possession of any evidence as to his own state of mind on the 29th which was not or might not have been submitted to the court-martial which tried him. It must be remembered, too, that to reopen his case, is to put the members of that court-martial on their trial. It is to cast on them the imputation of having carelessly, recklessly, and passionately, and by an abuse of judicial procedure, inflicted on a brother officer of high distinction a terrible penalty. This, we hold, is a thing not to be lightly done; not to be done at all except in presence of manifest and overwhelming proof of error, and no such proof, if we know anything of the nature of evidence, has Mr. Porter offered. That his state of mind while under Pope's command was one of gross, outrageous insubordination cannot be denied or explained away; and it does help to supply the needed motive for committing the offences—if he did commit them—for which he was convicted. He tries to excuse his scandalous manner of speaking of his commanding officer, who was, at that moment, charged with the very defence of the capital—and who, whatever his military abilities, was in a position in which a Napoleon would have needed all the support he could get, both in soul and body, from every man in the field—by saying in his "appeal," that "if his despatches manifested distrust of General Pope's ability to conduct the campaign, they but expressed the opinion pervading our Eastern armies." His one and only duty with regard to that "distrust," if it existed, was to try and suppress it. To spread it, by word or deed, was an offence of the rankest kind. Mr. Porter seems to have been under an impression that he was in some way responsible for the conduct of the campaign, just as General McClellan, when he wrote the Harrison's Landing letter, seems to have thought himself responsible for the general policy of the Government. But Mr. Porter ought to have known, and undoubtedly did know, that the choice of the Commander-in-Chief rested with others; that his own business was "to do or die."

The review of which "J. Q. A." complains was written by a military man, very familiar with the whole affair, and the partisan of neither of the principal actors. From his closing judgment we see no reason to retreat. If Mr. Porter is reinstated by a political and party measure, the responsibility must rest with those who bring it about. If the Democrats like to undertake the job, let them. The duty of the present Administration, it seems to us, is none the less clear for the existence of any such probability. If every party would only do its own duty, instead of wabbling about for the purpose of "heading off" the other party, or taking the wind out of their sails, our opinion is the country would be better governed than it is.—Ed. Nation.]

RUSSIA AND THE BALTIC PROVINCES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Excuse me for begging once more the favor of your columns for a few lines called forth by your article on "Modern Russia." If "the spectacles" through which Dr. Eckardt is looking be colored, the spectacles of your critic are certainly not colorless. It cannot be my intention here to comment upon all his remarks; all I can do is to pick out a point or two to prove the justice of my assertion. Your critic intimates the idea that Dr. Eckardt is totally blind as to the "dark shades" of feudalism in the Baltic Provinces, or is even an advocate of them. Any one having the slightest knowledge of Dr. Eckardt's literary career as the editor of the Rigaische Zeitung—not Gazette—will dismiss this indirect charge as absolutely groundless. Really astonishing is the praise bestowed upon Mr. Katkoff for his "sincerity." As great as the talents of this agitator are, as utterly destitute is he of sincerity, if this term include using fair means in a fair contest. His manner of proceeding in the contest with the Rigaische Zeitung, and the fact that he is continually receiving communications from the Russian editors of the Rigski Westnik, sailing under the false flag of sentiments prevailing in the Baltic Provinces, cannot be known to your critic, or he would have judged more by the deeds than by the words. And the claim of Mr. Katkoff to get credit for his moderate views and his dislike to socialistic ideas is not better founded. He, indeed, ridiculed these ideas as "confused nonsense" and "brainless dreams" when Herzen urged them in the Kolokol in 1862. But already in the next year he was converted by the revolution in Poland. As to the peasants not understanding the Church Slavonic, Dr. Eckardt is certainly right, though an intelligent and well-educated foreigner, like your critic, who is perfectly familiar with Russian, may easily learn it, as far as the Liturgy goes. Finally, I beg to state that Dr. Eckardt does not blame the purpose and the end of the reforms of Alexander II., but the means by which the realization of these good purposes is attempted, and he points out the havoc that has been wrought by these reforms. He is aware that it will not do to jump from imminent starvation to a sumptuous feast, for, if it be true of anything, it is true of progress, that in the sweat of the brow we shall earn our daily bread. The Russians think they might acquire by mere legislating in two years what the Western World has acquired by working two thousand years.

Very respectfully yours, DR. H. VON HOLST.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. have in press a work that will be looked for with no little interest: "Correspondence between William Penn and James Logan, Secretary of the Province of Pennsylvania, and others. 1700–1750." The letters thus to be printed are from the original in the possession of the Logan family, with notes by the late Mrs. Deborah Logan; to which others have been added by the editor, Mr. Edward Armstrong, Member of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.——Another book-sale of considerable importance is announced by Leonard & Co., Boston, for April 5 and the three following days. They will furnish catalogues on application, for the sum of one dollar (two, large paper). There are 2,545 lots to be sold, of a "collection of books and manuscripts relating chiefly to the history and literature of North and South America, including the larger portion of the library of the late Henry Stevens, Sr., of Barnet, Vt., founder and first President of the Vermont Historical and Antiquarian Society."——We understand that the proceedings of the London Philological Society will shortly contain a learned paper on Pennsylvania Dutch, contributed by Prof. S. S. Haldeman, who has just been appointed to the chair of Comparative Philology in the University of Pennsylvania.

—In justice to "A Publisher," we must state that he has sent us a rejoinder to our remarks on his communication of last week, but does not, however, press its publication. We omit it because it is necessary to end the controversy somewhere, and because this has now wandered from the question of the Nation's fairness, about which we are greatly concerned, to that of the importers' accuracy, which is of much less concern, though we do not consider it to have been impeached. "A Publisher" convinces us that we were misinformed as to the fortune derived by Mr. Hart from the sale of his stereotype plates, and says the amount realized for the entire "plant" was very far from approaching a million of dollars. The point, however, was of no importance to the argument, so long as the plates were sold at all.

—The design of "Van Nostrand's Eclectic Engineering Magazine" is most excellent. It attempts to record the progress of engineering and allied branches by means of articles selected from the foreign and home periodical technical literature. The number of technical serials issued at the present day is so very large that a judicious and impartial selection of articles becomes a task of considerable difficulty, and requires no small amount of experience and judgment on the part of the editor. We regret that this magazine does not occupy the high position that a journal of its character might attain. There is too little intelligent discrimination used as to what should be inserted and what omitted, and too little industry displayed in giving promptly "the cream" (to use the publisher's words) of the French and German serials. An arrangement of articles according to subjects would contribute much to its usefulness, and might incidentally indicate to the editor omissions that would not be otherwise so apparent. Separate editorial supervision of the different departments would also greatly enhance its value. We are glad to see evidence on the part of the management of a willingness to correct editorial mistakes. The present number for March contains a review of Osborn's "Metallurgy of Iron and Steel," copied from the Nation of December 9 (but without acknowledgment), although the book was, in a previous number (November, 1869), "confidently recommended to our iron-makers, both scientific and practical."

—That wide region which has now ceased to be the West in all but name, and will doubtless not long retain this inappropriate designation, gives frequent evidences of a growth in culture, and the solidifying of society as in the older States of the East. Ohio, in the order of things, leads off, and with no little credit, with an Ohio Valley Historical Society, whose publications are marked by sound judgment, research, and liberality, as we have already had occasion to show our readers. Wisconsin has an Historical Society of twenty years' standing, and which now enjoys the patronage of the State. It has a library of nearly 50,000 volumes and pamphlets, including a collection of 1,545 bound volumes of newspapers, of which 152 belong to the last century—a department in which we should doubt if it were excelled by the largest libraries in the country. It also possesses 1,600 pamphlets and documents relating to the rebellion, the British Patent Office reports, etc., etc. In Illinois we hear of a Will County Historical Society which is taking steps to procure a photograph of every soldier who enlisted from that county, which, we are ashamed to say, we have now first learned the name of and its location on the map.

—A correspondent reminds us that in the Nation of February 24 we said that the answer to the question, why "the foremost man of all the world" got from Shakespeare so inadequate treatment in the play of "Julius Cæsar," does not seem far to seek, and wishes us to give the answer. In compliance with his desire we will endeavor to set down what we had in mind when we made the remark cited. That Cæsar is not adequately treated by the poet is, we suppose, not disputed by any reader of the tragedy. He is, perhaps, not made exactly after the pattern of a "tyrant in a tapestry," but certainly, what with his huffing arrogance, his "Danger afraid of Cæsar," and the rest of it, he is a personage rather more like that figure than like the accomplished politician, the wonderful soldier and administrator, the admirable writer and orator, the man of the world as well as the "foremost man of all this world," the warrior and statesman who perpetually commanded success, and is still of all soldiers and writers the most famous. Emerson, in one of his quatrains, seeking to hit upon the essential points of three or four of the most universally known and admired personalities of which history has record, says "Cæsar's hand, and Shakespeare's brain;" and, indeed, Cæsar comes down to us as the name which stands for executive ability—intellectual ability of the kind opposite to that of which Shakespeare, as the seer and expresser, is the pre-eminent exemplification. Now, to the man who lives the life of intellectual contemplation, who habitually Platonizes, whose writing, described generally, is the making out of all the movements of the human mind, the passions of the human heart, the calamities of human fortune—the making of plays out of all these deepest concerns of man—to such a mind, which thinks nothing great or small but by comparison; which can discourse of Queen Mab's team of atomies, as well as of the icy current and compulsive force of the Pontic sea-stream; which is able in the clay in the chinks of the wall to see the dust of imperious Cæsar, and, doubtless, in some moods to think the one as important as the other—to such a mind the greatest career of merely material successes, the career which is, after all, only the excellent adaptation of means to ends, the executive career carried on, as it happened in Cæsar's case, upon a great stage, but not intrinsically different in its spiritual import from what it would have been had Cæsar been in fact but the foremost man in that barbarian village of which he once spoke—such a career, to such a mind as Shakespeare's, we may suppose to have been not very interesting. So in the drama, to which the poet gives the soldier's name, the interest mainly centres in the conspirators and their passions and acts, and not in the dictator himself. It is Brutus, Cassius, and Antony, their characters and their actions, which get the poet's attention, and upon which he expends his force. To Antony he afterwards returns in the "Antony and Cleopatra;" the triumvir's chaotic nature seemingly possessing, as some of the critics have pointed out—De Quincey, we think—a very great attraction for the poet, who so loved to look in upon the workings of human nature. Of course, too, in his capacity of playwright as well as poet, Shakespeare must have found Antony a good subject. That Shakespeare follows Plutarch so closely in his story of Cæsar's death—which fact, also, has not escaped the commentators—would seem to show how little he himself cared to study Cæsar. Of course the necessities of the dramatic art render impossible the adequate presentation in a play of the sort of greatness which Cæsar possessed, and possessed in so eminent a degree that he is, perhaps, the most celebrated of mankind, although his contribution to the world of thought is nothing—nothing, that is to say, but the idea of himself. In brief, to the deep thinker, the doer, though the very incarnation of doing, was not of great interest. Still less could he be of use to the play-writer, who must have primarily and essentially passions, and requires actions only as these produce passions.

—The following extract may serve as a contribution to the recent discussion in England on the ethics of hunting. It is from the memoir of Thomas Bewick, not less than Cowper the pitying friend of the hare:

"At holiday times, and at other times when prevented by the floods of the Tyne from getting across to school, I was sure, with the most ardent glee, to make one of the number in the hunting-parties which frequently took place at that time [176–]; whether it might be in the chase of the fox or the hare, or in tracing the foumart in the snow, or hunting the badger at midnight. The pursuing, bating, or killing these animals never, at that time, struck me as being cruel. The mind had not, as yet, been impressed with the feelings of humanity. This, however, came upon me at last; and the first time I felt the change happened by my having (in hunting) caught the hare in my arms, while surrounded by the dogs and the hunters, when the poor terrified creature screamed out so piteously, like a child, that I would have given anything to have saved its life. In this, however, I was prevented; for a farmer well known to me, who stood close by, pressed upon me, and desired I would 'give her to him;' and, from his being better able (as I thought) to save its life, I complied with his wish. This was no sooner done than he proposed to those about him 'to have a bit more sport with her,' and this was to be done by first breaking one of its legs, and then again setting the poor animal off a little before the dogs. I wandered away to a little distance, oppressed by my own feelings, and could not join the crew again, but learned with pleasure that their intended victim had made its escape."

The worrying of the other animals mentioned, he says, did not awaken similar feelings in him; not, as has lately been urged, because they have got used to it and rather enjoy it, but because "in the fierce conflicts between them and the dogs, there was something like an exchange of retaliation, and not unfrequently the aggressors were beaten."

—The Rev. George Gilfillan, like several other recent Scotchmen, although he is now of no consideration, once enjoyed a good deal of celebrity in his own country and this, and probably many of our readers may remember having gone through more than one volume of his essays. They may be taken as good specimens of the poorer sort of contributions to English prose literature made by the Scotch of our time. Great heat, little discernment, and conceited narrowness of mind may be said to be the inner characteristics of this class of writings, while its most noticeable outer characteristics are, if we may so speak, noisiness and floridness of style—a style often forcible, but almost always unregulated, inaccurate, and provincial in point of diction, and otherwise "cheap." Professor Wilson and Carlyle may be set down as the giants of the school—though of these, to be sure, each is big enough to contain more than belongs to the school proper—and Mr. Gilfillan may be set down as the dwarf—small, but, like all literary dwarfs, big enough to represent in exaggeration the deformities proper to his masters. He had been as good as forgotten for some fifteen or twenty years, but recently he comes to the surface again, and this time not as a literary character but as a martyr for the sake of theological opinion. Precisely what it is that has brought on him the displeasure of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, of which he is a minister, is not to be made out from the accounts that have reached us; nor is it necessary to care much for this. It is, however, interesting to learn, as we do, that neither his own church nor either of the other two branches of the Presbyterian body in Scotland would be at all disposed to make him trouble because of his round assertion that he disbelieves entirely in the dogma that the world was made in six literal days, and also in the dogma of eternal damnation for "non-elect infants"—a class of children, by the way, not born now outside of North Britain. The United Presbyterians and the "union men" of the other two churches are understood to be willing to admit that, as regards the dogmas mentioned, the Westminster formularies need revision and important alteration. Mr. Gilfillan's action in attacking "the standards" in general is perhaps more important because it will strengthen the hands of the "anti-unionists," who think the United Presbyterians too liberal in doctrine, than in any other aspect of it. Or perhaps its chief importance is that it will lead to a good deal of discussion and will help to strengthen the hands of those Scotchmen who think that the Scotch church is grievously injured by the national vice of dogmatism—the vice whose root is the root of so much of Scotch strength and Scotch weakness. "Modern Christian Heroes" is the title of the book containing the utterances on which is based the charge of heresy.

—There are signs that "the interviewer" is to infest England also; though as yet we do not see that he himself has arrived. He himself condescends to his man; he does not at all conceal the pencil and notebook, but summons you to his presence and puts you to your purgation as one having authority. With the forerunners and heralds of the interviewer himself it is not so, for while he levies his contributions boldly, they are rather of the class of sneak-thieves. One of them is the gentleman who watches you while you are listening in your pew in church, or sitting in the theatre, or dining at the club, or walking in the street, and then records his observations in a brief paragraph under the head of "Personals" in some of the lesser newspapers. Another is the gentleman who makes you a visit, occupies an hour or so of your time, and then, taking himself off when he thinks he has got "points" enough, writes one chapter more of his sprightly correspondence with a country journal, and tells of the looks of your house and garden, of your jaundice, of your tone and manner in speaking to Mrs. Smith, of that lady's somewhat slender claims to personal charms, of your apparent height and probable weight, of your early baldness, of your forcible, not to say profane, expression of your well-known views in regard to the Trinity, of your opinion of Jones's course, of your characteristic liking for old flannel slippers, and of various other matters. This latter forerunner of the full-blown interviewer has recently made his appearance in England, and his advent excites some anxiety. He is probably a Yankee, the London Publishers' Circular suggests—this particular individual who has been doing in the most approved manner a newspaper call on a certain famous author. But this, we fear, is a hope on which it will be well if our contemporary does not lean too hard. Great Britain is becoming Little America in bad things as well as good. Just as Britannia adopts our reforms in law and legislation, and steadily goes on conforming her political and social institutions to ours, so, too, she becomes infected with many of our vices, and the "correspondent of a Scottish journal" who has caused the Circular so much alarm is in all probability no American sovereign, but a subject of Her Majesty. Considering his nativity, he has done well, and need not turn his back on any one of the American travellers who thirty or forty years ago used to call out the wrath of the British reviewer by their descriptions of what and whom they had seen in the British social circles. He is "sorry to inform" the readers of the journal for which he writes his letters "that the condition of Mr. So-and-so is giving a great deal of uneasiness to his friends." Not that the gentleman referred to is in ill health: it is his moral condition that seems to his friends and our correspondent so bad as to justify anxiety and publication. So-and-so "has very long been known to be an unhappy man;" when in the mood he is delightful company, the most delightful imaginable; but then "it is not often that he is in the mood," and in general his irritability "makes it bad times for those who are beside him." Friend after friend has been alienated from "the grand old man," and now he has left with him to cheer him only "a faithful old Scotch domestic." As for secretaries and amanuenses, none of them has long been able to endure the old gentleman's temper, and after a brief period of service each follows the alienated friends. There is more of it, all similar and all richly suggestive of the nature and character of the average Anglo-Saxon editor—who, whether he plies his vocation in Britain or in Park Row and Printing-House Square, evidently believes that newspapers, like Peter Pindar's razors, are "made to sell," and that he has a sufficient justification for being an impudent rascal in the fact that in the morning a certain number of persons will give him pennies for the impudent rascality which he has printed over-night. We trust that, when the interviewer himself is discovered in England, our brethren may begin with him as we over here seem disposed to end with him. We read that "in Cincinnati, last week, a reporter waked up a bridegroom in the middle of the night with the intention of getting from him some facts in regard to his rather peculiar marriage; he is now in debt fifty cents, for court-plaster, to the apothecary in the vicinity of the hotel." We have our escapades in this country, and we are very good-natured; but we may be trusted to come right at last.

—About the year 1800, Joseph Haydn, on his return from England, stopped for some time at the Monastery of the Premonstratensians, in Ochsenhausen, near Biberach, in Würtemberg. The monks residing there were of a highly musical turn, and the good understanding between them and their guest resulted in a request, at his departure, that he would leave them some original composition as a souvenir. In complying, he chose six proverbs as so many themes, viz.: "It is the first step that costs;" "Look before you leap;" "Birds of a feather flock together;" "Suum cuique;" "Too much of a good thing is good for nothing;" "All's well that ends well;" and set them to music for four voices. These compositions are said to bear the stamp of the master, and to be infused with the happiest humor. In "Suum cuique," each of the four voices sings in a different time, as is most appropriate. On the breaking up of the convent Haydn's pieces passed into the hands of one of the fathers, and finally came to be the property of precentor Kaim, of Biberach, who has just had them engraved and published at Munich.

— Of Quérard's "France littéraire" and the work on pseudonyms that grew out of it, we spoke in No. 232 of the Nation. The former gives a list of all French works from 1700 to 1842; or, including the two supplementary volumes, 1851. The same author's "Littérature française contemporaine" was begun in 1840, but carried by him no further than page 289 of Vol. II., and was finished in a very unsatisfactory manner by MM. Louandre and Bourquelot, in 1857, in six volumes. M. Gustave Brunet, who is editing the second edition of Quérard's "Supercheries littéraires dévoilées," speaks on the whole very favorably, in the last number of the Revue Bibliographique Universelle, of M. Otto Lorenz's "Catalogue général de la librairie française pendant vingt-cinq ans (1840–1865)," of which three volumes (AA–OZ) have appeared. M. Lorenz, unlike Quérard, dispenses almost wholly with biographical details, and makes no attempt to weigh the merits of the works which he registers; it is only in the case of anonymous works that he selects those which seem to be worth recording. Spite of errors which the reader must always be on his guard against in works of this character, the "Catalogue général" will be found invaluable for reference for the period which it covers. Besides all works published in France from 1840 to 1865, it names also those which have been anywhere published in the French language.

—Count Montalembert had, when he died at the close of last week, just completed his sixtieth year. The most amiable and tolerant of Catholics, he ended a long life spent in attempting to hold on to Catholicism without giving up modern civilization, with a protest against the probable assumptions of the Œcumenical Council; while in politics his last significant utterance was that in which he predicted a violent end to the present régime, compared with which, he said, the crises of 1830 and 1848 would appear but child's play. This was nearly two years ago, however, and he survived a revolution as real as that which he anticipated, but happily without ruin either to church or state and with almost no bloodshed. During our war he was a prominent advocate of the Northern side, and recovered among us something of the conspicuousness which he had thirty years previously, as the associate of Lamennais. In him the Academy loses a member whom it will be hard to replace, and the world of letters an author of no mean acquirements and of fine benignity. The approach of death from a lingering disease was long foreseen, and it hastened the publication of the third volume of his work—"Les Moines d'Occident depuis Saint Benoît jusqu'à Saint Bernard"—in 1866. As a religious historian, he will be read less for his facts than for the spirit by which he was always inspired, and which blended faith in the Church with attachment to liberty in a manner which disarmed criticism and extorted sympathy. For a fuller appreciation of his peculiar and twofold character, we may refer our readers to an article in No. 6, Vol. I., of the Nation, p. 184.

—The reason why we should submit to the decrees of a General Council is this, as Roman Catholics hold—that when the Council speaks we hear the voice of the Holy Ghost. What a Council says is worthy of attention and of obedience because the Council is the mouthpiece of that Comforter who, it was promised, should be left with us. It is interesting, then, to examine the composition of the Vatican Council now sitting. The Papal States have a Roman Catholic population of less than a million—about seven hundred thousand souls; of prelates resident in the Papal States, who have a vote in the Council, there are exactly 143. This gives about one vote in the Council to every 5,000 Catholics in the Papal States—or would give, if many of the bishops resident in Rome were not bishops in partibus infidelium. Still, as the bishoprics in partibus are sheepfolds without any sheep, and as the shepherds are appointed by the Pope, we may rightly credit the population of the Papal States with all the 143 votes which will be cast by the bishops who reside in the vicinity of Rome and in the city itself. Austria has a Roman Catholic population of about 22,000,000. France has a Roman Catholic population of 38,000,000. In the Council, however, France is represented not by the 7,600 votes which would be hers if she had as many proportionally as the Papal States have cast, but by 84 votes. Nor has Austria 4,400 votes; 48 is her number. American Catholics are on the whole "Ultramontane," and for this or some other reason the 8,000,000 Catholics on this side of the water count for precisely as much in the matter of expressing God's will in regard to the government of man as the Austrian 22,000,000. In Great Britain and Ireland, also, the Church is Ultramontane; so the 6,500,000 British Romanists have 35 votes in the Council, or nearly twice as many as the 12,000,000 Catholics of North Germany and South Germany united. Whatever may be the upshot of the Council, it would seem as if the 40,000,000 Romanists of America, Britain, and Italy, with their 340 ballots, will have work before them to escape the dangers of spiritual pride, when they think how much they have been preferred as organs for the utterance of eternal decrees to their 70,000,000 French and German brethren.

ART.

Count Bermudez de Castro has been permitted by the administration of the Louvre to exhibit his well-known and exquisite picture by Raphael, in the hall called "des Batailles de Lebrun," preparatory to its sale. The Count, who asks a million francs (about $200,000) for this treasure, became its possessor by gift from Francis, ex-King of Naples. Painted by Raphael about 1504–1505, when he was twenty-one years old, for the high altar of the monastery of St. Anthony of Padua at Perugia, it was sold by the nuns in 1678 to Count Giovanni Antonio Bogazzini, of Rome, for the miserable sum of 2,000 scudi. It then passed to the Colonna gallery, and subsequently, about 1802, became the property of King Ferdinand IV. of Naples. The fine paintings upon the "gradino" were sold by the nuns to Queen Christian of Sweden; and after passing through the hands of the Duke of Bracciano to the Orleans gallery, were sold at London, in 1798, to English amateurs. One of them, "Christ on the Mount of Olives," sold in Edinburgh in 1800 for £42 sterling to the poet Rogers, was purchased at the sale of his pictures by Miss Burdett Coutts, in whose possession it now is. The principal picture, now offered for sale by the Count de Castro, represents the Madonna seated upon a richly adorned throne, holding the infant Jesus upon her right knee, who with his right hand blesses the little St. John, approaching to adore him. Near the throne, to the right, are Saints Paul and Dorothea, and to the left Saints Peter and Catharine. A landscape background is seen on each side of the throne. The style is transitional. The richly bordered vestments picked out with gold, and the lovely heads of the Virgin and Child, belong to Raphael's first, Peruginesque manner; while the saints, and the rich, deep tone of color of the picture generally, betray the influence of the Florentine school under which he formed his second manner. Again, the God the Father, with angels and cherubim, painted in the "tympanum," is, says Passavant, quite in the style of Perugino. The great question now is, Shall France or England possess this treasure? Probably the National Gallery will bear off the prize; for the Louvre (unless the Legislative Chamber vote an exceptional supply of funds) is in no condition to avail itself of so tempting a possibility, as its annual budget amounts only to 120,000 francs, very little more than that of the Museum of Cologne, which for 1870 is 112,500 francs. In England, £53,095 was spent by the South Kensington Museum during the past year, and £15,978 by the National Gallery. To spend such sums as these upon works of art and art institutions will appear to most Americans, who have as yet no conception of the great and legitimate part which art should play in national education, very like madness. Let us hope that we, too, may in time become capable of so sublime a folly.

—The sale of the San Donato gallery was to begin in Paris on the 21st of February and last until the 10th of March. The Paris Journal, quoted by the Chronique, contradicts the report that the Baron de Seillière had purchased it en bloc from Prince Demidoff.

—We notice that "an elaborate and learned Catalogue of Musical Instruments in the South Kensington Museum, compiled by Herr Carl Engel for the Art Department," will shortly be published.

—Mr. Ruskin's inaugural lecture as Slade Professor of Art at Oxford, on "English Art," was to be followed on the 15th of February by a lecture on the "Relation of Art to Religion."

—M. Gallait, the well-known Belgian historical painter, has been elected foreign associate of the French Academy, as successor to Overbeck.

THE INDUSTRIAL FUTURE OF MASSACHUSETTS.*

The first annual report of the Board of Railroad Commissioners of Massachusetts is an able document lately submitted to the Legislature of that State by Mr. Charles F. Adams, Jr., and two other gentlemen, appointed to their offices a year ago. Mr. Adams is the junior member of the Board, and his term, unless he is reappointed, will only be for one year; but, unless we are much mistaken, the main portion of the report is written by him. It certainly bears strong internal evidence of having been moulded, if not composed, by the author of certain railroad articles published at various times in the North American Review. We mention this fact, or rather this inference, because, as Mr. Adams's term expires in a year, it will become necessary before long to appoint a successor; and, judging from this report, we should say that a reappointment was the only possible solution of the question. The railroad problems of the next thirty years are likely to be as important as any that have ever engaged the attention of a civilized people; and it is of the last consequence that the country should have in positions of trust and confidence men who have made a special study of the subject. This Mr. Adams has, as all the world knows, done; and he is probably better qualified than any public man in Massachusetts to give good advice to the Commonwealth of which he is a citizen. How sadly she needs it, we have often explained in these columns.

* "First Annual Report of the Board of Railroad Commissioners, January, 1870." Boston: Wright & Potter, State Printers.

The most interesting portion of the present report to the general public is undoubtedly that in which the Commissioners discuss and formally condemn the traditional railroad policy of Massachusetts. What that policy has been, we cannot describe better than in the words of the Commissioners:

"The traditional policy of the Commonwealth in regard to the development of the railroad system, so far as it has interfered at all with a natural growth through private enterprise, has been simple and based on obvious principles. It took its rise in the condition of affairs which existed in Massachusetts at the time when steam locomotion was first introduced, and has been continued, without much regard to alteration in circumstances, to the present day. The key to that policy has ever been found in a ruling desire to open new and broader channels of commerce with the West. Before the possibility of crossing the Berkshire hills by steam was imagined, a canal had already been projected and surveyed, which was to pierce the mountains by a tunnel, not far from where the work is now going on in the Hoosac range, and was to connect Boston, by water, with Albany and the Erie Canal. This project was conceived by Colonel Loami Baldwin; and the surveys and estimates are still to be found among the archives in the State House. The invention of the railway and steam locomotive superseded this plan, and the attention of the community was immediately directed towards attaining the same end by the newly discovered means. The Western Railroad was projected and chartered in 1833, and the Commonwealth first identified itself with the system of railroad development in 1836 by subscribing to ten thousand shares of the capital stock of the enterprise. The precedent then established has since been followed in repeated instances. State aid, as the loan of the credit of the State to private corporations has been called, has been granted to many railroads, but almost invariably to corporations formed with a view to what is called 'through business;' and, in the great majority of cases, to through business with the West. As a result of this liberal system, without considering the Northern lines, connecting directly with the West via Ogdensburg, or the Old Colony and Newport, and Boston and Providence, connecting with the same region via Long Island Sound and New York City, none of which lines have ever been subsidized by the State, Massachusetts and its railroad centre, the city of Boston, now have completed, or in rapid process of completion, three distinct through lines connecting with the interior of the continent. To these three lines —the Boston and Albany, the Boston, Hartford and Erie, and the Troy and Greenfield—the State has already involved itself to the extent of $15,000,000. All these lines, be it remembered, have been thus subsidized simply to render Massachusetts and Boston as accessible to the West as the other seaboard States and commercial centres. The whole railroad policy and nearly the whole of the railroad agitation and discussion for thirty years have been directed to this end. Other interests have been ignored or considered only incidentally; but those who have come to the State House with any project of development or reform, whether asking for money, or for special legislation, or for power to take property, or for acts of consolidation, have ever been attentively and favorably listened to, provided only they professed to have this end in view. It will not be denied that an absorbing desire to successfully compete in the field of Western export and import trade has, from the outset, been the leading feature of the public railroad policy of Massachusetts."

This policy has not resulted, the report continues, in any marked success. "Whatever the cause may be, it is matter of record that there are several great trunk lines running to other seaboard cities, any one of which yearly transports to and from those cities and the West much more than all the lines running from Boston to the West now do." Not only so, but the foreign commerce of Boston is at a standstill; Western produce, instead of leaving Massachusetts ports for foreign consumption, is "annually landed at them in great quantities from other cities, to supply the domestic consumption;" and, finally, foreign steamers have been withdrawn from Massachusetts waters for lack of freights.

The conclusion which would naturally be drawn from these facts is that Massachusetts and Boston are, in a material point of view, declining in importance. But this conclusion is contradicted by the most unimpeachable statistics. Although the value of articles exported from Massachusetts in 1855 was twenty-eight millions, and in 1869 this had decreased to thirteen millions; although the imports in 1855 were forty-five millions, and in 1869 still forty-five millions; although the population of the State is to-day not greatly larger than it was in 1855; yet, between the years 1855 and 1865, the value of articles produced had increased from two hundred and ninety-five to five hundred and seventeen millions, and between 1850 and 1865 the valuation of all property had risen from six hundred to a thousand millions. That this increase has continued since the year 1865 no one doubts who has any familiarity with the condition of the State. The evidence on this point, however, is not confined either to State returns or to vague conjecture:

"The returns of sales to the internal revenue officials furnish the most reliable basis of comparison, as representing most nearly the volume of the business transactions of the several parts of the country. In these returns, Massachusetts stands, among the States of the Union, second only to New York, returning ten per cent. of the whole amount returned—sixty-six per cent. more than Pennsylvania, seventy-seven per cent. more than Illinois, and more than three times those of any other State. When it is remembered that these comparative results represent a State which contains about three per cent. of the population, and a quarter of one per cent. of the territory, of the United States, it is wholly superfluous to add any further evidence of the extreme improbability of any present or immediate material decadence."

And now, what is the reason of this strange state of affairs? Why is it that Massachusetts grows rich, while her commerce year by year declines, and her traffic with the West has come to an end? The explanation is a simple one: that she has become a manufacturing community. Passing through three distinct stages of growth, her wealth at first lay in her fisheries, then in her commerce, and now in her manufactures. There was a time when the fishermen of New Bedford, Newburyport, and Nantucket heaped up treasures that vied with those of the "River Gods" of the Connecticut and the baronial lords of the Hudson. There was a time when the sleepy wharves of Salem and Boston were alive with the commerce of the world; but men live in the days of the trip-hammer and the loom; they acquire wealth and renown by industries of which their fathers knew not even the names; their villages have grown to cities, and their cities have become villages; everything is changed.

Massachusetts has been blindly pursuing a policy inherited from the past, unheeding the alteration which time has worked in her condition. "Bring the products of the West to tide-water, and we shall be prosperous," has been the cry raised by every public man in Massachusetts for the last thirty years. It has never seemed to occur to any one that, if there was such a pressure of products from the West as was on every side asserted, they would undoubtedly find their way to tide-water. There was nothing to prevent the railroads already in existence from applying for leave to build to tide-water, if their freights seeking export were really so enormous. But the railroads did not feel any such pressure. A curious story, illustrating the peculiar mode of reasoning employed by active agitators on this subject, is worth repeating. A gentleman owning a wharf in Boston was visited by another gentleman, who informed him of a law recently passed or introduced requiring owners of wharves to build out to a new line, thus extending their frontage and altering the line of the harbor in accordance with a general plan adopted by the authorities. The visitor described in glowing terms the benefits which would flow from these changes, the number of ships which could thenceforth lie at these wharves, and the great increase of rental they would yield. The wharf-owner listened in silence to the eloquent periods of his friend, and then said quietly, "But, my dear sir, as I can only now, by the greatest exertions, get a single steamer to come to my wharf, how shall I benefit myself by building a larger?" But his argument had no effect; what were arguments to Bostonians who > "Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails, > Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;"

and saw in these argosies the means of exporting the products of the West? Such happy enthusiasts we cannot hope to influence, but those with whom cold-blooded arguments weigh for something will be interested in knowing that the Commissioners report that "it does not admit of doubt that, if any one of the lines connecting Boston with the Hudson is ever developed to its full transporting capacity, it alone will suffice for the probable future wants of the people of Massachusetts; should the four lines between the same point and the Hudson or the lakes ever be developed even to the present incomplete degree of the Pennsylvania Central, a population and foreign commerce could be sustained in Massachusetts and Boston more dense and larger than that of Liverpool and Belgium combined."

The conclusion to which these facts all point is, that in attempting to build a vast number of through-lines for a traffic which does not exist, in excavating and perfecting a harbor which no ships seek, in building railroad termini to ship the products of the West at tide-water, when the products of the West no longer come to Massachusetts at all for export, the State has been pursuing a mistaken policy. Her true policy, the Commissioners suggest, is to develop her internal traffic, to make her railroads the highways for her factories, to build domestic lines in every direction, to support and be supported by the zeal and industry of the Commonwealth—her manufactures. This may seem to many persons too obvious for further comment, but it is not so to the Massachusetts public. That public is still persuaded that a commerce can be built up out of nothing, and the greatest Bostonian patriotism of the present day is held to be the building of ships which find no freight to carry, and which six months after their completion must be sold under the hammer lest they rot at their wharves. At any rate, the question will soon be decided for ever; all the through-lines will in a few months have termini at deep water, and after that, if the products of the West do not come, it is clearly nature, not Boston, that is in fault.

And now, some one will say, Why should you put so much faith in the conclusions of these Commissioners? Why may it not be that there is quite as much to be said on the other side? These Commissioners are human, and the presumption is against them in their innovating suggestions. We reply, that the creation of this Commission is the first rational attempt, in our generation, on the part of the authorities in Massachusetts to obtain anything like a fair report upon the railroad system of the State. Since the building of the Western Railroad, in 1833, there has been nobody in the State, clothed at once with authority, intelligence, and honesty, to direct or even suggest a policy. The result has been that designing men, cleverly turning to account the traditions of the State, and flattering her with false hopes, have wasted her energies in impossible undertakings, to their own gain and her great detriment. The very character of such enterprises as the Hoosac Tunnel and the Boston, Hartford, and Erie would long ago have been exposed if there had been a board of efficient railroad commissioners at the head of affairs.

RECENT REPUBLICATIONS.

Among the books destined to popularize the results of Egyptological research, few, if any, will be found so pleasantly instructive as M. de Lanoye's "Rameses the Great; or, Egypt 3,300 Years Ago," which is one of the "Wonder Series" republished here from the French by Messrs. Scribner & Co. It attempts to reconstruct, from the materials already accumulated by that young science, the most brilliant period of the history of the Pharaohs, the period of Rameses II., the Sesostris of the classical writers. And such is the abundance of the materials made available by the skill of investigators and decipherers, that even men of M. de Lanoye's caution in criticism believe that "we have it in our power" to carry such a process of reconstruction "almost to perfection." He bases his attempt, however, on the investigations of others and not on his own, though, in judging the authenticity of records and traditions and in selecting critical explanations, he proceeds with the assurance of a specialist who has fully matured his convictions and has no hesitation in maintaining them, if need be, against the highest authorities. Thus, concerning the more remote periods of Egyptian history he evinces a scepticism almost derisive of the beliefs and labors of the most distinguished Egyptologists of our age, and his view of the origin of the Hyksos, conflicting as it does with the prevalent opinions, is expressed with a positiveness which requires to be supported by a greater display of scholarship than is compatible with the narrow scope of a popular treatise. As such, however, the book is full of information, presented in plain but graphic descriptions, and made more easily intelligible by well-executed illustrations. The translator, we are sorry to add, has done his best to disfigure it by carelessness of execution and revision—the fruit, in part, of ignorance. Forgetting that he writes in English and not in French, he not only uses throughout the author's French orthography in unfamiliar Egyptian and non-Egyptian words, but also gives us *Kou*sh for Cush, Libanus for Lebanon, As*sour* for Asshur, Heber for Eber, Ge*ss*en for Goshen (p. 179), *Cou*dra (sic) for Sudra (p. 89), *Indou*kosch for Hindookoosh (p. 118), and so on. Among the misprints, which are numberless, we find such as "two leagues from Thebes" for six hundred leagues from Thebes (p. 104); "a wall of one hundred thousand stadii" for a wall of one thousand five hundred stadii (p. 163); and "in latitude 52°" for in latitude 25° (p. 168); not to mention literal errors. The style of the translation is, however, generally much better than might be presumed from the following specimen (p. 128), which we quote without an alteration:

"Nevertheless, it has been repeatedly affirmed by Champollion, who, in the inscriptions at Karnak and in the Rameseum existing side by side, with the names of barbarous nations, in northern costumes, with shaven heads or their hair raised in a single lock or wisp like that of the 'Redskins' of America or the Mongols of Asia, declares that he read the title of these Iouni whose blue eyes and golden hair Homer was to celebrate some ages later."

In a plump octavo, of 650 pages, entitled "Bible Animals" (New York: Chas. Scribner & Co.), a well-known author of popular works on Natural History, Rev. J. G. Wood, has condensed a large amount of information concerning every living creature mentioned in the Bible. His object has been not simply to do this in an interesting manner, but to assist in the interpretation of the Scriptures: so that, in addition to his numerous citations from the writings of travellers and naturalists, Mr. Wood treats his readers on occasion to discussions as to the mode in which Samson caught and used his incendiary foxes; what sort of "needles' eyes" camels do actually stoop to pass through in Oriental cities; whether the bittern or the hedgehog is the "Kippôd" of Isaiah xiv. 23 and Zephaniah ii. 13, etc., etc. This sort of exegesis has a recognized value, and has been not a little resorted to by tourists in the East. Mr. Wood has collected his material with a great deal of industry and discrimination. The pictures, large and small, which accompany the text are unusually spirited and truthful; such as, a few years ago, would have been sought for in vain in works of this character. Meantime, the opportunities of drawing from the life have kept pace with the growth of skilful designers and of pictorial embellishment in popular literature; though it should be remembered that Bewick's vignettes on wood, depicting animals, are as yet unrivalled, and are more than half a century old.

The same house have published Volumes I.–VI., of a series of twelve, of Froude's "History of England," which make a good appearance on the shelf, and are as well printed as need be for those who wish to own the work for its contents and to study it, and can only purchase a cheap edition. All the attention which can be given to the wants of this large class of readers is worthily bestowed, and, what is more, cannot fail to be remunerative. Their library edition of Froude is now completed by the issue of Volumes XI. and XII.—the same whose treatment in the Saturday Review has so disturbed the author's equanimity. Of Messrs. Scribner & Co.'s "History of Rome," by Mommsen, two volumes out of four have appeared, and may be reserved for further notice. The price in this case would seem to have warranted somewhat better presswork and paper than the buyer will get, as, though a rather more pretentious book than the Froude, it cannot be read with the same ease by any given pair of eyes. The "Ante-Nicene Christian Library," published here through Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co., is continued in two handsome volumes (XIII., XIV.), of which one can only speak in praise. The Fathers whose works are here translated are, Cyprian; Novatian; Minucius Felix; Methodius; Alexander (Bishop of Lycopolis); Peter (of Alexandria); Alexander (of Alexandria); Clement (of Rome), etc., besides numerous fragments variously ascribed.

Very pretty, indeed, is Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co.'s edition of "Christabel, and the Lyrical and Imaginative Essays of Coleridge;" and the essay by Mr. Swinburne is the most satisfactory piece of work from the hand of that gentleman that we have yet seen. In one place he says: "With all fit admiration and gratitude for the splendid fragments so bequeathed of a critical and philosophic sort, I doubt his being remembered, except by a small body of the elect, as other than a poet. His genius was so great, and in its greatness so many-sided, that for some studious disciples of the rarer kind he will doubtless, seen from any point of view, have always something about him of the old magnetism and magic. The ardor, delicacy, energy of his intellect, his resolute desire to get at the roots of things, and deeper yet if deeper might be, will always enchant and attract all spirits of like mould and temper. But as a poet his place is indisputable. It is high among the highest of all time. An age that should forget or neglect him might neglect or forget any poet that ever lived." Barring some of the natural exaggeration of a lyric poet writing about another lyrist, and some of the exaggeration natural to Mr. Swinburne as a man, this seems true enough and well said. But "Poor Lamb" alone would give Coleridge a long lease of men's memories apart from his poems or philosophy.

Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. are publishing, in connection with Mr. John Murray, a new edition of Grote's "History of Greece," in twelve volumes duodecimo, two being issued at a time, and the work having advanced to Vol. IV. Of the history itself it is, of course, superfluous to speak. It is now offered in a convenient form, at the low price of two dollars per volume. The text is condensed, but clear, and the foot-notes also very legibly printed. A more elegant and somewhat cheaper publication is the centenary edition of the Waverley Novels, from the same American house, in connection with Messrs. Adam & Charles Black, of Edinburgh. There will be twenty-five volumes in all, to be completed, if practicable, by August 15, 1871, the centenary of the author's birthday. The size is crown octavo, the type cast expressly for the edition, and there will, apparently, be one full-page illustration on wood, besides vignettes, in each volume. "Waverley" and "Guy Mannering" are already issued, and are uncommonly handsome books. The literary merit of this edition will consist in annotations derived from Sir Walter's manuscript notes and corrections, and which have never before been published.

Messrs. Sever & Francis publish, under the title of "American Institutions," the first volume of Professor Bowen's edition of "Democracy in America." That is the portion of De Tocqueville's great work in which that philosophic observer sets down his reflections on the political edifice reared in this country by Anglo-American democracy; and if it lacks some of the interest possessed by its author's more general speculations on the influence of democracy upon American society and human nature—upon the American father, child, wife, mother, artist, soldier, business man, man of letters, religionist, philosopher, gentleman—it is even more valuable to the American citizen than those generalizations, as being a textbook in which he may study the nature of the institutions under which he lives, and as being less marred by its author's habit of sometimes petting his theory at the expense of his facts. The book is excellently printed, on paper a little thin, perhaps, is neatly bound, and, altogether, the publishers have done their duty by a book which merits a place in all the schools. A chief danger of our politics at the present time is that the citizens have abdicated in favor of the politicians and the agitators, and that a headlong piling on of fuel and a cunning pulling of wires take the place of an intelligent care for the machinery of government. Perhaps De Tocqueville's work is, not excepting even "The Federalist" itself, the agent best adapted to counteract the folly and the greedy rascality which equally threaten us.

Dr. Hartwig's literary productions deserve a prominent rank among the class of books which combine the highly entertaining with the highly instructive. Their comprehensiveness and solid exactness render them instructive even to scholars; their plainness of diction, liveliness of sketching, and pleasantness of narration render them charming even to children. Their distinctive merit, however, consists in the skilful grouping of an immense variety of natural pictures, embodying, among others, the results of the very latest discoveries into grand, connected tableaux. The "Polar World" (New York: Harper & Bros.) forms a symmetrically executed whole, and although it would require pages to convey to our readers a mere idea of the richness and variety of its descriptions and narratives—descriptions of lands and seas, of faunas and floras, of man and his habits; and narratives of journeys, voyages of discovery, and adventures—yet the author has been able in a few words to characterize its entire scope and range. His object was, he says, "to describe the Polar World in its principal natural features, to point out the influence of its long winter night and fleeting summer on the development of vegetable and animal existence; and, finally, to picture man waging the battle of life against the dreadful climate of high latitudes of our globe, either as the inhabitant of their gloomy solitudes, or as the bold investigator of their mysteries." As in the volume on Egypt, the English editor has made sad work with the orthography of proper names. As Siberia and the other Polar regions of the Russian empire occupy a very important place in the book, the English reader is thus as frequently as unnecessarily tormented with very strange names, the sounds of which, if read in the English way, are often as barbarous and unpronounceable as they are remote from the true pronunciation of the Russian. And no note warns the reader that what he has before him is neither the Russian nor the English name, but a German equivalent for the former, which, if the reader has learned to do it, must be pronounced in the German way: that "Wasiljewitsch," for instance, stands for Vasilievitch, and "*Schtsche*golow" for *Shtche*goloff. The American reprint has made the evil considerably worse by "changing the orthography of a few geographical and ethnological terms so that they shall conform to the mode of representation usual in our maps and books of travel," and thus destroying the rule, and making it impossible even to the reader who knows German to find his way through the bewildering maze of unnatural and contradictory spellings. And to make the general confusion still worse confounded, the changes thus avowedly introduced have not been carried through consistently. Thus the "Note by the American Editor" announces the substitution of Nova Zembla and Samoïedes for Novaya Zemla and Samojedes, and yet in various chapters the last-named forms are repeatedly used. If to all this our readers add a number of misprints, they may be able to form an idea of the orthographical Babel presented by the American edition. The illustrations contained in this reprint have been substituted for the less numerous original ones, and the American editor has also added two chapters on "Alaska" and "The Innuits," the former in the middle of the book—which appears to us a proceeding of doubtful propriety. The additions are, however, very interesting and richly illustrated.

Messrs. Harper & Bros., carrying their war with Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. into Africa, have published, both in cloth and paper, "The Poetical Works of Alfred Tennyson," with illustrations, in one volume. The page is divided into two columns, like that of the "Monthly," except in the case of "Locksley Hall," and by employing small type there must be an approach to completeness in the collection, though it does not lay claim to it, and we have not examined it to judge. Tennyson's last volume is included, and we still have a thinnish book of but 232 pages.

Mrs. Jerningham's Journal. (New York: Macmillan & Co., and Charles Scribner & Co.)—This "Journal" is a novelette of a kind not different, so far as the story and the characters go, from thousands of love tales that are printed in the magazines, and is written in verse, which, as a matter of fact, may or not be Mr. Coventry Patmore's, but which might be his so far as concerns its qualities as verse. What gives it an interest above that which one ordinarily feels in such novelettes is, first, that it is written in verse, and in verse so good; and, secondly, that it is puzzling to think who did it, and why. Was the writer a man or a woman? Were its successes designed, or are they to be accounted for by the fact that the writer was photographing experiences previously felt? Is the hero of the tale only the hero of the tale, or is he veritably a hero in the eyes of the author of it? In short, is "Mrs. Jerningham's Journal" essentially a journal—some writer's actual beliefs, and opinions, and views of life put into print; or is it an artistic composition? Something of both, we incline to think; though, on the whole, we are disposed to leave the reader at liberty to form his own opinion after he has spent his half-hour or so—not an unpleasant half-hour—over the book itself. We fancy that it might have been written by a good-hearted, good-headed woman, unmarried, with a kind contempt for the ordinary "silly girl" who has somehow been made a bride; with a partial pity for the grave man who wears the chains of the heedless creature; with a high idea of woman's duty to her husband; with all the faith of the good woman in the sort of man whom men call a prig; and with a full share of a willingness common among unmarried women to step in and offer up the frivolous wife on the altar of sacrifice whenever they see that the mistaken young pink-and-white thing is causing unhappiness to the husband. The story of "Mrs. Jerningham's Journal" is, in brief, as follows: Mrs. Jerningham is married to John before she has been in love with him or anybody else—while yet a young girl. He is not the sort of person who makes other people comfortable, and, by-and-by, Mrs. Jerningham is made to feel that her husband is serious and profound, and that she is a slight and trivial creature. He advises a course of solid reading; she prefers balls; he objects to waltzing; she likes waltzing; he approves of solemn demeanor; she has a weakness for flirting—flirting in rather a milk-and-watery way, to be sure, but still flirting; he becomes sulky; she, whatever she does, harmless or otherwise, makes him sulkier; and at last he leaves her in a rage and betakes himself to Spain. All this part of the story is epicene to a troublesome degree, and whether the writer is man or woman is a question about which readers of the quarrel will not find it easy to make up their minds. Of course John comes back at last, and we leave the pair as happy as if the husband were not "insensible" and the wife were not "silly." The extract following is a fair specimen of the author's manner:

> "I learned how deep his love had been:
> Poor love—by folly kept at bay;
> And how his heart had crowned me queen:
> Poor queen—who flung her crown away.
>
> "How wrath and love may be the same,
> And wrath be hard and love be shy;
> And as I learned I blushed with shame
> At such a shallow thing as I!
>
> "Dead fell repentance, fear, and strife,
> Lost in a heaven of delight—
> To be a loved and loving wife,
> Measureless rapture—height of height!
>
> "O John! this sick-room life is sweet,
> Do n't get too well as days unfold;
> I can't sit smiling at your feet
> When in your bank you count your gold."

Twisted Threads. By M. D. Nauman, author of "Sidney Elliott." (Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1870.)—This is a little story which has nothing to recommend it but the fact that it is written simply and naturally, and in grammatically correct English. But even these merits are found rarely enough in young ladies' novels to be worthy of commendation whenever they do occur. For the rest, "Maud Elinor Lennox," the heroine of the book, is a sufficiently natural young woman, who writes weak sentiment in her diary, which we fancy to be not unlike that confided to similar receptacles by her prototypes in real life. There is a plot, which is rather complicated and tolerably silly, and a well-considered conclusion, in which everybody gets what he wants, and the skein of life is fairly untangled. We must have new books, we suppose, or how would native genius be cultivated and the way made straight for the "Great American Novel?" And since these things must be, books like this, which is pure in sentiment, written without affectation, and free from the presumption of ignorance, would be worthy of a word or two of praise if the praise could be quite dissociated from encouragement. Although Miss Nauman has very little to say, and that little is not of overwhelming importance, she expresses herself well and clearly, which, of course, is better than saying equally little in such an awkward, unliterary, or even illiterate way as some other of our ambitious minor novelists do.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Brown (Mrs. H. E.), Abroad; or, Scenery in Europe	(Am. Tract Society)	$1 50
Beecher (Rev. H. W.), Lecture-Room Talks	(J. B. Ford & Co.)	1 75
Coit (Rev. T. W.), Lecture on Ecumenical Councils, swd	(Hartford)
Chadwick (Rev. J. W.), Sermons and Life of Rev. N. A. Staples	(W. V. Spencer)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Cyclopædia, Nos. 23, 24, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	1 00
Dumont (Mme. M.), Velvet-Coat, the Cat: a Child's Story	(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Dwinelle (J. W.), American Opinions on the "Alabama" and other Political Questions, swd	(John Wiley & Son)
Edward Wortley Montagu: an Autobiography	(Turner & Co.)	1 75
Froude (J. A.), History of England, Vols. XI., XII.	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	6 00
Guillemin (A.), The Sun	" " "	1 50
Gage (Rev. W. L.), Studies in Bible Lands	(Am. Tract Society)	2 00
Grey (Hon. Mrs. Wm.), Journal of a Visit to Egypt, etc.	(Harper & Bros.)
Garibaldi (Gen. G.), The Rule of the Monk: a Tale	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50
Hart (J. S.), How to Select a Library, swd	(J. C. Garrigues & Co.)
Journal of Social Science, No. 2, 1870, swd	(Leypoldt & Holt)	1 50
Johnson (Prof. S. W.), How Crops Feed	(Orange Judd & Co.)
Kitchel (Rev. H. D.), Suppression of the Liquor Traffic, swd	(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
Potter (Rev. A.), The Drinking Usages of Society, swd	" " "
Randall (S. S.), History of the State of New York	(J. B. Ford & Co.)	1 75
Steele (Mrs. A. C.), So Runs the World Away: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50
The American Catalogue of Books for 1869, swd	(Leypoldt & Holt)
Tautphœus (Baroness), Cyrilla: a Tale, swd	(Turner & Co.)	0 50
The Bible in the Public Schools; Arguments, and Decisions of the Court	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)	2 50
Waring (G. E., jr.), Earth-Closets and Earth-Sewage	(Tribune Assn.)	0 50

Fine Arts.

MUSIC.

OPERA MUSIC.

OPERA this winter has fared badly. Maretzek has fled ignominiously beyond seas. On this side the Atlantic stand his creditors, wringing their hands; on the other, that Napoleon of impresarios is meditating new levies and fresh campaigns. Staten Island was the Elba to which it was once thought he had gone in perpetual exile. But last fall, in an ill-fated moment, he set on foot a new enterprise; and now his forces are scattered, and he, a fugitive, leaves deputy sheriffs and the stockholders of the Academy to mourn his loss.

The disaster that befell the Russian operatic enterprise was no less signal. The poor prima donna of that company came to grief in a New York police court, being charged with running off with the Manager's money-belt; and the difficulty was renewed before a Boston tribunal when the company went to that city. But the opera itself had been a distressing failure before the singers went to law. Finally, some short-sighted persons, mindful of the zest with which the public so short a time ago received opéra bouffe, undertook to revive that hallucination. But the fickle public was sick and weary of the gaudy French folly, and turned a deaf ear to the blandishments of Offenbach and Mrs. Howard Paul. Not that it had become virtuous, but that it was satiated with the sugar-coated musical bonbons.

The Russian opera failed because it was too slow, the French opera because it was too fast, and the Italian because it was too stale. Maretzek had but one tenor whom any one cared to hear. This tenor, Lefranc, had a superb voice, but he had not been musically educated. Rumor said that he had been a farrier in the French army during the Crimean war, and afterwards a conductor on a railway. At all events, he knew only two or three old operas, and when the public got tired of the repetition of these, the doors of the Academy had to be closed, for there was nothing new to offer. Meantime we have not been left entirely without music. There have been concerts both private and public. The principal of the former was that of the Church Music Association, given week before last at Steinway Hall. This was the second concert of this young and prosperous association. It is increasing in numbers, and in the excellence of its work. Dr. Pech, too, has improved even more than his chorus. We took occasion in a former issue to refer to the distressing personality there was in his method of conducting. Pech was so conspicuous, so elaborate, so noisy, and so demonstrative, that it required one's undivided attention to watch his manœuvres, and to wonder what he would do next. The chorus and orchestra became secondary affairs. The director was the all in all. But Dr. Pech has modified himself. He conducted at the last concert with a dignity and quietness that was worthy of all praise. If now he will go to a Philharmonic rehearsal, and watch Mr. Bergmann, he will learn that a baton that traverses two feet of space may be just as suggestive of the proper tempo as though the sides of the right angle it describes were twenty feet each.

The pieces performed at the last concert were Haydn's Sixteenth Mass and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise. The former was very well sung, the latter very badly. The Association was especially unfortunate in one of the soloists in the latter piece. Mendelssohn's work, too, had been very insufficiently rehearsed, and really was cruelly treated in parts. Some of the tenors seemed to be nothing more than baritons forcing their voices. When they could not sing a high note, they took the next nearest within their reach. This plan somewhat interfered with the composer's intentions, and produced combinations that had not occurred to him. The orchestra, however, and the nucleus of professional singers, about which the amateurs gathered, helped the chorus through. The audience was as fine a one as it was possible for New York to gather. The men who stand at the head of their several callings, and the women who give tone and character to the best society of the city, were present. No higher compliment than their attendance could be paid to the Association. What it should give in return is fidelity to the work in hand. Faithful attendance at the rehearsals should, above all, be an obligation paramount to every other social engagement. Only in this way can they avoid the danger of a mortifying failure that so nearly attended their performance of some parts of the Lobgesang.

We have one further suggestion to make to Dr. Pech. It is that he attempts too much. A wise doctor used to say that it was far better to get up from the table hungry than surfeited; and it is equally true that a concert had better be too short than too long. Dr. Pech's are too long. His audience gets wearied, and straggles out during the last half-hour of the performance in the most rude and confusing way. This demoralized the chorus at the last concert, they looked wistfully after their retreating friends, and sang ad libitum. If Dr. Pech attempts to give, as he proposes, at his next concert the whole of Beethoven's Mass in C, the second part of Oberon, and an orchestral work, the consequence will be threefold. First, he will have given his chorus more than they can properly rehearse in the interim, and some of the pieces will be slurred; secondly, he will give his audience more than they care to listen to, and they will go out; thirdly, he will have to omit something at the last moment, and some of his hearers or singers will be sure to be out of temper in consequence.

MADRIGAL MUSIC.

Let the lovers of English madrigal music take heart. There is plenty of it in store for them. The two rival societies are about to take the field. One of them is the offshoot of the other. The parent-society is a little jealous of its progeny, and more than a little indignant at several things it has done; the progeny in its turn resents the anger of its elder. This little mutual irritability will probably develop itself in a new form—that of hard work. Neither organization will wish to be outdone by the other. Both are coming before the public at the same place—Steinway Hall—and about the same time. Each will attend the concerts of the other as auditors, and in an actively critical spirit. If the tenors flatten, there will be sharp ears to hear. If the basses roar when they ought to coo, some one will smile sardonically. Both societies will therefore be on the alert. Every expressive mark will be carefully looked after; the effect of every note carefully weighed. In this coming duello of harmony the outside public has everything to gain and nothing to lose. The deeper the rivalry, the more they will profit by it. We shall certainly have some famous madrigal singing. And not only madrigals, for the parent society intends to step up on higher ground. Mendelssohn, in one of his classical moods, determined to set to music the choruses to certain of Sophocles's plays. His Antigone and Œdipus music was the result. At Berlin they make it a religious duty to perform one or other of these works every year. The elder madrigal club is to give us the benefit of its studies in this direction; they will also perform selections from Haydn's passion music, rarely, if ever, heard in this country, and portions of Mendelssohn's psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came."

Finally, in enumerating the musical enterprises for which we have to be grateful, the Parepa-Rosa company now giving performances of opera in English at the Academy is not to be overlooked. They began on Monday of this week with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a continuation of the loves now turned to intrigues of the Count Almaviva and Rosina, his wife. The work supplements Rossini's "Barber of Seville." The Parepa-Rosa company sing it exceedingly well, though the work derives no advantage from its English dress, the fact being that the articulation of nearly all public singers is so indistinct that only a word is caught here and there, not enough to enable one to follow the thread of the story.

On the whole, then, though Maretzek has fled, and opéra bouffe is dead, and Russian opera has gone to the burial as chief mourner, we have reason to congratulate ourselves that in the absence of all these foreign tongues honest English has its day, and that we have a fine opera company in the present and some first-class glee and madrigal music in prospect.

NEW BOOKS
NOW READY.

I. Lecture-Room Talks.

A Series of Familiar Discourses on Themes of Christian Experience. By HENRY WARD BEECHER. Phonographically reported by T. J. Ellinwood. 12mo, extra cloth, price $1 75.

These "Talks" are the well-known and delightful expositions of Scripture and extempore remarks made at prayer-meetings and on similar occasions, in the familiar and free intercourse of Mr. Beecher with his own people, Mr. Ellinwood's reports, both of Lecture-Room Talks and of Sermons (in Plymouth Pulpit) as published by the house of Ford & Co., are the only ones which Mr. Beecher authorizes or recognizes as his own utterances.

II. Beecher's Sermons.

Second Series. March to September, 1869. Illustrated with a large and effective engraving, giving a fine view of the Interior of Plymouth Church. 451 pp., price, extra cloth, $2 50; half mor. or half calf, $5.

III. Principles of Domestic Science:

As applied to the Duties and Pleasures of Home. A Text-Book for Young Ladies in Schools, Seminaries, and Colleges. By CATHERINE E. BEECHER and HARRIETT BEECHER STOWE. A compact 12mo vol. of 300 pages, profusely illustrated, well printed, and bound in neat and substantial style, price $2.

Prepared with a view to assist in training young women for the distinctive duties which inevitably come upon them in household life, this volume should find an honored place in every institution devoted to feminine education. Very many topics of vital importance in the regulation of the household receive thorough treatment. The book has been made with especial reference to the duties, cares, and pleasures of the family, as being the place where, whatever the political developments of the future, Woman, from her very nature, of body and of spirit, will find her most engrossing occupation.

IV. History of the State of New York.

From the Date of the Discovery and Settlements on Manhattan Island to the Present Time. A Text-Book for High-Schools, Academies, and Colleges. By S. S. RANDALL, Superintendent of Public Education in New York City. 12mo vol., 396 pages, illustrated, price $1 75.

The author, for many years intimately connected with the management of our Public Schools, has written with a full knowledge of what was needed, and the result is a clear, compendious, and admirable digest of all the important events in the life of New York, down to the year 1870.

The first attempt at providing for our elementary and higher institutions of learning a separate History of the State of New York.

☞ These books for sale everywhere, or sent, postpaid, upon receipt of the price by the Publishers. Single copies of the two school books mailed free to teachers as specimens at half the retail price.

J. B. FORD & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
39 PARK ROW, NEW YORK CITY.

NOW READY,
NEW EDITION
OF Fair Harvard.
A STORY OF AMERICAN COLLEGE LIFE.
1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

"As far superior to 'Verdant Green,' in one way, as to 'Tom Brown' in another."—Saturday Review (London).

"To a boy on the eve of entering college we would say—read this book."—New York Times.

"There can be no difference of opinion as to the remarkable cleverness of the book."—Cor. Boston Daily Advertiser.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,
FOURTH AV. AND TWENTY-THIRD ST.,
NEW YORK.

George Routledge & Sons
NEW PUBLICATIONS.

I.

COMPLETION OF REV. J. G. WOOD'S ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY OF MAN.

The Natural History of Man (Volume II. just published): Being an Account of the Manners and Customs of the Uncivilized Races of Man. By the Rev. J. G. Wood. With Designs by Zwecker, Angas, Danby, Handley, and others; engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. Two Vols. super-royal 8vo, cloth, price $7 each.

Wood's Illustrated Natural History is now complete, in five volumes, containing about 2,000 Illustrations, and forms the newest, cheapest, and best popular work on the subject in existence. 5 vols. super royal 8vo, cloth, $35; half-calf, $47 50.

II.

A NEW EDITION OF

Jane Austen's Novels.

Neatly Printed and Bound in Extra Cloth, 5 Vols. price $4, contains:

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. NORTHANGER ABBEY.
SENSE AND SENSIBILITY. PERSUASION.
MANSFIELD PARK. EMMA.

III.

A NEW EDITION (Price Reduced to $5).

Russell's (W. H.) Diary in the East during the Tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Illustrated with Chromo-Lithographs and numerous Woodcuts. 8vo, cloth.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

"Works of great value, and no student can well afford to do without them."

A HANDSOME EDITION AND REDUCED PRICE OF

Dean Milman's Works;
COMPRISING

History of the Jews,
From the Earliest Period down to Modern Times. By Henry Hart Milman, Dean of St. Paul's. A new edition, revised and extended. 3 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth,.....$5 25

History of Christianity,
From the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire. A new edition, revised and corrected. 3 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth,.....$5 25

History of Latin Christianity,
Including that of the Popes, to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. 8 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth,.....$14 00

Or, COMPLETE WORKS. Uniform Sets. 14 vols., cloth (in case) $24 50
Do., do. Uniform Sets. 14 vols., half calf (in case), 49 00

A discount made to Teachers and Clergymen.
Please address orders to
W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,
27 HOWARD ST., NEW YORK.

NOW READY,
THE Catholic World:
A MONTHLY MAGAZINE
OF
General Literature and Science, FOR APRIL, 1870.

CONTENTS:

I. RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.
II. DION AND THE SIBYLS.
III. MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.
IV. STABAT MATER (English and Greek Translation).
V. THE BRIGAND'S GOD-CHILD.
VI. MOLECULAR MECHANICS.
VII. THE HOLY WEEK OF 1869 IN HAVANA.
VIII. GOULD'S ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF.
IX. PLANGE FILIA SION.
X. UNTYING GORDIAN KNOTS.
XI. THE IRON MASK.
XII. THE SCHOOL QUESTION.
XIII. THE NEW ENGLANDER ON THE "MORAL RESULTS OF THE ROMISH SYSTEM."
XIV. TO THE RAINBOW.
XV. THE FIRST ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL OF THE VATICAN. III.
XVI. FOREIGN LITERARY NOTES.
XVII. NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Catholic Publication Society,
126 NASSAU STREET,
P. O. Box 5,396, New York.

LAWRENCE KEHOE,
GENERAL AGENT.

TERMS: $5 per year, in advance. Dealers supplied by the American News Company.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 24, 1870.

The Week.

THE Georgia Bill has given the Senate its principal employment during the week, and the House has done little else than listen to long speeches for and against the Tariff Bill, and on the abstract issue of protection. On Thursday, the case of Representative Butler came up for decision, but in spite of its close resemblance to that of Mr. Whittemore, the two-thirds vote necessary to expulsion could not be obtained, and the House compromised, in the worst sense of the word, on a resolution of censure, which, in the circumstances, had the weight, and is likely to have the usual effect, of the censure of railroad companies by coroner's jury. The Senate has shown equal powers of discrimination in at last confirming Mr. Bradley's appointment to the Supreme Bench, though few people have yet forgotten its chief ostensible objection to Mr. Hoar.

The probabilities at this writing are that the Georgia Bill will pass the Senate with the Bingham amendment slightly modified. Mr. Drake, who is greatly excited, and, indeed, seems to be in a chronic state of mental inflammation, wants to add a provision for the despatch of troops, by the President, to disturbed districts on the demand of the governor of the State, the commanding officer being empowered to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and levy taxes on the inhabitants for the transportation of the force. The plans for keeping Bullock in office, and for generally playing fast and loose with the government of the State, were opposed by Mr. Schurz in a very able speech, by Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Edmunds, and, indeed, by nearly all the law, logic, and common sense there is in the Senate. Mr. Sumner and General Butler wanted to have Texas admitted without reference to a committee, under the act which leaves intact the original conditions under which the State first entered the Union, one of which leaves it optional with the inhabitants whether they will have slavery or not. This has raised a good deal of laughter against these gentlemen, and deservedly; but then we fear a good many members have laughed who were not entitled to the full enjoyment of the joke. There has been a good deal in the Reconstruction legislation of overlooking, through frantic haste, things almost as obvious as the provisions of the Texas act.

General Garfield, speaking on the Deficiency Bill, made some remarks on the economical side of Civil Service reform—a subject which we have treated at greater length in another column—which are worth noting. He says that one-half of the clerks employed in the Treasury Department are merely employed in the manual labor of copying, and filing, and counting, and that men to do such work as this can be got all over the country for six or eight hundred dollars a year; in other words, the nation pays this class of employees about double what their labor is worth. He says, too, that in the Executive Departments common laborers are paid double the wages they can get in the market in any part of the country—"thus demoralizing the whole labor system of the country. We pick one man out of a thousand, and give him triple wages, thus making all the rest discontented office-seekers. On the other hand, the men who do the brain labor of these Departments, through whose hands pass millions a day, and upon whose ability and integrity the revenues of the nation largely depend," are paid far less than the employees of private individuals or of the great mercantile corporations receive for similar services. And the fault, as General Garfield alleges, lies not with the Administration or the heads of Departments, but "with the House of Representatives and its legislation." Does not General Garfield believe, however, that the cause of reform would be helped if the Secretary of the Treasury gave in his adhesion, as the Secretary of the Interior has done, to the doctrine that the Government ought to employ, pay, and retain its servants on the same terms and conditions as private enterprises, and not lend his countenance and support, as he does, to the doctrine of "spoils" and "rotation," which he knows perfectly well fills his office with worthless hangers-on, whose wages are literally so much money stolen from the taxpayers?

The dull indifference with which the House listens to the denunciations of these worthies forms a curious and instructive contrast to the holy zeal which animates it against the army officers, the only class of its servants from whom the Government really gets honest service. The bill turning a large body of officers adrift, to begin the world in middle life, and without business connections, with one year's pay and allowances in their pockets, was passed last week with a really refreshing energy. One would think, to read the debate, that General Logan and General Butler had never heard of a drone in the public service, had never quartered one on the public treasury, and, indeed, could not bear the sight of one anywhere, and that the army officers were notorious for their pickings and stealings, and were eating out the substance of the people. Of the public faith pledged to these men, of their singular honesty and fidelity, of the desirableness of putting them in any of the hundred branches of the Civil Service now needing faithful labor —not one word.

The President is said to be trying hard to overcome the opposition which has shown itself in the Senate to the St. Domingo treaty, and at the bottom of which is, doubtless, in the first place, unwillingness to spend the money which will have, in common decency, to be voted to complete the St. Thomas purchase, if St. Domingo is accepted; and, in the second, perhaps a slight unwillingness to carry out any proposition of the Executive. But there is a strong and growing feeling in the public mind that we have had enough of annexing by secret treaty, negotiated not only without the knowledge of the country, but without the knowledge of Congress. Great additions of territory, populated already by voters whose votes are sure to exercise some influence, and may exercise a great one, on the destiny of the country, ought not to be made, every one feels, particularly in the present condition of our home politics, without ample public discussion—enough to draw out the opinion of the country. The worst of the St. Domingo affair is, that Spain got it a few years ago, much as we are now getting it, as a free gift, but had to fight for its possession after all, and finally gave it up as too dear at any price; and nobody knows yet what the result in our case will be. The importance attached to the recent popular vote on the island, which declared for annexation by a large majority, will hardly be justified till we learn whether the voters knew what they were voting about. The Dominicans are not highly educated; in fact, the great bulk of them are brutally ignorant; and one of the peculiarities of the working of universal suffrage in ignorant communities is, that the majorities in the affirmative on propositions submitted to them by those in authority are apt to be immense, inasmuch as they are generally submitted in a form or with accompaniments that make them what lawyers call leading questions, and as differences of opinion on any subject in ignorant communities are rare, because differences of opinion are the result of thinking. If St. Domingo is accepted before it is clear that we shall not have to incur the burden of a military force to keep it in order, it will be a mistake as well as a misfortune.

The Cincinnati Gazette has "thought out" Mr. Sumner's financial measure No. 2, providing for the return of the banks and the Government to specie payments—a little process which, it is charitable to suppose, Mr. Sumner did not attempt to perform for himself before bringing in the bill. Under the bill the Secretary of the Treasury is, will-he-nil-he, to resume specie payments Jan. 1, 1871, holding the gold receipts in the meantime for the purpose; and the banks are to accumulate in gold at the rate of one per cent. a month of their liabilities. The Gazette shows that, under this arrangement, the banks and Government together would hold about $154,000,000 in gold, being about $6,000,000 less than the total amount of gold in the country, according to the calculation of the best authorities. The price at which gold would then stand in the New York market, with only $6,000,000 disposable, may be left to the imagination. The total amount of paper outstanding is, however—fractional currency excluded—$694,000,000, and to "resume," the banks and the Treasury would have just 22½ per cent. of this amount, in coin, on hand. Lest the Treasury, as is very probable, however, should find its supply of gold run short, Mr. Sumner sagaciously authorizes it to "buy in open market to meet its deficiencies," a little game which would bear a striking resemblance to the process of trying to fill a barrel by catching what ran out of a hole in the bottom and pouring it in again at the top. The Gazette truly says that though these things are laughable, we can hardly afford to laugh over them. The public mind on most momentous questions is confused by such performances, business is deranged, and a general want of confidence in the future diffused through the mercantile community. Why cannot men who do not understand finance, and whose mental powers and training do not fit them to deal with its problems, leave the finances alone?

The Boston Advertiser argues against our view of the advisableness of putting as much of the National Debt as possible on the foreign market, on the ground that it is undoubtedly an evil to have money going abroad to be spent there for any purpose; that we should be better off if the eighty millions a year of interest we now pay to foreign holders were paid to natives. This may or may not be true. Our paying eighty millions a year interest to foreigners really means that we spent in war about a thousand millions of foreign capital, in the absence of which we should have spent the same sum of American capital. The Advertiser must remember that one cannot eat his cake and have it. If we spent other people's money in preference to spending our own, it showed that there was a decided pecuniary advantage in doing so. The Advertiser also draws attention to the fact, that for most of the bonds we sent abroad we didn't get money, and have not money but goods. In the years 1868–9, for instance, our imports of tea, coffee, and sugar amounted to about $120,000,000 in gold, which, it says regretfully, "were absolutely consumed; the debt which represents them abroad has given us no capital for productive enterprises." How can this be? Who consumed the tea, coffee, and sugar? Were they idlers? Were they not productive laborers? and is not the supply of productive laborers and their families with the necessaries and comforts of life a legitimate use of capital? Is it possible to build a railroad, or mill, or work a mine without paying away large sums for tea, coffee, and sugar every day? These are not articles that are wasted; nobody commits debauches in them; and if we buy them with bonds instead of with ready money, it simply shows that we can use our ready money to better advantage than sending it abroad. The Advertiser says M. Frignet's talk which we quoted is such as may be "heard from any banker to whom it is proposed to negotiate a profitable loan." Quite true; it is well understood that bankers like to negotiate loans, and make money by it. That is their business. But the Advertiser might as well compare the talk of a tailor who solicits my custom to that of the spider to the fly, as compare to it M. Frignet's talk to us. The tailor, undoubtedly, has selfish motives in asking leave to make my clothes, but he does not want to kill and eat me as the spider does the fly; and it would be very silly, the Advertiser will admit, for me to sit down and make my own pantaloons because I suspected that he wanted to make a profit on the job. At the bottom of all this reasoning is the old fallacy, that the paying out of money necessarily indicates a loss, and that two parties with opposing interests cannot be the better for the same transaction.

The World, of Sunday, raps us over the knuckles for talking of "scientific protection," as we have recently done, as a possible thing. By scientific protection we mean protection which will protect simply what it is intended to protect and do nothing else, which is now unknown in this country; and, to the best of our belief, has never been known anywhere, but which we still maintain is possible. Its expediency is another thing. We may maintain, for instance, that it is possible for a man by using care to hit what he aims at with an old gun; but whether shooting at anything with an old gun is a useful occupation, is a question which would still remain open for argument. Moreover, we were correct in speaking of governments as having the right to undertake "unjustifiable" wars, though, perhaps, not as clear as we ought to have been. The context showed clearly that we were speaking of legal or political right to wage wars not defensible in morals. In a legal sense, of course, wars are "just" apart from the moral character of their origin. All wars are technically "just" when waged by a constituted government.

The trial of Judge Fullerton, on a charge of conspiracy with special agent Belknap, of the Internal Revenue Department, to extort money by blackmailing in 1868, was concluded on Thursday, the evidence for the Government being of so flimsy a character as to make a nine days' trial seem scarcely less impossible than a conviction. The Judge was completely acquitted of any improper or unprofessional action; in fact, he was accused of precisely what he refused to have any part in doing—settling an arrest for money. The actual extortion arose from the opportunities for oppression and corruption afforded by the revenue service in the case of distillers, and from the dangerous powers entrusted to special agents like Belknap, in the exercise of which men have had their books seized, their business closed up, and ruin thrust in their faces, unless they at once submitted to the exactions of the detective in whose grasp they lay. Happily, or unhappily, the public will never know the full extent of this villany. Collector Bailey, of the Thirty-second District, who has hitherto been conspicuous for the energy with which he has prosecuted the whiskey-dealers, and lent all his aid towards the conviction of Judge Fullerton, now turns out to have abused his position as Belknap did, and, having been a defaulter in the Fourth District, and sought to retrieve himself by his frauds in the Thirty-second, has ended by disappearing from the city, leaving a deficiency in his accounts of from $100,000 to $200,000. The Government was just on the eve of removing him, and was only a little anticipated.

We presume there are few persons who have paid any attention to the matter at all who have not been a good deal amused by the efforts the Methodists have been making for the last six months to find out whether any frauds had or not been committed in their Book Concern. The existence of peculation was reported by Mr. Lanahan, a new Superintendent, some time last summer, and an investigation was ordered and took place, but it ended in a report which we never rightly understood, but the general effect of which upon the public mind was, that although there might have been frauds and irregularities in the conduct of the business, somehow nobody had committed them or was responsible for them—Providence, we suppose, having caused certain phenomena to wear the look of fraud for the mere purpose of trying the virtue of the denomination. However, both the church and the world were so dissatisfied that another investigation was ordered, and the majority of the investigators have now reported again that there is nothing wrong, but do not give the evidence on which their decision is based, while the minority report that there is a great deal wrong, and do give the evidence on which their decision is based. Now, the weakness which the public has for facts has caused the minority to receive more credit than the majority, but the majority report, of course, stands as the formal verdict of the tribunal appointed by a religious body to investigate a charge of a peculiarly outrageous kind of swindling. The best of the joke—for the affair has really assumed the features of a monstrous joke—is, that the person alleged to be principal defaulter has, since these disclosures, been appointed to a high official position—if we remember rightly, a fiduciary position—in connection, of all things in the world, with the denominational Sunday-schools. The last Conference was moved by this last scandal into taking some decided action against the worthy gentleman, by way of preventing his discharging the functions of his new office, but the frauds remain, in the meantime, really unpunished. In fact, the whole performance, up to this point, has borne a painful resemblance to the way in which the Ring would screen its operations from the prying eyes of its victims, if an attempt were made to ferret them out; and, considering that the organization which bears thus patiently with this great scandal has for its sole object the promotion of religion, and the men who have been engaged in the whitewashing operation have performed it qua Christians, the matter throws some curious light on the condition of the public mind with regard to the great social duty of bringing rogues to justice—a duty hardly inferior in importance to that of being honest one's self.

We bid fair to have a new and interesting "Chapter in Erie," owing to the efforts of the foreign stockholders, two-thirds of the whole, to get repealed the extraordinary bill passed last session by the New York Legislature, by which Fisk, Gould & Co. were empowered to reorganize the Board of Directors without any fresh election, so that they should be divided into three sections, holding office for two, three, and five years respectively. We need hardly say that it so fell out that Fisk and Gould were to sit for the long term, and were thus actually put in possession of the road for four years after the term for which they were originally elected, and without any reference to the wishes of the stockholders. The measure was, in fact, neither more nor less than the concession to Fisk & Co. of legal facilities to rob the stockholders; and Governor Hoffman, not only to his own disgrace, but the disgrace of the country, signed it—his statement of his reasons for doing so being very interesting, as a specimen of the way in which politicians in whom the sense of shame is not wholly extinct, sometimes try to whip the devil round the stump. These reasons were—that there had been no opposition to it in the Senate and no remonstrance from the stockholders, the fact being that two-thirds of the stockholders were in England. The stock having run down from 72 to 46, the foreign owners are at last bestirring themselves, and have sent over an agent, Mr. Burt, to try and get the bill repealed. It remains to be seen whether the Democratic majority will dare to refuse. We presume Mr. Burt has reported to his principals by this time that the expectation expressed at the meeting in London that he would be able "to shame Fisk" into virtuous action, was founded on an imperfect acquaintance with that gentleman's character.

The celebrated Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad continues to entreat the State of Massachusetts to lend it a little more money for the benefit of Connecticut and New York. Meanwhile, the accounts of the railroad have been published, and certainly a more instructive statement has seldom seen the light. The accounts cover the period from July 1, 1868 to the present date. The first item that attracts the reader's attention is that, within this short time, J. S. Eldridge has received $150,000. J. S. Eldridge is president of the road, and has the credit of having engineered all its largest operations. It is not stated for what services this payment was made, but as it is deducted in the account from the money received from the Erie Railway, the public can make its own deductions. Our inference is that this was a payment for Eldridge's part in the "Boston raid" of two or three summers ago, a detailed account of which may be found in the North American Review. The item would therefore properly be, "Cash paid J. S. Eldridge for services rendered and character lost . . . $150,000," for the road seems to have been managed very much as the buccaneering expeditions of the Spanish Main used to be managed—every officer receiving from the treasury enough to compensate him for the dangerous character of the employment. Thus, if a man lost a finger, he received a doubloon or two, but if his leg or his arm were taken off, he made a small fortune. Among the buccaneers of our day limbs are not lost, but reputations are sadly damaged; and it is only fair that the old compensatory principle, which once served its purpose so well in the physical world, should be applied now to the domain of morals.

Besides this hundred and fifty thousand paid to Eldridge, it appears that the road has disbursed for "legal expenses" three hundred and fifty-five thousand, and has lost, by speculations in its own stock, conducted by its own officers, two millions. After this, of course, a trifle of ten thousand to Jay Gould for "commissions," or of fifty-four thousand to F. A. Lane for "contract with E. R. R. Co.," is of small importance. Indeed, no individual item is of much consequence when the whole account shows that the road is every day growing poorer and poorer, while Eldridge and Company are quietly enriching themselves. It is the old story—the ward in chancery, the guardians and their legal advisers clothed in purple and fine linen. The most astonishing fact connected with the road is that the Massachusetts Legislature is at present entertaining its petition for a third loan, when it is well known that the State Treasurer has in his hands a bond for two millions, signed by the principal managers, which was executed for the express purpose of guaranteeing the completion of the line without further expense to the State. Why is not some use made of this bond? The men who signed it are wealthy, and no reason has been given why they cannot be sued. We should not omit to state that the assets of the company are one bond, which is worth in the market about $420. If we may offer a word of advice to the directors, we would suggest an immediate sale of this bond. The bond may fall, and the money would be of the greatest value in an emergency.

The passage from military to civil rule in Virginia has given rise to a serious collision of authorities in Richmond, and led General Canby to interpose on behalf of the peace of the city. Mayor Chahoon, the incumbent under the Reconstruction acts, declined to surrender his office to Mayor Ellyson, who had been appointed on the 15th by a Council nominated by the Governor, in accordance with a recent act of Assembly. The ground taken by the former was that this law was contrary to the State Constitution, and he challenged his would-be successor to establish his claims by a resort to the courts. He also addressed Governor Walker for assistance in preserving order until a legal decision could be reached, but of course got only the advice to vacate first and contest afterwards—which seems to have been both consistent and sensible in the Governor. Be that as it may, it was not accepted by Mayor Chahoon, who called his police force about him, with a number of armed negroes, and prepared to hold the station-house in which he held his court. He was at once invested by Mayor Ellyson and his police, and must infallibly have been starved out but for his release by General Canby, who put his own troops in possession of the place. Subsequently, Mayor Chahoon retired to another police-station, beside an engine-house, where, at last accounts, he had barricaded and provisioned himself for another siege. Meanwhile, his counsel, ex-Governors Wells and Wise, sued out an injunction from Judge Underwood, on which the hearing was set down for yesterday. In clearing the streets and in the withdrawal of Ellyson's police at the instance of General Canby, disturbances arose which resulted in loss of life on both sides, though the full extent is not known. The correspondence between the General and Governor Walker shows a substantial agreement as to the right of interference in favor of either of the contestants; but we do not well see how General Canby is censurable for an honest and impartial attempt to save the city from riot and bloodshed, in one of the most difficult and delicate crises that municipal government ever encounters.

The news from Rome is to the effect that the Pope is sick, which, if true, means also that the infallibility dogma is in a bad way. But, then, rumors of the badness of his health have been rife for years, and, in spite of the increase of probability they get from the flight of years, may now be false too. He has at last begun to turn his attention to the newspaper correspondents, and is, it is said, threatening with expulsion the most valuable of them all, Sir John Acton, an English Catholic gentleman, whose letters to the London Times, as an "Occasional Correspondent," have been the most valuable accounts of the doings of the Council we have had, though this is not saying very much for them. During the week, there has appeared a very curious despatch from Antonelli to Count von Beust, replying to von Beust's expression of alarm about the possible effects of the doings of the Council on Austrian politics. The way in which he gets rid of the effect of the Papal views of the relations of the Church to the civil authority are quite ingenious. He says that "the supreme rule of conscience, as laid down by the Church, with regard to public and social actions, can be modified in its application" by concordats, and the Pope will have the power to make such modifications in the canons of the Council "as may be demanded by the political necessities of the states."

OFFICES.

THERE have been three or four occurrences during the past ten days which, to say the least for them, are well calculated to set people thinking. One is the practice which the President has begun of going down to his room in the Capitol and remaining there for hours at a time to negotiate with senators about his nominations; another is the confirmation, by an overwhelming majority of the same body which inexorably rejected Judge Hoar, of General Sickles as Minister to Spain; another is the vote on the case of Butler of Tennessee, by which it was decided that a member of Congress may corruptly agree to sell his privilege of appointing cadets in the national naval and military colleges, but, if he has not actually pocketed the money, exposes himself at most to censure; and the fourth is the letter of Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, in reply to his constituents who have asked him to allow himself to be renominated for Congress. They all go to confirm the impression which, more than ever since General Grant's accession to the presidency, has been entertained by thinking men, that the great question of the day is the question of the Government patronage. The more we look at it, the plainer it becomes that, no matter what else we settle, till this be settled all our settlings will be vain. There is nothing respectable in our polity which it is not degrading and debasing, and there is no reform we can make which will be of any but the slightest value till the people take seriously in hand the manner of choosing its subordinate employees. Laws are in themselves but words written on paper. To have any force or effect, they have to be taken up and put into execution by certain men, and on the character of these men it depends whether the nation will profit by the laws or not. Moreover, the President and Congress are the instruments of the national will in framing the laws, and if we allow them to be turned into mere instruments for the division of spoils, our legislation must end in being worthless.

It is notorious that within the last five years the character of the Senate has deteriorated. It has now a corrupt element in it which it previously had not, and it has an ignorant, inexperienced element in it which it previously had not, and, owing to the position it was driven or tempted into assuming during the conflict with Andrew Johnson, it has been seduced into views with regard to the nature and extent of its own powers which it previously was far from entertaining. Along with the stretching of its pretensions from this cause has come strong temptation to stretch them still further, in the shape of a pressure for offices from constituents such as has never been known before in the history of this or any other government. For this enormous development of office-seeking and for the conversion of all members of Congress into what Mr. Kelley calls "general employment agents," to a degree which not only prevents them enjoying social intercourse or keeping up rational correspondence, but, what is still worse, renders the study of any of the important questions now before the country impossible—we are here simply repeating in substance what he says—the war, of course, is responsible. The habit of looking on the Government offices as sure refuges for hangers-on of the party in power, existed before the war; but the multiplication of places during the war converted Congressmen into mere agents for the prosecution of the claims of this class of persons, and, like all evils of this kind, it gains strength every day that it lasts. The more a member of Congress finds himself pressed by applicants, the more eagerly he struggles for his "share" of the patronage; the more eagerly he is seen struggling, the better the applicants think their chances are, and the more their numbers increase. As, however, thus far, offices have not increased in number, and as the demand of the country for retrenchment has even compelled a reduction in their number, the competition for them has grown all the more severe. Senators compete fiercely against each other and against the representatives; the representatives against each other and against senators; and the Senate against the House; and as the office-seekers and their friends are the active politicians, and under the caucus system of nominations have really far more influence on the choice of members of Congress than the bulk of the constituency, these affairs absorb far more of the time and attention of legislators than the gravest questions affecting the public welfare.

The temper that this strife has begot is obvious enough. This kind of struggling and intriguing could not go on long without throwing both House and Senate into a childish state of petulance and jealousy, and it has done so already. Each member and each House is occupied with the care of his or its own safety, and acts and thinks accordingly. The "proper" distribution of the patronage—that is, its distribution in accordance with Congressional dictation—has come to be looked on as the only function of the Executive. For its recommendations on the larger questions of public policy Congress does not seem to care a straw, and takes no pains to conceal it. "Don't bother me with your views about Cuba, or St. Domingo, or the tariff," Congressmen seem to say to it; "when are you going to give my man that place in the custom-house?"

It was hoped—as we pointed out two or three weeks ago—that General Grant would have resisted this dictation when he first came into office. He had then an admirable chance of doing it successfully; but, partly owing to bad tact and partly to bad management, it was suffered to pass away. Since then, every attempt to recover the lost ground has been a failure; and the tide rises higher and higher. In the few cases in which he has of late followed his own better judgment, such as the appointment of the marshal in this district, it has been almost by stealth. He now appears to have given up the struggle and accepted his fate, and goes down to the Capitol to make what terms he can with the victors, in other words, to bargain with the senators, and, we may be sure, to bargain most with the most corrupt and unprincipled, for it is they who will be most exacting and hardest to satisfy about the terms on which he will be permitted to perform a duty which the Constitution entrusts to his discretion. Of course, this is an open confession that not merely is the Senate's consent necessary for confirmation but for nomination, and that it has in reality added on to its legislative functions the larger portion of the Executive functions. We shall say little of the humiliation to which the President exposes himself and his office by this step, or of the danger of the precedent he is here establishing. We may be sure his successors, unless his course should rouse the people to the necessity of a change, will push the practice still further; and as the short addresses delivered by Buchanan from his balcony to applauding friends of the Lecompton Constitution were the germs of the blackguard harangues for which Andy Johnson was impeached, we shall probably see the room in which General Grant "exchanges views" with senators in the Capitol grow, in the hands of bolder and less scrupulous successors, into a kind of brokerage office, to which not only senators will come but the whole swarm of political scamps who want to live at the public expense. We sincerely trust he may yet see the impropriety of the new move, and go back to the White House and stay there, and employ the hours which would be spent in bargaining at the Capitol, to the loss of his own dignity and self-respect, and the still further degradation of the public service, in working for a reform of the whole system.

The deplorable influence of the present state of things on the moral sense of the members of Congress themselves has been well illustrated in the Butler case, and still more in the Sickles case. The refusal to punish a man who sells his official patronage because he has not actually received the money, opens of course a ready means of escape to all future sinners, and shows the inability or unwillingness of the House to see that the wrong of these cadet cases lies not in A. or B.'s pocketing $1,000, but in his willingness to receive it. It is from his readiness to take it, and not from his taking it, that the country suffers. So, also, in the Hoar-Sickles case we see the gradual growth of a new standard of morality, under which incivility to members of Congress seeking small offices for their supporters, even when committed with the best intentions by a man of the purest character and highest professional acquirements, and with a long and honorable official career behind him, becomes an absolute disqualification, in senators' eyes, for high public place; while a life marked by every kind of infamy, deliberate murder included, is treated as absolutely no bar whatever to the bestowal of the highest distinction.

In this state of things, it is impossible to speak too highly of the step Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, has taken in refusing a renomination except on the platform of "reform in the Civil Service," which will relieve members of Congress of their present burdens as "general employment agents," and give them time for the discharge of their proper duties. This is throwing the onus of maintaining the present system, where it rightfully belongs, on the voters, not one in a thousand of whom has the smallest interest in it. Members of Congress cannot be delivered from it without their aid. Against the "managers," who are its principal supporters, they cannot revolt single-handed, and, we fear, will not; and, unless there is a strong movement out-of-doors, we fear the Civil Service bills, which have been introduced in both House and Senate, may hang on indefinitely, not meeting with any open opposition, but still not passing. There are few men in Congress who are more valued, and justly valued, by their constituents than Mr. Kelley is; and we shall be very curious to see the result of his appeal to their patriotism and good sense.

ECONOMY.

Now that Mr. Dawes has smoothed over his little unpleasantness with the Administration, and harmony has been once more established, we seize the opportunity to prove to him that any remarks we may have thought ourselves obliged to make as to the manner of his criticisms were not intended to apply to their matter, so far as economy is in question. That Mr. Dawes was quite right in his general statements we firmly believe, and we believe, too, that his attacks on the President and the Senate were not undeserved, but that he distributed his blame with too little discrimination. That he himself, and more especially his own House, are implicated, and deeply implicated, in the wastefulness and corruption of the Government, are facts to which the partisan press is not likely to call attention, but which are essential in the establishment of sound reforms. If Mr. Dawes is really in earnest, and if the President honestly means to support him, there is hope for the public; but, before promising to believe either of these statements to the full extent of their terms, we should like to have an understanding with Mr. Dawes, and to have Mr. Dawes come to a common agreement with the President as to the meaning of the words earnestness and honesty, and how far they are to be considered as qualified by circumstances.

That the principal and most costly departments of the Government are not economically administered is a fact which no one in the least acquainted with their internal arrangements will call in question. Probably there has been no Secretary of the Treasury or of the Interior, within the last ten years, having even a limited acquaintance with business habits, but has stood aghast, on entering office, at the extravagant scale on which his department is organized. It is said that Mr. McCulloch, who was perfectly plain-spoken in regard to the evil, affirmed that he was ready to take a contract to run his own department at half its actual cost—to run it more efficiently than under the existing system—and he added that he would make an immense fortune by the operation. There can be very little doubt that this was in his time not an exaggerated statement. Mr. Boutwell, on succeeding him, did in fact reduce the running expenses of the department by an amount which was then estimated at half a million of dollars a year, and by no means reached the limits of possible economy.

But there is no occasion for appealing to hearsay authority for proof of the facts alleged. The official report of the present Secretary of the Interior, which was presented to Congress in December last, admitted that the work of the Interior Department might have been done, under a more perfect organization, with one-third fewer clerks than were actually employed; and the Secretary left it to be inferred that he could have done his work better with the smaller force. The sum annually appropriated for salaries in the Interior Department exceeds $1,000,000, so that, in point of fact, the Secretary acknowledged that an economy of more than $300,000 was practicable in his province alone. If this is the case at the Interior Department, the Treasury must afford a still richer vein of economies. The large reductions made by Mr. Boutwell last spring were mere steps to a peace footing, and left the radical extravagance of the office quite untouched. More than this, it is undeniable that while Mr. Boutwell was actively engaged in removing superfluous hangers-on, he was still busier in dismissing a large proportion of the most capable officers under his control, whose place was supplied by very inferior material, so that the efficiency of the bureaus was seriously impaired, and the effect of his economies counteracted. In short, our readers may take our word for it that, of the two Departments, the Interior is much the more economically managed, and that, whatever extravagance exists in it, exists to an aggravated degree in the Treasury. If, then, an economy of one-third can be made in the former, the same economy at least is practicable in the latter. The appropriation for salaries in the Treasury Department appears to exceed $2,500,000, and an economy of one-third would represent a saving of more than $800,000; which, when added to an estimated reduction of $300,000 in the Interior, offers a total retrenchment that may, to keep well within bounds, be confidently stated at one million dollars per annum at the least.

In order to effect this saving, it will be necessary to reorganize the departments, and Mr. Dawes has himself declared that this step is very necessary, though he cannot interfere in it, as it seems. But the essential reform must be to exclude incompetent clerks. We are not now preaching Civil Service reform nor the virtue of competitive examinations. No competitive examination is needed in order to decide whether a clerk is competent or not. Nor do we propose interferences with political removals or appointments. These may still continue to be as meanly political as Mr. Boutwell's heart could wish, provided only that the highest standard of efficiency be maintained. In this case, two good clerks will be fully able to do the work of four bad ones much better than it is now done; and, by a reorganization of bureaus, the work itself may be simplified so as to lighten its burden.

This reform was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior at the meeting of Congress. The facts do not rest on our authority, but are matter of common notoriety. Mr. Dawes knows they are literally and exactly true. There is not an old chief of bureau in the Treasury but will admit their accuracy. Mr. Boutwell, too, knows they are true, and the President ought to know it, if his acquaintance with his own government is not miraculously superficial. In two departments alone, the country wastes at least one million dollars a year, and yet the President, and the Cabinet, and Congress pretend to the credit of good intentions. Is such treatment of the public perfectly straightforward? If possible, we should like to ask the President himself whether he thinks it thoroughly honest?

It is difficult to understand how one Cabinet officer could have been allowed to make such a statement as that made by the Secretary of the Interior without drawing some comments from the President. If the facts stated were true, and the President believed them, he was surely bound to urge this economy upon Mr. Dawes and upon Congress. If they were untrue, they placed the other members of the Administration in a very unfair position. Mr. Boutwell especially, being in charge of the most costly department, was implicated to the extent of nearly a million dollars, yet he made no such recommendation as was made by his colleague in the Cabinet. Surely he might have told the public whether he coincided in the proposal or not. Yet no allusion to the subject can be found in his report, unless it be contained in his proposition to raise salaries. Nor has Congress taken the smallest notice of the matter. With the exception of General Garfield and perhaps one other, neither Democrat nor Republican has thought fit to make a single comment upon an extravagance which costs the public a million dollars a year in two departments alone.

The reason for this suspicious silence is probably to be found in the fact that Secretary Cox coupled with his remarks a recommendation of Civil Service reform, and on this point the Secretary of the Treasury is understood to hold opposite opinions, while Congress is blind to every motion which points to this end. But it does not appear that the principles of Mr. Jenckes's bill are necessarily involved in this economy. All that is needed is the authority to reorganize the bureaus, and to cut down the number of clerks according to a better system of classification. The Secretary must then be held responsible for maintaining a high standard of efficiency among his subordinates, and for this he already enjoys all the necessary powers. The true difficulty rests in the fact that a proper standard of efficiency would, if rigorously exacted, exclude nearly all the political or personal friends of Congressmen, and cut off their patronage. On this point, members of Congress are as sensitive as the old-fashioned slave-driver on the subject of slavery. Rather than acknowledge their somewhat discreditable love of power, they choose the absurd alternative of persuading themselves that for the work of the departments one clerk is as efficient as another, and that any attempt to raise the standard of efficiency is anti-republican. All the ablest and most sensible members of Congress from the West are, to a greater or less extent, possessed with this notion, which at bottom is pure self-interest. Yet experiments now going on at Washington seem to prove that out of ten political nominations to clerkships, an average of one competent officer is the result; so that under the existing system there must be a proportion of nine incompetents to one thoroughly efficient clerk. It is this standard which Congress proposes to maintain, while in the same breath the Republican majority and Democratic minority claim the credit of honest intentions.

We do not assume to blame the Administration for not making this reform out of hand. We do not even undertake to question Mr. Dawes's honesty for neglecting to take up Secretary Cox's challenge. But in the face of President Grant's and Mr. Boutwell's professions of honesty and economy, and of Mr. Dawes's preaching his economical crusade, it becomes a matter of interest to know why the reorganization of the departments has not been made a point of official policy. If the facts we have stated are true, what excuse has the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or Mr. Dawes, for neglecting to require that the reform should be carried out? If the Government were earnest about it, there would be less difficulty in attaining success than the Postmaster-General found in regard to the franking privilege. But if it be asked whether Mr. Dawes's earnestness and the President's honesty in regard to economical reform are absolute or only conditional, we must leave to them the responsibility of supplying an answer.

THE SENATE AND THE CHIEF-JUSTICE.

Nothing has of late occurred to show more clearly the moral disorganization of our day than the talk which is found in the press, and which has by no means been confined to the press alone, in regard to the late legal-tender decision of the Supreme Court. The very suggestion of obtaining a new decision by the means proposed, was an outrage on all the national ideas of respect for law, and the outrage was the greater because there seems to have been no popular uneasiness to justify or excuse it. A few politicians and moneyed corporations alone have made all the noise that has been heard. It is true that a part of the legal profession—certain members of the bench and bar who had strongly committed themselves to the principle of legal tender during the war—were angry with Chief-Justice Chase for overruling their opinion, for which, if it was mistaken at all, he was himself principally responsible; but the bar does not conspire against the bench. This is the work of politicians. The scheme of reversing the decision was a political intrigue, based on the well-known fancy of the Senate for grasping at power, and on the notorious dislike of senators for the Chief-Justice. So far as the public is concerned, there has not been a breath of popular discontent to justify any political movement; and yet grave men have doubted the result; senators have freely expressed their opinion that the decision would be reversed; Congressmen have furiously denounced it as rivalling the Dred Scott decision in bad pre-eminence; and, worst of all, it has been assumed, as a matter of course, that Justices Miller, Swayne, and Davis would consent to join in this conspiracy to degrade their own dignity.

All this is probably empty talk; but, if the Republican senators and leaders are wise, they will put a stop to the discussion at once. Nothing can be more discreditable to them than to encourage clamor of this kind. If any of them gravely entertain the idea of pressing the intrigue to a result, they had better not confess it. There are many reasons why this issue is a very unfavorable one for the Senate to choose as the basis of its assault on the Chief-Justice or on the Supreme Court. The decision in the case of Hepburn agt. Griswold has a very narrow scope, so far as the principle of legal tender is concerned. It avoids with great skill any interference with the constitutional power of Congress over the general subject of legal tender, and no issue can be made with it by Congress on that score. All that the Court has ruled is that the legal-tender clause of the Act of 25th February, 1862, as applied to contracts previously existing, was not essential to carry out the constitutional powers of Congress; or, in other words, that private rights should be interfered with by Congress only so far as is necessary; and in this case the interference was not necessary so far as previous contracts were concerned, and was prohibited by the Constitution. As matter of fact, no one doubts that this decision is perfectly true. Neither Mr. Justice Miller, nor the Senate, nor any one else, has ventured to maintain that the legal tender might not without trouble have been made to affect only future contracts. That the objects of the law would have been as well or better reached had its ex post facto operation been excluded, is a truth almost self-evident, and until it is questioned, we shall not argue upon it, more especially as its truth or error is not a point on which the dissenters rest. The truth of the Chief-Justice's opinion, as matter of fact, may be freely conceded without affecting the legal issue, and though both opinions argue the general question of necessity, and, on that score, are equally open to criticism, the only solid objection to the Chief-Justice is based on the ground, not that his facts are untrue, but that, whether true or false, it is for Congress and not for the Court to determine, in case an exigency exists, what degree of necessity justifies interference with private rights. It is not insisted that the Court has decided wrongly as to the facts, but only that it had no right to decide at all.

But if the decision were overruled, the result, so far as legal tender is concerned, must be to establish the principle that not only the Chief-Justice's law but his facts are incorrect, and consequently the Court will be compelled to affirm, what every one knows to be false, that the application of legal tender to past contracts was essential to the preservation of the country. It matters little whether Congress or the Court is responsible for this result. It is enough that because Congress originally made a mistake which cannot be defended in reason, the Supreme Court must be compelled to make that mistake law, and decide against truth and equity. We all know that the Legal-Tender Act did not depend for its efficacy on its retroactive application, but the Court must assert that it did, and must reverse the Chief-Justice's judgment given on the opposite understanding.

Of all countries in the world, America is the last where law can be safely divorced from common sense, and where politicians can with safety intrigue to bring about such a result. The law and the public good are far more deeply interested in obtaining justice than in asserting the infallibility of Congress—a dogma that has never been fanatically held by the American public. In the present instance, the attempt to perpetuate as law the mistakes of Congress, may have results much more mischievous than the mistakes themselves—results which may be particularly embarrassing to the very persons who are trying to bring them about. One of these is suggested in a problem commonly known at Washington as "General Garfield's Conundrum," because General Garfield is said to have proposed it in conversation to Mr. Justice Miller. It runs much as follows:

The opinion of the Court carefully avoids the general question of constitutionality. It is confined to contracts made prior to February 25, 1862. The dissenting opinion, on the contrary, covers the whole subject. It rules that if the law was in any sense essential, the degree of necessity was for Congress to determine. It affirms that a necessity did exist; that this necessity was one of war; and that the legal-tender clause was necessary to meet it—the degree of necessity being determined by Congress, and the decision of Congress being final. Now it happens that only a few months since, in the case of the United States agt. Anderson, the Supreme Court, Justice Miller and all, unanimously ruled that Congress has by its own legislation fixed the 20th August, 1866, as the close of the war, and the Court went on to say that "there is no reason why this declaration should not be received as settling the question wherever private rights are affected by it." The exigency, therefore, which was the authority of Congress for interfering with private rights in the matter of legal tender as in other matters, was declared by Congress itself, and affirmed by the entire Court, to have terminated on the 20th August, 1866. What, then, asked Gen. Garfield, is the authority which upholds legal tenders since August 20, 1866?

We leave this puzzle for law periodicals to discuss, since our own point of view is rather political than legal, but at the same time we cannot but think that the dissenting opinion of the Court, if established in place of the Chief-Justice's decision, would open the door to some very hazardous results. Either to maintain that the exigency was not one of war, or to assume a subsequent exigency by implication, is equally dangerous, and both lead to the most violent straining of common sense. Supposing the Court were to choose the latter alternative, and were to rule that a necessity not that of war must be assumed, from the fact that Congress acted as though it assumed it! To infer that an exigency exists on the ground that there is nothing to prove that it existed, is very questionable logic, whatever its merit may be as law, and in this case it is all the more questionable, for the very reason that no necessity or exigency did in fact exist, nor has any one ever pretended that it existed, while the dictates of good sense assure us that the validity of legal tender ought in reality to have ended with the war. The constitutional principle thus established would be still more extraordinary. It is, that although an extreme exigency involving the nation's life, and testified by peculiarly solemn legislation, would alone justify a temporary interference with private rights in the first place, yet subsequently the permanent suppression of these same rights may be effected by implying a declaration, never once suggested, of an exigency that is wholly imaginary.

We repeat that senators had better reflect long before attempting to overthrow the Chief-Justice's decision. The ground they will be driven to take is neither solid nor well chosen. If successful, they will find themselves in a still more hazardous position, and, as they well know, the Chief-Justice is more dangerous to them as a politician than he is as a lawyer.

Correspondence.

THE VEXED QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I beg the favor of a space in your columns for a few thoughts on the much-vexed Woman Question. For the usurpations of "tyrant man," as the phrase goes, I have nothing to say, either in the way of defence or apology. The evidence is strong against him, and it must be owned that his condemnation is in the main just. But there is one count in the indictment which does not seem to be entirely well founded, and it is made the basis of charges which as yet have not been distinctly proved. It is that of woman's not being allowed to vote. For this man is held responsible; and he is charged with being actuated in the fact either by selfishness in some one or other of its diversified forms, or by ignorance and prejudice.

Now, it is believed by well-informed people that there is almost, if not quite, as much opposition to woman's voting among women as there is among men. It is true that men make the laws, and that as yet they have made none allowing woman to vote; but it is equally true that woman can have laws made, and that thus far she has asked for none investing her with that power. Not an instance is known in the country's history in which women, duly authorized to speak for their sex, have asked for legislation and been denied; and it is not doubted that, whenever the women of any State, or of the United States, shall demand the suffrage, they will get it. It is not clear, then, that men, as men, are responsible for the exclusion of women from the polls. But, admitting that they are, it remains to be shown that they are governed in the fact by unworthy causes. It is well known that many people, justly regarded as among the most disinterested and enlightened of their kind, agree in the opinion that, as things now stand in this country, the women ought not to vote. This, of course, does not prove the impropriety of woman's voting, nor is it quoted for that purpose; but it does show presumptively that the proposition is embarrassed with very grave difficulties, and that there may possibly be some objections to it which have their foundation in reason and justice.

Let us approach the question, then, in the spirit suggested by these considerations. And that we may the better appreciate the embarrassments which it is alleged surround it, let us put ourselves for a moment into sympathy with the objector. He says—and he appears to be honest—that he sincerely desires to know the truth and obey its teachings; that he needs no argument to prove that woman's sphere should be enlarged to the full width of that of man; nor evidence to show that Government should have the benefit of all the elevating influences at its command. He holds as cardinal principles that the sexes should stand on a level before the law; that woman is clearly entitled to an equal share with man in all the benefits of government; and that no law is just which assigns to her a different place from man, except it be on the ground of proven fitness and with her consent. Still, as the case now stands, it is not clear to him that women should vote. But he does not feel at liberty to take the ground of positive opposition, partly—perhaps mainly—because he does not choose to put himself in a false position toward a movement with which on other points he is in sympathy; and partly because he is not absolutely sure of himself. There may be some lurking prejudice in his own breast of which he is not conscious, or some hidden fallacy in his reasoning which has as yet escaped detection. So he holds the matter in abeyance, and looks on and reads. In this state of mind he takes up a late number of a woman's rights paper, and notes the arguments which are relied upon to sustain the demand for suffrage. They are based on the doctrine of "equality." The sexes are equal; their rights are equal; their privileges should be equal; therefore, women should vote; "otherwise they cannot be equal with men." For "equality with men" is emphasized and reiterated as the object and end of the movement.

He is not convinced. On the contrary, new difficulties are suggested to his mind, of which more anon. He takes up the next paper that comes to his hand, which happens to be a "Radical" political journal, containing a plea for woman's suffrage by a distinguished male advocate of the cause. It is a lecture on the subject delivered by Henry Ward Beecher before a Mercantile Library Company. He reads:

"I urge the suffrage for woman," says Mr. Beecher, "on the ground that it is the natural right of woman to vote. . . I would give the suffrage to every intelligent living creature in this country. 'To every one?' Yes, to every one." (After illustrating and enforcing this position, the lecturer passes from the argument of right to that of expediency and says:) "Where you bring the face of woman you bring decency to man. . . . . The very thing we want is to bring into our politics some elevating influences. Do you believe that if women had the right to vote you ever could put up such men as are put up for office? In New York we send to Congress all the men that are foreordained to eternal damnation. The very reason why politics are so base and so bad is that woman is not at the polls; but the moment she comes there, that very moment she brings to politics self-respect in men and a desire to be thought well of by those whom they esteem the models of purity."

Now, how can any thoughtful sceptic on the question of woman's voting be expected to surrender his doubts to arguments such as these? Surely, when Mr. Beecher was talking in this strain about women's influence in politics, he was thinking only of the ladies before him, and regarding them unconsciously as the representatives of the whole sisterhood. But would this be the sort of women, if the change proposed were made, who would attend the ward meetings, shape the primary elections, give character to the general nominations, and be the controlling power around the polls on the day of voting? Where all this time would be the women of the Five Points, the street patrollers of Broadway and Washington Square, the "48,000" strong who figure in the statistics which are now engaging the attention of wise and good women in England? And where the other thousands—native and foreign—who constitute the next, and the next stratum above the grade here designated? As it is now, it is politicians of the lowest type who rule at the primary meetings, and "lewd fellows of the baser sort" who are surest to be on hand on election day. The virtuous and refined, as a rule, cannot be induced to attend a ward meeting, and it is only under the pressure of a special exigency that they can be got out in full force even at a general election. Will it be different with women? If it will, then is woman made of different stuff from man, and the argument in favor of her voting should be, not that she is equal to man, but that she is his superior.

If the Hon. John Morrissey should happen to read this argument of Mr. Beecher, and should be impressed with the belief that the women of his district would soon have the ballot, and if, in consequence, he should begin to have fears for his continuance in office, would not those fears arise from the probability that some other bully, perhaps of a lower grade, might prove a greater favorite of his constituents? Would George Francis Train, who stumped the States two years ago, in the double capacity of advocate for woman and candidate for the Presidency, be much of an improvement on the "foreordained" aforesaid? The stress which Mr. Beecher lays upon the need of "purity"—of "elevating influences" in our politics, is none too emphatic. Undoubtedly this is the prime and supreme need of the country at this moment; and if the admission of women to the suffrage will supply this need, in the name of heaven let them be admitted, and that without delay. Don't let us stop to haggle about "natural rights" and "equality of privilege." Rights natural or rights conventional —equality or inequality, let us have at once the grand panacea. Let her vote—"vote early and vote often," if that be the way in which the evils which now curse American politics are to be cured.

But is it the way? Let us come down from the realms of imagination and look at facts. The chief drawback upon the happiness of the American people at this moment, in view of emancipation and reconstruction, is the enormous amount of ignorance and incompetence we have taken into our body politic. Not that what has been done is to be regretted. The giving of the suffrage to the freedman was inevitable. It was a matter in which we had no option. Whatever force there may have been in the argument from justice, the overruling plea was necessity. These ignorant black men had to be armed with the ballot to protect their liberty and preserve themselves from personal violence. And having given to them the suffrage, the longer refusal of it to their brethren in the North, few comparatively in number and higher in grade, was a simple impossibility. But it is not to be disguised that our ship of state has taken on a very heavy load. She is freighted to the water's edge, and her timbers creak. That some timid souls on board should quake with fear is hardly to be wondered at; but those who know her strength of keel and the stuff of which she is made have no doubt of her ability to weather the gale, and float safely into smooth waters.

Just at this moment, however, we are hailed with a demand that we shall take on board more than double as much ignorance and unfitness as that which is now putting to the test the ship's capacity. That is to say, we are asked to admit to full political rights the women of the North, black and white, native and foreign, and the women of the South, black and white, native and foreign, just the same as we do the men; and a "Sixteenth Amendment" to the Constitution, as a means of securing this result, is proposed to Congress—Mr. Julian, of Indiana, having the honor of being the first to introduce it. Having, under the pressure of necessity, lowered the tone of American citizenship by admitting 400,000 ignorant voters at the South, we are now asked further to debase it by the admission of 400,000 more of the same class, still more ignorant, and millions besides all over the country, nearly the whole of whom are inexperienced in affairs, and a very large number of whom are at least as grossly ignorant as the men of the same grade who already burden us.*

It is a settled principle in political science that the people of a government are happy, prosperous, and amenable to law, or otherwise, in proportion to their intelligence. "By a natural law," says Horace Mann, "like that which regulates the fluids, elector and elected tend to the same level." De Tocqueville ascribed the success of democracy in America in a large measure to the people's intelligence. When he headed one of his chapters, "The Danger of American Republics the Omnipotence of the Majority," his hope was in the then all-pervading intelligence of American electors. Thomas Jefferson took comfort from the same hope when he said his "principal solicitude had for its object legislative tyranny clothed with power by electoral majorities." This was at a period when the average understanding of public affairs on the part of electors was very much above that which it is now.

John Stuart Mill, whose name is much used by advocates of the American woman's movement, says (see "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform," page 29): "The greatest amount of education which can be fairly regarded as within the reach of every one should be exacted as a peremptory condition from all claimants of the franchise. . . . There is surely no reason why every one who applies to be registered as an elector should not be required to copy a sentence of English in the presence of the registering officer, and to perform a sum in the single rule of three. . . . Reading, writing, and arithmetic are but a low standard of educational qualification; and yet even this would have probably sufficed to save France from her present degradation. The millions of voters who, in opposition to nearly every educated person in the country, made Louis Napoleon president, were chiefly peasants, who could neither read nor write, and whose knowledge of public men, even by name, was limited to oral tradition."

These are startling sentiments, coming as they do from the very apostles of democracy, on whom we have been all along relying for justification in our bold procedures. The lesson I would have them teach is not repentance for the past, but carefulness for the future. We are, I trust, equal to the task we have undertaken. A body politic like ours, with unmeasured educating forces and training facilities, and boundless natural resources, can take in, and digest, and assimilate an immeasurable amount of raw material. But there are limits to any body's capacity. I do not say that we have reached the condition which should remind us of the camel and the proverbial feather. Our breadth of shoulders doubtless affords us still some margin. But I do say that, with the weight of ignorance and incompetence which is now upon us, to voluntarily double the one and triple the other would be to act like fools and defy the gods.

This is, of course, to speak as one without faith, which is just the case of the man I am trying to represent. The believing power which does not stop at mountains is, happily or unhappily, not his. If it is said that this talk about ignorance does not touch the abstract question of woman's right to vote, nor meet the issue as it is put by the most intelligent advocates, I reply, that is true. But it does touch the concrete question which is every day brought to our own doors, and it does meet the peremptory demand made by certain leaders for immediate practical action—at least, so it seems to the dissenting person for whom I speak, whose difficulties are not upon the abstract doctrine as held by some, but upon the concrete issue which has been made up by others.

With your leave, I shall continue the subject next week. M.

ORANGE, March 18, 1870.

* Dr. Lee, who has prepared statistical tables under direction of the Department of Education, says that "more than six millions in 1860 (or seven millions now) of the American people constitute a bookless class, shut out from direct access to this main source of knowledge, not counting the million and a half children under ten years of age who cannot yet be said to be illiterate, though they are on the high road to it unless something more efficient is promptly done to save them."

MR. PUMPELLY AND HIS DEFENSE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In pursuing the controversy with Mr. Pumpelly upon the relations of foreigners in China with the Chinese, I will not encroach upon your patience by enlarging on the incidents from which he generalizes, though I could easily prove that they were exceptional. I leave to your readers to judge of the justice of such sweeping conclusions upon such slender foundations.

It is as if an European in one of our cities who saw an old woman knocked down by a fast trotting-horse whom his owner could not hold, should write to his friends that such was the common practice in American cities, and draw a touching picture of the decay of civilization and Christian habits in this unhappy land.

I will confine myself to stating that since I wrote my first letter I have received numerous confirmations of my assertions, applying to the period anterior to 1863, from persons who have lived or travelled in China, and that on re-reading Mr. Pumpelly's original statements with his present reiteration, my strongest feeling still is, amazement at such a singular misconception and misrepresentation of communities which, as a whole, are a credit to the nations which they represent.—I remain, sir, your obedient servant, EDWARD CUNNINGHAM.

BOSTON, MASS., March 19, 1870.

CHINESE AND FOREIGNERS IN OLD TIMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor Pumpelly doubtless tells what he thought he saw, but every newspaper reporter and every jury trial will tell you with what different eyes the same event is viewed by different parties. When I read his original stories of the Surprise and the street behavior of foreigners, I was struck with wonder at the change which had come over that community since the days when I resided in the Celestial Empire; and now Mr. Cunningham tells us that his experience of modern China corresponds with my own recollections of what may now be called old times there.

A few illustrations will show you how we used to be educated in China to respect the lives of the Chinese. All old residents there will remember the case of the British gunner. The East India Company, during the N.E. monsoon, usually had a fleet of frigate-built ships, 15 to 20 in number, lying at Whampoa, armed with about 20 heavy guns and 100 to 150 men each. When celebrating some anniversary by firing a salute, one of their gunners observed a small China boat in range, and called his officer's attention to it, but was ordered to "fire." Immediately the Chinese, under their practice of demanding "a life for a life," called for the gunner's being given up to be tried for homicide, which, under their laws, meant certain condemnation. After much negotiation and delay, the spirit of trade was too strong even for British pride or humanity—the gunner was given up, tried, and executed, and this at a time when the Chinese, having no foreign treaties, were usually dealt with by the English as barbarians and their laws in every possible way set at naught.

The Company's fleet had perfect command of the Canton River, and, with their superior arms and equipments, they could not only have protected their gunner, but could have taken the forts, or perhaps the city itself. Later, a similar, though far less objectionable, surrender was made by the Americans. A sailor on board a little brig, in some petty quarrel, threw a jar at a boat-woman, which knocked her overboard or otherwise killed her. By the Chinese laws his life was forfeited—we had no U. S. ship near—no armed fleet to defend him—no power of resistance; and, assuming the Chinese to be a civilized nation, we had no right to resist giving him up to be tried by their laws; after all possible efforts to save him short of armed resistance, he was given up, tried, and executed.

With such examples before us, it was an axiom with the foreign community to avoid collision with the Chinese, and, if it came, to stand any amount of violence or indignity rather than to take a Chinese life. A story which, whether true or not, is an illustration of the same feeling, was current regarding one of the East India Company's agents: When shooting snipe just before dusk, an unlucky shot killed a costie, working alone in the paddy-field. To leave him there meant stoppage of the trade for two or three months, and either flight or death to the unhappy sportsman; he quietly dug a hole with his hands and gun in the sept rice-field, buried the lonely costie, who in that redundant population was never missed, and only told the story years afterwards when he could safely confess his bad shooting to his select circle.

All old residents in China will confirm my experience of the former position of foreigners, while Mr. Cunningham's evidence shows a similar position in these late years. The readiness of John Bull, and, I am sorry to say, in some instances of Brother Jonathan, to bombard, is no contradiction to this rule. The line is nowhere so strongly drawn as in China between public and private action. The Chinese Government sacrifices human life profusely, yet carefully protects it in private. Foreign governments, or their naval representatives, have done the same; and perhaps it is a natural reaction of the foreign residents from their personal subordination to the Chinese customs that we find them all opposing Mr. Burlingame's policy, and insisting upon having all local outbreaks or invasions of their real or supposed rights dealt with summarily by local foreign consuls, aided by the ever-ready bombshell of the navies.

One word, now, about the Surprise. As in the old story of the chameleon, both Mr. Pumpelly and Mr. Cunningham may be right. In these waters the tide runs like a sluice-way; and I have myself seen a case of collision in the old days when to kill a Chinaman was punishable with death, and when the penalty, too, was, as I have shown, enforced. The Professor might have seen it and, in his innocence of nautical matters, made a case of foreign barbarity out of it. A typhoon was blowing, the passage narrow, the tide strong, when a frail China boat pulled right across our bow. It was a case for the hardest to fend off. We did all we could to clear him, but we had to brush him away or suffer shipwreck; and we did so, happily, without fatal results.

So, too, I have seen a broad-shouldered foreigner flourish his cane in exceptional cases, but he would be brought to his bearings about as soon as he would in Boston; and the bamboo was always hanging over the foreigners rather than the Chinese. A handful of foreigners in the midst of the sturdy millions of China, it could hardly be otherwise in those days, and I cannot believe it is otherwise now, upon the evidence of a passing traveller, who very naturally generalizes every occurrence that is worthy of his note-book.

TAE-PAN.

THE INSIDE OF "A SHELL-HEAP."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having recently examined an artificial "shell-heap," somewhat peculiar in structure, I will give you the results of my observations.

It is situated on "Big Island," in the Tennessee River, about five miles south of the line where the stream enters the State of Alabama. The island lies north and south, is five miles long, and less than a quarter of a mile broad; is crossed east and west by the Nashville and Chattanooga Railway, which touches the western bank of the river near the village of Bridgeport. Shell-heaps may be seen not only on the island but on the opposite alluvial terraces. I counted twelve from one standpoint. They are alike in their general appearance, and are found, upon being measured, to have about the same proportions. The one examined by myself was twenty feet in its longest diameter, raised in a conical shape six feet above the "river bottom." Upon making an excavation eighteen feet in circumference, from the apex to this level, shell deposits were found to extend three feet below it. We came next to a layer of sandy loam two feet in thickness. Beneath this the remains of four human skeletons were discovered, at unequal distances, resting horizonally upon a shell-bed, which had yielded, in some places, to the pressure from above, leaving the bones in a kind of cist. Portions of them were removed tolerably preserved—including half of a skull, a scapula, femur, tibia, sacrum, and entire under jaw, with the teeth in a sound condition. Fragments of pottery composed of red clay and powdered mussel shells were taken out with the bones, and a whole vessel, of the same material, which would hold a pint. The remains bore the marks of fire—were mixed with calcined shells, charcoal, and burnt earth. Below the bed on which the remains were deposited, which was two feet thick, was another layer of earth, sand, and loam, covering fragments of human and animal bones, and resting on a deposit of shells that extended to the natural clay substratum.

The mound was composed chiefly of separated bivalves of the river mussel—unio alatus—mixed with varieties of land and water shells. None of the same species, either in a geological or artificial formation, were found below the surface of the surrounding alluvion. I do not remember to have seen an account of any "shell-heap" so stratified and resting upon a foundation below the soil.

Without taking notice of similar piles in other localities, for controversial comparisons, it may be proper for me to say, after having examined a large number in Alabama and Tennessee, that many of them seem to have been built and not accidentally accumulated—are something more than "kitchen refuse"—Kjökkenmiddings of Northern Europe, or the débris of Indian villages, marking the permanent settlements of a fish-eating population. Such heaps may be found, but they are distinguished from structures. I have found in the last almost every variety of weapons, tools, and utensils, in connection with human remains carefully deposited, that have been discovered in those ancient earth-works called tumuli. In the great "shell-mound," which originally covered an area of more than an acre, which gives its name to a village on the left bank of the Tennessee, near the celebrated cave of Nickijack, in the progress of railway excavations startling developments were made of more than a hundred human skeletons, with all their sepulchral possessions, such as stone axes, hatchets, chisels, spear-heads, arrow-points, knives, pipes, shell beads and rings, bone spoons and needles, disks, pestles, bowls, vases, copper bracelets, and the inevitable stone or earthen pot that attends the burial remnants of prehistoric humanity. Many of these relics have been preserved. Many more have been "lost by being found." To ascribe shell-works with their contents to the handicraft of the Indian tribes of the Columbian era, seems to overrate their knowledge of the arts, and confound the signs of the very remote origin of these mounds with the deposits of a recent period. Besides, I can see no reason why these savages of the Mushogee or Cherokee species, who hated labor as they did an enemy—were too lazy to enclose a "corn patch" or remove a nuisance—should have been so particular about the disposal of their clam-shells as to pile the kitchen-heaps of many generations of their race in the form of a circular tower of observation, or "look-out," fifty feet high (such a structure may now be seen, having sloping sides, and a graded pathway to its truncated summit); or why those shells, after being accidentally thrown down, should have assumed hay-cock shapes, in groups of four or eight, or in a straight line with the margin of a river, equidistant from each other, and resting upon foundations unlike the surface soil; or how scattered bones and fragmentary implements could take form and order underground, in a human frame carefully laid under cedar bark, a hatchet in its skeleton hand, a sculptured pipe, arrow-points, and beads made of the column of a large sea-shell, the pyrula, by its side, a copper disk upon its sunken ribs, and at its head a vessel of fine clay delicately wrought, containing food supposed to be necessary to sustain the departed warrior on his journey to the spirit-land of his fathers.

VIATOR.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. LEONARD & CO., 50 Bromfield Street, Boston, announce that, on account of Fast Day, they are obliged to postpone the sale of the Stevens collection one week—that is, to Tuesday, April 12, and the three days following.——Photographs of the scenery along the line of the Central Pacific Railroad are, we presume, more abundant than those of the country through which the Union Pacific passes; at least, so far as our experience has gone, they are. Undoubtedly, too, the former road offers grander views than the latter; but Prof. F. V. Hayden, who occupies the chair of geology and mineralogy in the University of Pennsylvania, and who has been exploring the Territories for several years, says, in a circular just issued from Washington, that he has often desired that "the remarkable mountain scenery of Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah might be brought to the notice of the lovers of the picturesque in nature," through the agency of photography. The construction of the Union Pacific "led to the production of a fine series of photographs by Mr. A. J. Russell," with whom Prof. Hayden now means to co-operate in preparing a volume of these views from Cheyenne to Salt Lake City. There will be thirty in all, "selected with great care from a large number of negatives, and, in most cases, the preference has been given to those which are characteristic of the geology and geography of that interesting region." Text to the extent of one hundred and fifty pages, "written in popular style," will accompany the pictures, and describe each minutely, and, in more general terms, the geology and resources of the country from Omaha to Salt Lake Valley. "Sun-Pictures of Rocky Mountain Scenery" is the title selected for the volume, which will be a "good-sized quarto," and equal in all parts of its manufacture "to any work of the kind ever published in America." The number of copies will be limited, and sold only to subscribers, at $25 per copy, payable on delivery. Those who wish to subscribe may send their addresses to Mr. Julius Bien, lithographer, at 16 Park Place, in this city, who can already furnish a partial list of the proposed views. "Sun-Pictures" will form a natural companion to the "Yosemite Guide-Book" of Prof. Whitney.——Capt. Raphael Semmes is to write the "Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter," and has procured Mr. Carleton for his publisher.——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger announce "The Memoirs of Fifty Years," by W. H. Sparks, the fruit of a long Western experience, and to contain many biographical notices and anecdotes of more or less distinguished Americans.——"Insanity in Women," by Prof. H. R. Storer, M.D.; "Alaska and its Resources," by Mr. W. H. Dall, late of the Russian Telegraph Expedition—a book that will be illustrated with nearly 100 wood-cuts from drawings by the author, and an entirely new map of the Territory; and "Williams College Biographical Annals," by Rev. Calvin Durfee, with an introduction by Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D., are the principal announcements of Messrs. Lee & Shepard.

—We hear of one American who says that, having made money enough, he intends to spend some of it, not in fast horses, as some do; nor in building; nor in running for Congress; nor in travelling—but in publishing a magazine which shall be remarkable among magazines for its typographical beauty, if not for the literary excellence of its contents. This is ambition of a sort which does not influence very many of our American rich men. They are as ready as the wealthy of any other country, perhaps readier, to spend their riches for the promotion of moral reforms, or for patriotic purposes, or ostentatiously, and for material comfort; but the expenditure by one person of much money in the gratification of refined tastes has not hitherto been common in the United States, and the intelligent expenditure of large sums in this way has been uncommon. Book-collecting has had more or less of the attention of our men of means; but much of our book-collecting is done lavishly rather than sensibly, and too often our American book-buyers purchase not with a purpose, but whimsically, and buy libraries to show, and not books to be read or selected so as to be useful to the student. Such seems to have been the way in which was got together the Rice collection, which has been sold this week by Messrs. Bangs, Merwin & Co. It was the property of a citizen of Chicago, and would have been described by the late Artemus Ward as "mucilaginous." All kinds of books were in it—many of them not only expensive but rare, and some, Mr. Sabin says, unique—but it contained, so to speak, only individual books, and had nothing approaching a completed department. We ought hardly to be so sweeping as to say that there was nothing in it which was at all like a completed department; for, three or four years ago, Mr. Rice, the owner, took fourteen thousand dollars and bought in a lump a collection of Americana, formed by Mr. J. F. McCoy, of this city—a collection which, Mr. Sabin thinks, is as good for its size as any within his knowledge, and Mr. Sabin's knowledge is well known by book-buyers to be very extensive and accurate. Still, in general, it must be evident to any one who has looked over the catalogue which Mr. Sabin has prepared—and prepared with the unusual care that was to have been expected of him—that the library was bought as merchandise rather than as anything else. Money was not spared, however, and there were to be found in the catalogue, amid a vast number which were not tempting, a good many tempting "lots."

—A tiny publication of eight pages, called the Phonographic Record, issued quarterly, has made its appearance here, and tells of what has been accomplished in its first year by the American Phonographic Society. The members seem to be from among the followers of Mr. Munson, as distinguished from the school of Mr. Graham, and Mr. Lindsley and his Tachygraphy are condemned on grounds which we are not qualified to dispute. The society aims to introduce a uniform system of writing phonography, and to organize a system of instruction capable of enabling any one to master the principles of the art and to practise it. We wish it success. Mr. Munson, who already publishes the Phonographic Advocate at 117 Nassau street, announces the revival of another monthly, the Phonographic Magazine, to be printed entirely in phonographic characters. The mechanical obstacles to such a publication are quite serious, but we understand they have been tolerably met by a new process of reproduction.

—The legal arguments in the late School-Bible case before the Superior Court of Cincinnati, with the opinions and decision of the Court, have been published in elegant style by Messrs. R. W. Clarke & Co., of that city, and the volume deserves to be studied by those who desire to prepare themselves for an issue which will sooner or later become general in all the States. The Christian World for February, published at the Bible House in this city, is devoted entirely to "a carefully digested summary of the views and reasonings of all parties to the controversy." A similar digest is in preparation and will be published shortly, by Messrs. J. W. Schermerhorn & Co., as Vols. V. and VI. of their pocket "Library of Education;" so that on the whole the average voter will have only himself to blame if not in possession of all the material facts and opinions for forming a judgment. The constitutional ground of debate in Cincinnati was the seventh section of the Bill of Rights, which reads as follows:

> "Religion, morality, and knowledge, however, being essential to good government, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of worship, and to encourage schools and the means of instruction."

The natural interpretation of this clause would be to distribute "protection of religious worship" and "encouragement of schools" between "religion and morality," and "knowledge," respectively. The advocates of retaining the Bible, however, took an opposite view, and held that it was designed to maintain schools in the interest of religion as well as of pure knowledge. Even as thus stated, there is infinite room for debate as to what constitutes religion, and how religion is to be got and taught. But since the inseparability of religion and the "means of instruction" is insisted on, we may as well accept it as an argument why public libraries should be opened on Sunday as regularly and as naturally as churches. If the two do not conflict on week-days—if the library is not per se and always adverse to religion—if, on the contrary, it is a recognized aid to every form of theological belief that does not rest on ignorance, then assuredly there is no argument for Sunday closing that will bear examination. The Massachusetts House of Representatives has adopted this opinion by substituting for an unfavorable report of committee a bill authorizing the opening of public libraries on Sunday, and so far modifying the strictness of the statutes relating to the observance of the day. This action we have long expected with confidence; and it matters little, for the final result, that the Senate has disagreed with the House.

—The learned Diedrich Knickerbocker (a correspondent writes us), in his authentic history of New York, relates that Wandle Schoonhoven and Barent Bleecker, having had a dispute about the settlement of a book-account, brought their case before Mynher Wouter Van Twiller, the first Dutch Governor of the province. Having listened attentively to the statements, and carefully examined the books of both parties, "the sage Wouter, laying his finger beside his nose, and shutting his eyes for a moment, with the air of a man who has just caught a subtile idea by the tail, slowly took his pipe from his mouth, puffed forth a column of tobacco-smoke, and with marvellous gravity and solemnity pronounced—that having carefully counted over the leaves and weighed the books, it was the final opinion of the court that Wandle should give Barent a receipt, and Barent should give Wandle a receipt, and the constable should pay the costs." The historian adds that "the happiest effect of this most sage and righteous judgment, well worthy the attention of modern magistrates, was that the office of constable fell into such decay, that there was not one of these losel scouts known in the province for many years." The Solons of the Committee of Ways (weighs) and Means have not been unmindful of the decision of the worthy Dutch Governor. They have patiently listened to the statements of publishers, and have reported a bill to the House, in which it is solemnly decreed that the books shall be weighed and the readers shall pay the costs. And they no doubt expect that its happiest effect will be that not one of those "losel scouts" called students shall be known in the country for years.

—Doubtless the Pacific Railroad is some day going to do for us as much as a year ago we were all expecting—whether or not it is going to do all the things, and the very things, which many of us were a year ago predicting that it would. But certainly, so far, it has not shown that promptness we were hoping for in bringing us our Overland Monthly. All the blame, then, is not ours that in talking from month to month about the magazines, we have often omitted mention of the Overland. Among its other estimable qualities it has the habit of appearing at the time when it says it does, and the March number is not out till March. Our other magazines offer themselves to the public twenty days, or fifteen days, or a week, before the month of their date—as if our patriotic publishers intended that at least the final number of the American periodical should contain not mere current literature but that literature for eternity which every true American desires to see produced on the soil of this continent. The Day of Judgment can nohow come so late that it won't find Putnam's, and the Atlantic, and Old and New, and Lippincott's, and the Catholic World some fortnight or so ahead of it. It is, however, of little consequence that the Overland fails to get so many "notices" as most of its rivals. It is a magazine which so well deserves praise as to be very well able to dispense with it; and we speak of it now not out of contrition, nor at the demand of justice, but only to express the pleasure we have just been feeling in reading the number before us. The pleasure which we have just been feeling, we say; for we are not so sure about its being a pleasure that will endure; a pleasure that ought to be had, and can be had again; a pleasure that a writer may justly seek to give; a pleasure reconcilable with happiness. We have in mind particularly Mr. Bret Harte's story called "Brown of Calaveras." It is very striking for its freshness of incident, and for the vividness with which it sets its personages before us, and for the skilfulness with which it is told, and for its power over the feelings. But should we—do we—approve of it? For our own part, we find that we do not; and we think that we ought not. Habitually, Mr. Harte takes for his materials a woman who has lost her virtue, or a man who is in most respects rascally, and balances the grain of good still left in the character against its general worthlessness. To be sure, it is true that no good man or woman is all good; and true, too, that there is no man or woman so bad as to be utterly destitute of some sort of goodness. But are not these truths only too likely to secure too easily too much of our attention? Are they so occult and so little regarded that there is need of a captivating writer to urge them upon us? They are truths in human nature which are of a kind peculiarly to attract a writer; but we doubt if the writer is not wise who leaves them alone—or at least we doubt if in the long run writers will not find that it is easy to make them more prominent than is good for lasting fame, which always is seen in the end to be based upon truth to what is best in human nature. Of the other things in this month's Overland, perhaps the most noticeable is a piece of verse called "Chiquita," which also we take to be Mr. Harte's. It is in hexameters which would please Dr. John Neale—hexameters which show how perfectly natural the hexameter is in English speech, whether or not people think it can be naturalized in English prosody. We quote a few verses, premising that Chiquita is a mare, and that the speaker is her owner:

> "Morgan? She ain't nothin' else, and I've got the papers to prove it.
> Sired by Chippewa Chief, and twelve hundred dollars won't buy her.
> Briggs of Tuolumne owned her. Did you know Briggs of Tuolumne?
> Busted hisself in White Pine, and blew out his brains down in Frisco.
>
> "Hed n't no savey—hed Briggs. Thar, Jack! that 'll do—quit that foolin'!
> Nothin' to what she kin do, when she's got her work cut out before her.
> Hosses is hosses, you know, and likewise, too, jockeys is jockeys,
> And 'tain't every man as can ride as knows what a hoss has got in him.
>
> "Know the old ford on the fork, that nearly got Flannigan's leaders?
> Nasty in daylight, you bet; and a mighty rough ford in low water.
> Well, it ain't six ago since me, and the Jedge, and his nevey,
> Struck for that ford in the night, in the rain, and the water all round us.
>
> "Up to our flanks in the gulch, and Rattlesnake Creek jest a bilin',
> Not a plank left in the dam, and nary a bridge on the river.
> I had the gray, and the Jedge had his roan, and his nevey Chiquita;
> And after us trundled the rocks jest loosed from the top of the cañon."

The last is the only verse of this clever poem in which one is compelled to see that there have been at work in the making of it two people—the horse-dealer, or stage-driver, and the poet. Or perhaps stage-drivers, also, as well as poets, say,

> "And after us trundled the rocks jest loosed from the top of the cañon."

Perhaps the stage-driver of American real life, like the rest of his fellow-citizens, scorns to talk always in character. Perhaps Mr. Harte may, as a matter of fact, have reproduced in all particulars and with exactness Chiquita's owner. Still, if we drag him into the domain of art, even the American hack-driver we can reduce to subserviency; and if we do drag him there, we are bound so to reduce him. For the rest, the Overland for March has some book-notices which, as usual, are pleasant reading, though it may be doubted if they are so good as criticisms; a story entitled "Romance of a Trunk," which may not be very much, but which, nevertheless, is very nice, and will increase the sum of human happiness; a description by an officer's wife of camp life in Arizona; something about the Sandwich Islands; something about Lower California; something about Guatemala; something about British Columbia; some pretty verses called "Not Yet;" and two or three other articles of which none is not readable. We are at all times, when articulate speech, of whatsoever kind, uttered in California either by word of mouth or by published print, is our theme of discourse—we are to be understood as making mental reservations in favor of the humor of the San Francisco News Letter; but we desire to give it out as our opinion, that, all things considered, the Overland Monthly can hardly be said to have a superior among American magazines. So far, it has at least been a perfectly honest magazine, and has done no puffing, has had no padding, has made no pretense, and has escaped the deadly sin of dulness. This, if it is negative praise, is still, comparatively speaking, very high praise. By way of positive praise, we may say that the Overland has had the best short stories ever published in any American magazine; that its book-notices contain nearly as agreeable writing as the Atlantic's department of book-notices; and that it is sure to have papers concerning the Pacific coast, the Plains, or the islands of the Pacific, which are almost always fresh and interesting by reason of their subjects, and often are exceedingly well done.

—Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull is reputed to be the only person in the United States who can interpret Eliot's Indian Bible. Those who can appreciate such a distinction, and the labor necessary to attain it, will feel under peculiar obligations to him for his latest contribution to the study of the Indian tongues. He has reprinted from the second volume of the Connecticut Historical Society's Collections his paper on "The Composition of Indian Geographical names, illustrated from the Algonkin Languages." After laying down the rule that "every Indian synthesis, names of persons and places not excepted, must 'preserve the consciousness of its roots,'" and that consequently Indian proper names all have a meaning and a precise one, Mr. Trumbull states the principles which govern the structure of them, and then, in an orderly manner, exhibits the chief suffixes entering into the composition of names of places. For those who have studied the language of the aborigines, the pamphlet will be a guide to the true methods of interpretation; but mere guessers had best beware of it. A large part of Mr. Trumbull's illustrations, drawn from Indian names still preserved, after having suffered more or less of phonetic decay, in our geographical nomenclature, is excellent Old Mortality work, and as trustworthy as anything can be that depends on English orthoepy and orthography of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Of many of the derivations there is no sort of doubt. Whoever prefers the spelling "Alleghany" to "Alleghẽny," can now cite the original welhik-hannê, meaning "the best (or, the fairest) river," -hanne or -han being the suffix for "a rapid stream." What the Delawares called by this name the Senecas in the same sense called the Oue-yo' or O hee' yo, and we the Ohio. That beautiful New Hampshire lake whose name is a trial to every tourist to the White Mountains, is less near the original when spelt "Winnipiseogee" than as pronounced. "It is compounded of winni, nippe, and sauki, 'good-water discharge,' and the name must have belonged originally to the outlet by which the waters of the lake pass to the Merrimack, rather than to the lake itself." "Connecticut" is from Quinni-tuk-ut, "on long river," the last syllable being the locative. "The c in the second syllable of the modern name," says Mr. Trumbull, "has no business there, and it is difficult to find a reason for its intrusion;" so that those who pronounce the c, as some do, are doubly in error, The inseparable ending -kanⁿtti (-quoddy) or (Micmac) -aikadee, to denote place, when affixed to nouns in the indefinite plural, was of so frequent occurrence as probably to have been taken for the general name of the region inhabited by the tribes using it, and to have led the early geographers and voyagers to call this "L'Arcadia," "L'Acadie," and "La Cadie," by which the country is known to this day.

—Compulsory education has become a concern to Philadelphia, and the Board of Controllers of the Public Schools have prepared an act to be presented to the Legislature, providing for the enforced attendance, after January 1 of next year, of all children between eight and fourteen years, at some school, public or private. The proposed exceptions, however, will allow a good deal of latitude—possibly too much to make the rule effective—and in a city which furnishes text-books without cost to its pupils, the clause excusing parents by reason of extreme poverty from sending their children to school seems less necessary than elsewhere, and liable to abuse by those classes which laws of this kind are especially designed to reach. If not famous for the character of its common schools, Philadelphia is better provided than most cities with educational resorts for the working-classes; each section having so-called Institutes, with comfortable reading-rooms and a fair amount of books and teaching. A Night School for Artisans, we notice, has just had its closing exercises in the Central High School building, illustrating the courses in geometry, drawing, chemistry, physics, etc. The registered number of pupils (whose mean age was 23) is given as 522, while the capacity of the school was but 250; but the average attendance did not exceed 200. The term lasted twenty weeks, and instruction was chiefly imparted by lectures, the students taking notes. In Boston, a free Evening High School has been opened, with an attendance of one hundred and twenty-five pupils, ranging from eighteen to forty-five years of age. The end of instruction appears to be commercial rather than mechanical training, though there have been "familiar lectures upon the subjects of architecture, history, mineralogy, parliamentary law, etc.," and "among the pupils are representatives of every class of artisans, the majority, however, being employed in the day-time in stores, as clerks or otherwise;" together with some nine or ten young ladies. The attendance has been nearly eighty-five per cent. A much larger school of the kind exists, we believe, in this city, but the Boston experiment is the first in New England. Public Evening Schools in Providence, by the way, are not, as we lately stated, a result of the efforts of the Rhode Island Educational Union, but have been in operation many years, with a single period of cessation.

—It would be an experience worth having to stand upon the exact spot from which Xenophon and his Ten Thousand first caught sight of the sea, and feel something of the thrill which the shouting of the van infused into the rear of the Greek column, when all the weary train broke into a run, the draught-cattle and the horses as eagerly as the men. But then, we should need to feel very sure—quite as much so as when Mark Twain wept at the tomb of Adam—that we were indeed upon the spot and no other; and we might even demand to be shown the mound which the Greeks raised in the hour of their great rejoicing. Unhappily, as yet, no one has been able to fix upon the "sacred mountain Theches" of the narrative, and from the crossing of the Euphrates (Anab. IV., v. 2) to the arrival at Trapezus, there is no part of the retreat that can be mapped with absolute certainty. The number of writers who have attempted it is not few, but great are the differences between them, and we still lack such scientific knowledge of Upper Armenia as to make it easy to decide to which theory probability inclines. The latest authority on this subject, which will always possess an interest for the lovers of antiquity, is Wilhelm Strecker, a colonel in the Turkish service, who has travelled extensively in Armenia, and contributes to No. 24 of the Zeitschrift für Erdkunde (New York: L. W. Schmidt) a map of that portion of the country traversed in the Anabasis, with an indication of the course pursued by the Greeks, and an article in support of it. His conclusions, however, are firmly combated by the veteran geographer, H. Kiepert, who agrees with him only as to one point, in the middle of the route, and decides for both another beginning and end. Nevertheless, any one who is engaged as a teacher in expounding Xenophon would do well to procure this number of the Zeitschrift, since the general map is no doubt quite correct, and it is instructive to see between what limits the truth may lie. The difficulties of the problem are of course enhanced by the imperfections of Xenophon's itinerary, besides the necessity of making allowances for his estimates of progress on account of the natural obstacles of so mountainous a region.

JARVES'S "ART THOUGHTS."*

Mr. Jarves's book brings up for renewed examination the old questions about critical judgment of the fine arts. The immediate enquiry started by his remarks, and which some of the reviewers of his book have followed, is the enquiry as to whether artists are necessarily the best judges of art, or whether those who approach the subject from a different direction may not get closer to its heart. Mr. Jarves's own position is obviously, and is known of all men to be, that of a collector. The collector's standard of judgment is the historical, so to speak. The most accomplished collector is he who has the quickest eye to pick out and the most unerring judgment to discriminate. The most useful helper to the collector is the expert who can judge infallibly between the work of a master and that of a pupil, between enamel painting of the thirteenth century and that of the fourteenth, between antique engraved gems and Renaissance imitations. This knowledge is the fruit of long and close study. To excel in it requires a natural gift as rare, perhaps, as any. Few are they born to be experts in art; but to be anything in it whatever requires, for born genius and for ordinary mortal alike, many years of devoted application. Moreover, no one can be a first-rate judge of one branch of art, or of the works of one epoch, without having a very sound and well-founded knowledge of the whole field, nor yet without having a tolerably profound sense of what discriminating taste means. There are limitations, and we will not require a Parisian expert to know much about English landscape painting in the sense of having a lively sense of its minute shades of excellence. But to have an intense curiosity always awake, a memory that lets nothing slip, and an indescribable power of distinguishing at first glance the essential from the accidental and temporary characteristics of works of art—to have all this, and to be, what naturally follows, an observer where other men are blind, and a discriminating judge where other men find only confusion, this is essential to the character of the brilliant collector, and of the expert, the less brilliant collector's guide.

Few well-informed persons will disagree with our author in his opinion (pp. 344, 345) that professional painters and sculptors can seldom become judges of art in this sense. "The best judges of objects of art, in general," says Mr. Jarves, "are not found among artists, but among those who stake their money or reputation on them as dealers or connoisseurs. Most artists limit their instruction to a specialty of their epoch. Seldom do they interest themselves in what does not immediately concern their own studies or aims. As a class, they are more indifferent to old art of any kind, and less versed in its history, character, motives, and methods, than are amateurs." It cannot be otherwise; it can never be otherwise. "Most artists" must so limit their instruction, for the simple and sufficient reason that to excel in their art takes their whole time. Painting that is good for anything is the result of constant and unremitted work with the brush, the pencil, the pen, the charcoal, out of doors and indoors, in the life-school and among the casts of "the antique," among the strangeness and novelties of a foreign land, or among the familiar things of home. Daily work and all day long has been that which has made of gifted men great artists, and of less gifted men useful and pleasure-giving artists. If there is one thing noticeable in the lives of those who have become giants in power, and seemingly more than human in their inspired insight into men and things, it is their ceaseless, restless, tireless activity. The autotypes from drawings by the old masters, of which we have spoken with enthusiasm in the Nation, would seem to have to teach us for our first lesson that what one chooses to draw, and how one chooses to draw, is of less importance than how much he draws.

This statement, which is not meant to be an exaggeration, may seem so to those who have a somewhat exclusive taste in matters of fine art. But we are speaking not of choice of subjects for paintings, the result and flower of a working life, but of choice of subjects for study and manner of study. To have the pencil always in the hand has been said to be the surest means of becoming all one's nature permits in the way of executive excellence as an artist. The noblest art of the past is of less importance to a painter of our time than the faces and gestures and men and women, the sports of children, the habits and the shapes of birds and beasts, the forms and colors of things in general. Every moment that a Leech takes from the observation of London street-boys and English hunting-fields, and gives to the study of the sacred art of the Florentines of the fourteenth century, is so much taken away from his peculiar strength. He may take recreation in study of the arts of other times, but after all this will not be as good rest for him as poetry or music. The painter who means to make a glorious name for himself by painting must keep his strength and his freshness for the practice of his art, and must make other things help toward it and rest him from it. He must live to his more noble trade at least as persistently as a broker does to his less noble one, and must go outside of it for his recreation only, but for his recreation it is outside that he must go.

* "Art Thoughts. The Experiences and Observations of an American Amateur in Europe. By James Jackson Jarves, Author of 'Art Hints,' 'The Art Idea,'" etc. New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1869. Pp. ix., 379.

If there is any truth in these views, the world must look to others than to artists for final judgment on art. But, it will be said, surely no one's opinion on a picture is so well worth having as a painter's. Yes; and no. No one's opinion on a painting is worth much unless he can paint; that is perfectly true. When Mr. Hamerton proposes to write about etching, and, as a condition precedent, buys "coppers" and fits up a press, and goes to etching, and printing his etchings, it is to be admitted that he is taking a good way to prepare himself for sound judgment. One's only doubt is as to the length of life and the amount of time practically available, and the most concentrated ways of self-education. What makes Ruskin a judge of art worth listening to, in spite of his uncritical habit of mind, is his enormous knowledge, gained by a life's hard work. When he wants to study Titian, he copies, touch by touch, the best and least injured work of Titian's he can find; or is it Venetian architecture he proposes to study? he makes careful drawings of all the best work in Venice—taking three winters to it. He is one of the most accomplished and most powerful draughtsmen alive, both in monochrome and in color, and more especially in landscape subject; and he has become so in the course of thirty years' studying nature and art, with brush in hand. But it will be seen that he does not consider himself an artist, that he never exhibits, that this executive power has been gained by the way, and to help him to his end. When any man proposes to fit himself for the proper judgment of art, he must learn to produce it, no doubt. As Mr. Jarves well says, a good painter will be an excellent judge of pictures of his own time; probably the best, though to be this he should be a very superior painter, indeed. "Andrea del Sarto could buy for Francis I. the best works of the Florentine school, because he was a competent judge of his contemporaries." Very probably; and no one would have hesitated to accept Mulready's or Dyce's choice of pictures of the English school, or Turner's of landscape painting generally. But (not to speak of the all-accomplished Dyce—that modern Leonardo) any one might have hesitated to accept Mulready's, or even Turner's, selection of works of art other than in their own line. Not that either of these men was incompetent to become a judge. There are no intellectual powers given to men more exalted than the artistic gift in its higher development; and we are of those who look upon Turner as the pre-eminent artistic genius of this century; while Mulready was of the race of Titans, however, one may dispute concerning the exact value of certain of his works. But in order to know, one must learn; and an all-absorbing pursuit, at once mechanical and intellectual, is not the best preparation for a minutely discriminating judgment of a score of other and different, though kindred, arts.

It is not, however, as a critical work that Mr. Jarves's book is to be viewed. The instances are few in which he allows himself to pass judgment upon a work of art. His "Art Thoughts" should rather be regarded as a series of fifteen essays upon subjects connected with the fine arts as they now exist. The view taken in these chapters is that of the studious amateur, desirous to help his countrymen to enjoy the beautiful arts, which they so commonly disregard, but who proposes rather to offer hints for their guidance than to teach them. The standard of judgment may be challenged as being too transcendental and remote. Practitioners of any art are apt to look with suspicion upon discussion of it which goes too far away to look for causes and motives and analogies; and their suspicion is just. This is the danger to which all writers are exposed when treating of arts which they have not practised themselves. Not that there is not a remote cause for every observed peculiarity, and a transcendental side to every meritorious work of art, and subtle analogies between the arts and the men and the literature and the social life of every age; but to see these things aright requires an insight which few men possess. Akin to this is what seems to us an exaggerated admiration for artists of peculiarly unworldly and mystical genius, as notably William Blake. The pages devoted to him and his works are filled with an admiration and reverence, to our mind, greatly exaggerated. Exaggerated in comparative statement they are certainly; as witness the comparison, on page 216, between Blake and Turner. It needs to be said again and again, for it is the tendency of all modern thought to put the fact out of sight, that the formative arts have to do, first, last, and all the time, with the visible. Let it be granted that Blake was wholly a mystic, that he lived an almost purely spiritual life, that his art is one dream of unearthly beauty and unearthly power; let it be granted that nothing in Turner's art shows whether he believed or not, nor in what he believed, if at all. The works of art produced by Turner, taken together, are probably greater than any other body of art whatever that this century has produced. There is the one drawback that many of these pictures are perishable and perishing; there is the fact that his works have not the uniform excellence throughout their united extent which, but for unfortunate education and surroundings, the world would have a right to expect from one of its greatest men; but, after these allowances are made, the conclusion must be that more of that high pleasure which it is the mission of art to give can be got from the works of Turner than from any other mass or group of works of art of our time. As regards the power, imagination, versatility, insight, artistic greatness, in short, which these works would lead us to attribute to their author, there can be little question that, in this regard, Turner ranks with the great of all time—with Titian and Leonardo. Now, to compare Blake, as painter or as imaginative designer, with this colossus, is to seek to establish new canons of criticism; it is to confound mysticism with creative imagination; avoidance of the world and external nature with mastery of them; lovely dreams with matured strength of daylight intelligence.

So far, however, it is only as to degree of approval that we are disposed to question Mr. Jarves's views; so far, it has been delightful to follow and discuss his appreciative criticism. But it is matter of regret that the praise given to Gustave Doré (and not on pages 274 and 275 only, but in many places) should be allowed to remain. We had supposed that Doré was about "given up" by the most enthusiastic of his admirers. That shallow reputation—the reputation of a great artist given to a man who cannot draw the human figure nor the human face, except as a caricature, nor landscape in any form; whose design is the constant repetition of a few not very natural forms of vulgarity; whose greatest and almost sole gift is in the easy and constant reproduction of his own established types—this reputation, non-existent among the artists and critics of art in his own country, it is not necessary to discuss seriously. No designer can produce more rapidly, and no one has so marked a taste for sickening horrors of obscenity and of physical suffering; and perhaps no living artist understands better the knack of producing drawings that shall be clever-looking while really without knowledge or ideas; but these things do not make artists of great importance.

That part of Mr. Jarves's book which, written in the first person, tells of his own experiences as a collector and a student in Europe, is most interesting. The story of the "False Leonardo"—the picture which ingenious knaves had made into a counterfeit presentment of the lost "Saint Catherine" of Francis I.'s gallery—is fully told. It seems that the picture has been, by Mr. Jarves's order, cleaned of all new work and retouching over half its surface, while the other half is left as when it was offered as the lost Leonardo. We are informed that it is Mr. Jarves's intention to bring it to this country, and show everybody by this crucial instance how clever the Parisian fabricators of false pictures have become. Mingled with this are many passages of interesting description of the men and things of Europe, especially of Italy, and the story rises to pathos in the description of the poor women who show pictures in Italian churches. It is one of the most interesting books that the time affords, and we have only to regret that a certain want of arrangement or of sequence keeps one from remembering as much of it as would be well to remember.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN WRITERS ON HORTICULTURE.*

"Spring still brings spring to the mind, though sixty years be told;" and when the ash buds begin to blacken, the dogwood twigs to grow red, and the elm to swell, we fall greedily on any book that discourses well on country life, on flowers and fruits, and delight to walk over imaginary fields, with our farmer by our side, laying out drains, filling hollows, sowing seed, or harvesting crops. The smell of the earth, if we walk or drive in the country, as the snow melts away, the fresh greenness of the evergreen ferns, the delicate color of the lichen-clad rocks and trees, appeal to our senses, and put us in the mood when we return home to read books on roses. We can then either make allowances for superabundant enthusiasm, or supply warmth and style to sentences which reveal more of practical than of literary experience.

With such feelings, and with ready-made enthusiasm, we took up the work named below, feeling assured, from the promise of it, that we should be repaid for the time spent on it. Its author is, as he tells us in the preface, a Church of England rector, who not only originated the first rose show in England, but has taken twenty cups awarded at exhibitions open to all competitors. Certainly here, if anywhere, we should expect to learn the practice as well as the refinements of rose culture; instead of which we have two hundred and sixty-seven pages filled with irrelevant scraps of Latin, Greek, and French, and larded with lean jokes. The real matter, properly expressed and condensed, would make about fifty pages of not very good instruction on the subject. It would be impossible by quotations to do justice to this book, since the wheat is inseparably mixed with the chaff. For example, the author is telling us why roses are so often failures:

* "On Roses. By S. Reynolds Hole, author of 'A Little Tour in Ireland.'" London: Blackwood & Sons.

"Look, too, at those vagabond suckers clustering like Jewish money-lenders, or Christian book-makers, round a young nobleman, and stealing the sap away. Well may that miserable specimen be called a 'Souvenir de Comte Cavour,' for it is dying from depletion, like its illustrious namesake. The earth is set and sodden; no spade nor hoe has been there. As for manure, a feeling of profound melancholy comes over us, as over Mr. Richard Swiveller when he discovered the Marchioness had passed her youthful days in ignorance of the taste of beer. We know that they have never seen it, and yet they are expected to bloom profusely; and when they are covered, not with roses but grubs, the nurseryman, or the gardener, or the soil is blamed. Then there is dole in Astolat, and a wailing cry over dead Adonis. 'Is it not sad that we cannot grow roses? We have spared no trouble, no expense, and we do so dote on them.' The last time I heard a howl of this kind, I felt myself insulted, as a lover of the rose, and of truth; and instead of yelping in concert, as I was expected to do, I snarled surlily. 'I say, old fellow,' remarked to me a friend as we rode together in the Row, and with a tone which, though it pretended a cheery indifference, was fraught with rebuke and anger, 'those rose-trees which you recommended me to get turned out a regular do. Lost a hatful of money—precious near a tenner, if not all out—and, by Jove, sir! our curate at the county flower-show came and licked them all into fits.'"

One would hardly believe, unless he read such stuff, that any sensible man could so abuse his opportunities. The pity is all the greater because there is so much to be said about roses, and because no plant better repays the care and love we lavish on it. English writers on horticulture and agriculture in the monthly magazines indulge very freely in affectations of style which diminish not a little the value of their teachings, and place them in striking contrast with our American contributors to the same kind of literature. In fact, considering the unrivalled force and fitness of the writing in the English reviews and the better class of the untechnical magazines, it is amazing that when English gentlemen or gardeners begin to write on horticulture or agriculture, they should generally affect extreme superiority to their subject, and, as it were, excuse themselves for descending to it by a parade of their learning and humor, and by violating, if not the rules, at least the proprieties of composition, all the while flaunting their own merits in our faces. Thus, there have been a series of articles in the Farmers' Magazine—a very heavy and solid periodical—called "Textless Notes by a Crotchety Farmer," and others called "The New Farm," relating experiences of some general value, but so mixed with frivolous and impertinent matter, that the reader is provoked to throw the magazine aside without looking further for what may be valuable. In the Gardeners' Magazine, a writer goes about England visiting nurseries, and narrating his experience at rustic taverns, telling local anecdotes, praising Lord This or That's gardener, but giving a very meagre account of the practical improvements in horticulture which he sees. In the Cottage Gardener, the Man with a Blue Apron or the Yellow Shoe-string tells his experiences in an ex-cathedrâ tone, and with a lofty assumption that makes us doubt the value of his directions, as it seems impossible that one so well satisfied with himself can be a good teacher. We find in the strictly scientific and professional articles simple, earnest enquiry for truth, but the defects of the voluntary contributions become conspicuous when we take up a book like this on roses.

Compare with it, for example, "The Book of Roses," by Francis Parkman, of Boston, published by Tilton & Co. in 1866. Mr. Parkman does not pretend that he originated "rose shows," nor that he takes the prizes offered, but in clear, good English tells the story of the rose with just enough enthusiasm to kindle a desire in every reader's mind to cultivate the flower, however small his opportunities. His first paragraph says: "It is needless to eulogize the rose;" and, true to his text, he wastes no space in praise, but, showing how to plant, prune, and cultivate, he describes such an agreeable industry, that the reader believes that Mr. Parkman thinks his subject greater than himself, and becomes convinced that no labor would be too great to spend in acquiring the skill and knowledge which the author evidently possesses. For he tells us further how to protect the rose from insects, to ensure fine blossoms, to save seed, to hybridize, to produce new varieties. He describes the classes, families, and species of roses, and makes us understand the actual difference between the Bourbon and Hybrid China, the Noisette and Ayrshire, the Tea and Bengal families, and points out how we may make new varieties, or get the best out of the old ones. So simply and attractively does he write, that even one not interested in acquiring practical knowledge would find the book good reading; and we are sure that until horticulture makes a much greater advance than it has yet made, Mr. Parkman's book will be such an exhaustive authority as to render new books on roses a drug. The only thing in Hole that is new, or, rather, that is really valuable, is his half-hinted, half-told belief that the English brier makes a better stock for roses than the Manetti or Dog Rose. Even this, which is the author's peculiar belief, is lugged in and out through such a cloud of suggestions and poor stories, that most readers would be excused if they did not know at the end of the book that the Rev. Mr. Hole claims this discovery as his crowning glory in rose culture.

These two books are fair instances of the different ways in which we and the English people look at horticulture. To us it is a business, or at least it is a part of the business of all who follow it, even of the amateurs, and we feel ourselves honored in the pursuit, while the English amateurs treat roses as they do any other pet subject, like pigeons, or donkeys, or pigs. They condescend to notice them, and to mingle familiarly with the laboring men and gardeners, who give all their time to the practical work but when they begin to write on the subject they cannot state with sufficient frequency, indirectly at least, that they are quite aware that gardening, though Adam's occupation, was never intended to rank with the usual pursuits of men of culture. As we do not share in that belief, we should be glad if it were possible to instil enough enthusiasm into every reader's mind to induce him to plant a few roses this spring, in the best manner, and to tend them carefully, so that their blossoms should fill him some June morning with the pure delight which no other flower is so sure to give.

WHITNEY'S GERMAN GRAMMAR.*

THE importance of the publication of Professor Whitney's German Grammar consists hardly more in the intrinsic excellence of the book than in the changed aim and method of instruction in modern languages which it represents. It is almost the first serious effort to break loose from the empirical method of studying these which has held sway now for some twenty years. This "Ollendorff" method was itself a reform at the outset—a reaction against the over-formality of method which then prevailed, and a movement in the direction of more practical results than were then attained. For the mere utilitarian object of learning to speak, for purposes of trade or social intercourse, it has great merits; but the higher aims of education it does not even attempt to accomplish. The result has been in these years an immense increase in the number of persons who have studied French, and especially German, but we fear an actual falling off in solid scholarship in these tongues. Meanwhile has come up the great controversy in regard to the classic languages, and the opponents of these have urged the modern languages as equally well fitted for purposes of mental discipline. Perhaps so, but not in the way they are usually taught.

A reaction, therefore, has again set in, and it is beginning to be recognized that, however excellent the text-books and methods now in general use are for commercial colleges and business men, they are wholly unfitted for institutions of learning. What Goethe said, "Wer nicht fremde Sprachen kennt, weiss nichts von seiner eigenen," is only true of understanding the principles, the derivations and connections of words, the correspondence with one's own and the grounds of a foreign language. But that mechanical mode of studying foreign languages has got such a hold on the minds of our students, that many of them will hardly understand what is meant by the expression of a desire to raise the study of German "to a somewhat higher plane." Indeed, it would almost seem that only a man of Professor Whitney's reputation could dare to write a grammar so different from what our schools have been accustomed to. Even he feels "called upon to explain and defend his undertaking—especially when his work is almost entirely wanting in those practical exercises for writing and speaking which make the principal part of the other grammars now most in use." In other words, the "other grammars" teach how to traffic with Germans, while his own teaches the student to unlock the rich treasures of the German scientific and æsthetical literature. And for this latter purpose Professor Whitney's grammar is the best we ever had. "It aims to furnish the best practical aid to the scholar who is trying to learn German especially for the sake of access to German literature, but who would gain, at the same time, such grammatical and philological training as it can be made to yield, without neglecting the main object, or turning aside for special studies in comparative grammar and the philosophy of language."

* "A Compendious German Grammar. By William D. Whitney, Professor of Sanskrit and Instructor in Modern Languages in Yale College." New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1869. 12mo, pp. 248.

An examination of the book itself satisfies us that the promise here held out is well kept. Its most striking characteristic is clearness and precision—just the qualities that are most essential in a grammar. The arrangement and analysis are eminently simple and complete, and the rules are stated with that felicity that results only from thorough and comprehensive knowledge. As an instance of this excellence of arrangement and analysis, we will mention the Subjunctive Mood and the distinction in use of the Preterite and Perfect Tenses, so puzzling to Englishmen. Here we will call attention to the simple rule, p. 150, that, "if the condition be regarded as doubtful merely, and not contrary to reality, the verbs are put in the Indicative Mood"—a principle that holds in Latin, Greek, and English as well, but which many of our makers of English grammar are strangely ignorant of, lumping together all verbs which follow an "if" as subjunctive.

A second striking feature of the book is the valuable information incidentally given upon the history and relations of the language—not excessive in quantity or forced, but sufficient, with the chapters at the end of the book, to give an excellent foundation for "studies in comparative grammar and the philosophy of language." Take, for instance, his note on p. 57—admirable, even if we ourselves should incline to take the opposite view to that which Mr. Whitney forms: "Opinions differ whether the possessive is derived from the genitive, or the genitive from the possessive. Probably the latter opinion is correct; the history of language shows that a genitive is often, or usually, a stereotyped and invariable case of an adjective of relation." We will further remark that the Syntax is not placed by itself, but each part of speech is treated as a whole, the principles of syntax following the etymological treatment.

The "Reader" of Professor Whitney's course requires few words, inasmuch as it is as yet incomplete—the notes and vocabulary, which are to be the most characteristic portion of the book, being still unpublished. The collection is every way good, aiming rather at excellence than novelty, and thus consisting largely of familiar pieces, and making, on the whole, a tolerably complete course of German literature. Thus, we have the "Song of the Bell," the most famous scene from "Nathan the Wise," probably the best scenes of "Faust," and one of the best from Schiller's dramas; as well as prose passages of some length from Goethe, von Raumer, Gervinus, Humboldt, and other authors.

Through Night to Light. A novel, by Friedrich Spielhagen. Translated from the German by Prof. Schele De Vere. Revised edition. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1870.)—Novels like this and the "Problematic Characters," to which it forms a sequel, ought to go a good way towards reconciling us to that threatened "decline of the novel" which is not, in all moods, a thing to be joyful over. They tell cumbrously a story little worth telling, and describe laboriously, yet without great success, characters whose delineation makes no one much the wiser in the secrets of human nature. With the best will in the world to be pleased with a writer who clearly takes pains, and who seems to have given pleasure to many readers, we find ourselves impressed by the cold-blooded way in which Spielhagen constructs his incidents, his plot, his characters, and by the mechanical nature of his contrivances, rather than by anything else in his work. In his minor scenes and characters—as, for instance, in the character of Mrs. Jager, and the scenes in which is introduced the travelling circus—he reminds one of Dickens, and rather as a man who has read Dickens admiringly than as one who out of a kindred nature produces similar work. And as for the hero, Oswald Stein, though he is doubtless the first of his class who has been called a "problematic character," or "one of the Hamlets of our latest civilization," he surely is not the first hero at whose conquering feet all the women he meets, married and single alike, lay down their arms and worship with an enduring passion which outlives all neglect, coldness, and caprice; while he, feeling various shades of interest in all, is unable to find his ideal in any. Such as he is, however, he is pretty much all that is offered us in this novel. That there are in Spielhagen possibilities of better things than those by which our public at present know him, we are much inclined to believe; but whether he thinks so or not, and whether or not he would like to be, he is not a master of morbid psychology.

Day by Day: Being a compilation from the writings of ancient and modern Friends. By William Henry Chase. Third ed. (Auburn, N. Y.: Dennis Bros. & Thorne.)—Had a list of works quoted from accompanied this collection, the editor would have rendered a service to readers outside of his Society, and led many to examine the sources of Quaker doctrine and history, to which here they get no clue except in the name of the writer and the date of the extract. The Friends have a peculiar literature in the journals of their ministers, both male and female, some of which are famous, while others are preserved only in the families of descendants as curiosities, or as part of the genealogical record. The humblest of these are calculated to interest and profit those who approach them in the right spirit, while of the greatest, John Woolman's, Mr. Whittier affirms, in an introductory letter to the volume in hand, that it is the "sweetest and purest of all books outside of the Holy Scriptures." Few who have read Woolman's life will dissent from this praise of the Jersey draper; and it might almost be said that as a psychological study his account of himself is unsurpassed in autobiography. From these journals, Friends' letters, and other utterances of the lights of the Society, from George Fox to Stephen Grellet, Mr. Chase has taken short fragments—often too short—of piety and narrative, and ranged them under each day of the whole year, for family or solitary reading. In an appendix he gives the Orthodox creed of Friends, and some selections in verse, which only confirm the general opinion that Whittier is the single nightingale of this music-repressing sect.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Arnold (Rev. F.), The Path on Earth to the Gate of Heaven	(Virtue & Yorston)
Dale (Rev. T. P.), A Life's Motto: Biographies	(Virtue & Yorston)
Friday Night: Tales illustrating Jewish Life	(New York)
Hamilton (Gail), A Battle of the Books	(Hurd & Houghton)	$1 50
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.) Love after Marriage: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Legge (Rev. J.), The Chinese Classics. Part I., Confucius	(Hurd & Houghton)	3 50
Lost Sir Massingberd: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 75
Marcet (Mrs. Mary), Grammar	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Spaulding (Rev. H. G.), Rational Temperance, swd	(Loring)	0 10
Spielhagen (F.), The Hohensteins: a Tale	(Leypoldt & Holt)	2 00
Stevens (H.), Historical and Geographical Notes on the Earliest Discoveries of America	(New Haven)	2 00
Thomas (Dr. J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, Part IV., swd	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 50
Trowbridge (Prof. J.), Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1870	(Gould & Lincoln)

"Works of great value, and no student can well afford to do without them."

A HANDSOME EDITION AND REDUCED PRICE OF

Dean Milman's Works;

COMPRISING

History of the Jews,

From the Earliest Period down to Modern Times. By Henry Hart Milman, Dean of St. Paul's. A new edition, revised and extended. 3 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth, ... $5 25

History of Christianity,

From the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire. A new edition, revised and corrected. 3 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth, ... $5 25

History of Latin Christianity,

Including that of the Popes, to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. 8 vols., crown 8vo, extra cloth, ... $14 00

Or, COMPLETE WORKS. Uniform Sets. 14 vols., cloth (in case) $24 50

Do., do. Uniform Sets. 14 vols., half calf (in case), 49 00

A discount made to Teachers and Clergymen.

Please address orders to

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,

27 HOWARD ST., NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

FRIDAY NIGHT.

A Selection of Tales Illustrating Hebrew Life.

Price $1 50.

For sale by the leading Booksellers.

THE JEWISH MESSENGER, 243 BROADWAY.

TO PUBLISHERS.

A Gentleman who has had considerable experience as a "Reader," and in other literary employments, is ready to make an engagement to do Editorial or other similar work of a responsible character. Satisfactory references given. Address, with particulars, W. P., Box 1,195, N. Y. P. O.

A Correct and Forcible Writer, who has had several years' experience as an Editor, desires an engagement on some periodical of good standing. Address R. S. J., care Publisher of the Nation, Post-Office Box 6,732.

TRANSLATOR.

Will some person competent to translate a small amount of matter into CHINESE or into JAPANESE communicate with S. W. GREEN, 18 Jacob Street, New York City.

"THE BEST MONTHLY PERIODICAL, NOT IN THIS COUNTRY ALONE, BUT IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE."

HARPER'S
New Monthly Magazine,

FOR APRIL, 1870.

CONTENTS:

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY. By General M. T. M'Mahon.
Illustrations.—On the Paraná.—Las Palmas.—Refuge from Mosquitoes.—Lopez's Headquarters.—Coming from the Front.—Inroad of the Cavalry.—The Night after the Battle.—Crossing the Ycaty.—The Dying Colonel.—The Wounded Major.—The Pass of Ascura.—"Your devoted Servants."—The Paraguayan Mother.—The Sergeant's Story.

LOST DAYS.

COUNT OTTO VON BISMARCK.
Illustrations.—Otto von Bismarck.—Otto von Bismarck at School.—Young Bismarck's Visit to the Dean.—Bismarck as a Student at Göttingen.—Bismarck in 1847.—The King reading in the Forest.—The Attempt to assassinate Count Bismarck.—The King and Bismarck at the Battle of Sadowa.—Count Bismarck in the Prussian Chambers.

AMONG THE SILK-WORMS AND VELVET LOOMS.
Illustrations.—Cocoon Market in Novi.—Hatching the Eggs.—First Period.—Second Period.—Third Period.—Fourth Period.—End of Fifth Period.—Dormant State of the Several Periods.—Silk-worm casting its Skin.—Forming the Cocoon.—Cocoons Completed.—Female Moth; Male Moth; Moth issuing from Cocoon; Chrysalis.—"The Bosco;" Cocoons during Spinning Process.—Storing the Cocoons.—Marketing the Cocoons.—Reeling the Silk.—A Velvet Loom.

BEAUTIFUL CHILD.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—V. The Death of Frederick William and the Accession of Frederick the Second.
Illustrations.—Frederick the Great, Æt. 30.—The Crown Prince entering the Tobacco Parliament.—Frederick meeting his Ministers.—Frederick in the Garden.—Frederick's first Interview with Voltaire.

AROUND THE WORLD ON SKATES.
With an Illustration.

LINDA'S YOUNG LADY.

TOGETHER.

A BRAVE LADY.—(Concluded.)
Illustrations.—Mr. Donelly's Wooing.—Down the Elm Avenue.

REVEALED IN A SONG.

THE INDIAN: WHAT WE SHOULD DO WITH HIM.

BATHSHEBA CAREW'S CURSE.

THE GREAT GOLD CONSPIRACY.

ANTEROS. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone."

BORDER REMINISCENCES. By Gen. R. B. Marcy.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD,

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

With the May Number will be concluded the Fortieth Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The Magazine contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter, and is more profusely illustrated, than any other monthly periodical in America or England. The unparalleled success of the Magazine is due to the popular character and variety of its contents; to the enterprise of the Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of English and American authors; to its richly-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to its carefully-prepared papers on Scientific and Historic subjects, and upon the Mechanical Improvements of the age; and to the variety and interest of its several Editorial Departments. For the Editor's Scientific Record, the co-operation of members of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington has been secured.

In the January Number was commenced the publication, from the author's manuscript, of "Anteros," a serial story, by the author of "Guy Livingstone."

TERMS FOR HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR:

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year..... $4
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year..... 4
BAZAR, One Copy for One Year..... 4
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10; or any two for $7.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Valuable New Works

JUST IMPORTED BY

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.

THE IRISH LAND.

By GEORGE CAMPBELL, Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces of India, author of "Modern India," etc. Part I.—A Visit in the Spring. Part II.—A Visit in the Autumn. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

RECESS STUDIES.

Edited by Sir ALEXANDER GRANT, Bart., LL.D. 8vo, cloth, $6.

CONTENTS.

1. The Irish Land Question. By the Hon. Geo. Brodrick.
2. From Pesth to Brindisi in the Autumn of 1869. By Sir Charles Edward Trevelyan, K.C.B.
3. The Endowed "Hospitals" of Scotland. By Sir Alexander Grant, Bart., LL.D.
4. The Graphic Representation of the Laws of Supply and Demand. By Professor Fleeming Jenkin.
5. Church Tendencies in Scotland. By the Rev. Robert Wallace, D.D.
6. On the Declining Production of Human Food in Ireland. By Dr. Lyon Playfair, C.B., M.P.
7. Scotch Education Difficulties. By Alexander Craig Sellar.
8. Mr. Mill on Trades Unions.—A Criticism. By James Stirling.
9. Election Trials and Enquiries under the Corrupt Practices Acts. By Thomas Chisholm Anstey.
10. Hindrances to Agriculture. By Geo. Hope, of Fenton Barns.

Handbook of the Administrations of Great Britain

During the Nineteenth Century, 1801 to 1869. By FRANCIS CULLING CARR, of H. M. Madras Civil Service, and of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, $2 50.

Speeches of Earl Russell,

1817–1841. Also, Despatches selected from Correspondence presented to Parliament, 1859–1865. With Introductions to the Speeches and Despatches, by EARL RUSSELL. 2 vols. 8vo, $14.

Shaftesbury's Characteristics.

Edited, with Notes and Illustrations, by the Rev. WALTER M. HATCH, M.A. Vol. I., 8vo, $7.

The Life of Oliver Cromwell,

To the Death of Charles I. By J. R. ANDREWS, Barrister-at-Law. 8vo, $7.

These Works sent, post-paid, upon receipt of price and ten per cent. in addition.

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,
654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

OUR IRON-CLAD SHIPS,

Their Qualities, Performances, and Cost. With Chapters on TURRET-SHIPS, IRON-CLAD RAMS, etc. By E. J. Reed, C.B., Chief Constructor of the British Navy. With illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $6.

On the Munitions of War.

Report to the Government of the United States on the Munitions of War exhibited at the Paris Universal Exposition, 1867. By C. B. Norton and W. J. Valentine, United States Commissioners. 1 vol. royal 8vo, with 80 illustrations, price, in cloth, $3 50; former price, $5.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S
NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Land-War in Ireland.
A HISTORY FOR THE TIMES.
By James Godkin. Author of "Ireland and her Churches." 8vo. cloth, $3 50.

Alfred the Great.
By Thomas Hughes, M.P.
With Illustrations. $2.

The Story of Pauline.
AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.
By G. C. Clunes.
2 vols., $3.

"Both for vivid delineation of character and fluent lucidity of style, 'The Story of Pauline' is in the first rank of modern fiction."—Globe.

A Physician's Problems.
By Charles Elam, M.D., M.R.C.P.
$1 75.

Manual of Political Economy.
By Henry Fawcett, M.A., M.P.
3d Edition, cloth, $3.

Chatterton: A Biographical Study.
By Daniel Wilson, LL.D.
$2 50.

Mrs. Jerningham's Journal: A Poem.
Flcp. 8vo, cloth, $1.

MACMILLAN & CO.,
63 BLEECKER STREET, N. Y.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

Cassell, Petter & Galpin,
LONDON, and 596 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The World of the Sea. Finely Illustrated, partly in colors and chromo-lithography. Cloth, $10.

Illustrated Travels Around the World. An invaluable work, edited by H. W. Bates, of the English Royal Geographical Society. Profusely illustrated with Wood Engravings of the highest class. Volume I., plain cloth, $7 50; handsomely bound in full gilt cloth, $9. This work is also published in Monthly Parts at 50 cents each.

Selections from the Choice Works of Thomas Hood. Illustrated by Doré. With Steel Engravings, $10; in Photography, $20.

Cassell's Illustrated Shakespeare. Illustrations by C. H. Sclous, painter of the great picture, "The Crucifixion." 3 vols. cloth, $17.

The World of Wonders Illustrated. An Epitome of the Most Curious Marvels in Nature, Science, and Art. Cloth, gilt, $5.

The Child's Bible. Beautifully illustrated throughout with fine original engravings. Bound in cloth, gilt, $12; bound in best Levant morocco, $18.

Æsop's Fables. Illustrated by Ernest Griset. This work is Mr. Griset's masterpiece, full of talent and of infinite humor. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt, $7 50.

The Poets of Greece. By Edwin Arnold, of University College, Oxford. 8vo, cloth, $5.

The Scenery of Greece. Fifty exquisite Steel Engravings, by W. Linton. Cloth, gilt, $15.

NEW TECHNICAL SERIES, AT ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Hand-Books of Science and Art, practically applied to the various branches of Skilled Workmanship. By E. A. DAVIDSON, of the South Kensington Museum.

Linear Drawing. Adapted to Trade Manufactures and Design. With about 150 illustrations. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Projection. Plans, Elevations, and Sections of Solids, and Development of Surfaces. For Masons, Carpenters, Builders, Architects, Metal-Plate Workers, Plumbers, and artisans generally. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Building Construction and Architectural Drawing. Plans, Elevations, Sections, Working Drawings, etc., etc. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Drawing for Carpenters and Joiners. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Systematic Drawing. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Any Book on this List sent postage or express paid, on receipt of price.

Post-Office orders to be made payable to

ROBERT TURNER, Manager,
596 Broadway, N. Y.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1870.

The Week.

THE House has passed but two measures of national importance during the week, one, the Anti-Polygamy Bill of Mr. Cullom—if, after so much alteration, he would still choose to be called the father of it; the other, a bill fixing one year's residence as a necessary qualification hereafter for appointment to any cadetship from any given district. With this, and with sundry resolutions aimed at parties not members of the House, and asking for their dismissal or court-martial, the investigations closed, and the committee was discharged. The Tariff Bill has been discussed with as much vigor as if anybody expected it to pass, Messrs. Allison and Kelley being the principal speakers, of course, on opposite sides. The President's message on the decline of American commerce was received on Wednesday, but excited no particular interest. It was on the same day that Gen. Ames's case was under discussion in the Senate, with Mr. Carpenter to vindicate the Judiciary Committee and its respect for constitutional provisions. No decision was reached. On Friday, Mr. Wilson introduced a bill to reduce the army by one-fifth, but in a way to mitigate the hardships of reduction, spare the feelings of deserving officers, and, at the same time, effect a material saving in that branch of the service. The Senate has, however, been chiefly engrossed, in executive sessions, with the San Domingo treaty, on which Senators Sumner and Schurz have spoken with great force and ability, and Senator Morton at least with a vast deal of patience, since he is said to have traced the progress of the island from its discovery by Columbus to the present day—no slight job, as everybody knows who has attempted to study the history of either half of Hispaniola. On Tuesday, Mr. Sherman pushed the Texas Bill through the Senate, and the proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment will probably have been made ere this reaches our readers.

The San Domingo treaty seems to have no chance of ratification, the majority of the Senate being apparently, and doubtless, for various reasons, unalterably, opposed to annexations of territory—a result over which hardly anybody will grieve except the President, who, it must be admitted, in getting this scheme up chose a most unfortunate subject for his enterprise. With the South in the condition it is in now, and a committee sitting at Washington to take evidence on Ku-Klux outrages, and the army dwindling to a handful, it would be madness to annex territory occupied by blacks who have passed half a century in intestine war, and whom it would probably take half a century more to reconcile to the humdrum of peace. By the way, we trust that any enquiry that is made into the condition of Tennessee will be conducted with gravity, and in a sceptical, and not a credulous, spirit. What has occurred in Georgia has given a large horde of adventurers a direct interest in getting up stories of "outrages," and we trust they will be well sifted before Congress again sets about overturning a State government by way of keeping the peace. We have heard nothing yet said about Tennessee as an excuse for fresh reconstruction which may not be also said of New York. If Senter was elected by fraud, so was Hoffman; and if life be unsafe, justice badly administered, and prisons loosely guarded in Tennessee, so they are here. So if Senter be ousted, and a provisional government set up at Nashville, justice and comity will call for a similar display of vigor at Albany.

The Tariff Bill is making very slow progress, and it begins to appear tolerably certain that there will be no change this session. For an increase of duties, either directly or indirectly, the House does not seem to be prepared, while there is a strong demand out of doors for a decrease; and, under these circumstances, protectionists, for the first time in nine years, show signs of timidity and of willingness to be content with what they have got. But then, with the tariff as it is, rest is impossible; it is only by changes every year or so that its object can be accomplished.

General Sherman has written a characteristic letter on the Army Bill, addressed to Senator Wilson, the Chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, in which he says, in his usual forcible style, many things which it is very discreditable to the House of Representatives that it should have been left for him to say. He alleges that the law of 1869, which broke up twenty regiments of infantry, prohibited all further appointments or promotions in the staff corps till the prohibition should be removed by Congress; so that the whole staff corps and departments are now disappearing as fast as the present officers die, and the present bill makes no provision for their continuance. He speaks with some bitterness of the proposed absolute discharge of two major-generals and two brigadiers, and the degradation of the heads of bureaus from the rank of brigadier, which they now hold, to that of colonel—this being really, as he points out, in the nature of a penalty which should never be inflicted except by sentence of a court-martial. The saving of $3,000,000 a year, which General Logan promises as the result of the bill, General Sherman declares will not be secured, inasmuch as the money to be taken from the higher grades it is proposed to give to the lower grades. As to the "invidious comparisons" which have been made between the salaries of the Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers and that of the General, he points out that whatever shame there is in the matter arises out of the fact, not that the salary of the General-in-Chief is too high, but that those of the Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers are too low, and that he holds it to be a shame that a country with forty millions of people should stint their Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers as this Government now does. Finally, in an outburst of honest indignation, he says (in substance) what some member of the House should have said for him, that he has earned his pay, be it high or low; that, during the war, when filling the world with his fame, helping in no inconsiderable degree to save the country, and commanding more men than the Duke of Wellington ever commanded, he lived and supported his family on less pay than Wellington's private secretary received, and asks—what the economical saints and purists of the House will find it hard to answer—"What money would pay Meade for Gettysburg? What, Sheridan for Winchester and Five Forks? What, Thomas for Chickamauga, Chattanooga, or Nashville?"

One of the interesting and instructive features about this Army Bill is, that its principal supporters are now or have been also hearty supporters of some scheme for cheating the public creditors, and are among the most hostile or indifferent to the reform of the Civil Service, by which savings of enormous amount might really be made; from which we deduce the conclusion that it is not economy they seek so much as the degradation in the public eye of training, skill, and honesty—three things, the due appreciation of which by the people would drive them into private life. Were these men to have their way in all things, we should present, by the year 1876, probably the most debasing spectacle which God has ever permitted to appear on earth—a powerful and rich people swindling the men who lent them money in their adversity, giving their highest offices to their principal and the lower offices to their minor scoundrels, corrupting their fountains of justice by a parsimony so small as to bring them neither comfort nor relief, and turning adrift on the world some of the soldiers to whose valor and skill they owed their existence, and haggling with the rest in order to ascertain the smallest sum on which the sorrowful souls of their heroes could be kept in their scarred or mutilated bodies. The sweet suggestion which has been made that the discharged officers can go out and get a quarter section of Western land and work it, and therefore have no right to complain, seems to have been conceived in forgetfulness of the fact that they might have done that without risking their lives on the battle-field or spending the best years of their lives in learning to soldier. There is, indeed, no end to the employments to which they can turn, from grinding a hand-organ up to "politics."

Col. Baker reports to Gen. Sheridan that, "after having made every effort to get the judgment of the officers of the command," he is satisfied that the surprise of the Piegans involved nearly the following loss of life, viz.: in all, 173 killed; of whom 120 were able-bodied men, and 53 women and children. The captives amounted to 140 women and children, subsequently released. "I believe," he adds, "that every effort was made to save the non-combatants, and that such women and children as were killed were accidentally killed." There may be better testimony than this, but we should not know where to look for it, unless from some other member of the expedition.

There is, perhaps, nothing in which Grant's Administration has won such honorable distinction as in its judicial appointments. In this it forms a marked contrast to Mr. Lincoln's, which treated the bench as a retreat for faithful hacks, and gave us Underwood and Busteed. The selection of Mr. Bradley, of New Jersey, to the vacant justiceship of the Supreme Court is probably as good a one as could have been made had the bar been searched over. Curiously enough, too, he has been confirmed without difficulty by the Senate, although under the rule laid down in Judge Hoar's case—that a judge must be a resident in the circuit to which he is assigned—he is incompetent. The disregard of the geographical qualification of course shows clearly, what everybody previously believed, that the objection to Judge Hoar was invented to cover the real and more discreditable one, and that his hostility to jobbing office-seekers was what undid him. It shows, too, that the carpet-baggers, besides being unscrupulous, are unblushing. Decency required them to try and cover up their treatment of Judge Hoar by dealing out the same measure to Mr. Bradley. However, their decision is useful not only in putting a good judge on the bench, but in vindicating Judge Hoar and upsetting an absurd precedent.

The so-called anti-Radical editors of South Carolina have set a precedent which many of us may live to see generally followed, by assembling in conference to decide upon the line of political policy which they shall unite in urging upon the voters of the State. Hitherto, the "Conservative" papers of South Carolina have not been speaking with entirely accordant voices; manifest as it has been for some years that the negro absolutely must be made a friend, there was still left, here and there, a bitter negro-hater who counselled open war to the end—"a square fight on a white man's platform"—until, peradventure, a national success for the Democratic party should give the "Conservatives" a chance to make over their reconstructed State. In the conference, however, more politic views prevailed, and the platform adopted is all that anybody has any right to ask for. The attendance of editors, though numerically small, is said to have represented the feelings and opinions of nearly all the counties in the State. They began by passing a resolution to the effect that "the conference recognized the legal right of all the citizens, white or colored, to suffrage," and proceeded to pass another to the effect that there ought to be "no limitation of the right to hold office except such limitations as are imposed by personal character and fitness." A convention is to be held which will organize a party pledged to these dogmas and acting in the hope of getting a government which shall afford "some degree of security, prosperity, and good government." These proceedings seem promising, and we are not disinclined to believe that they are taken in good faith. South Carolina events have logic, whether or not there is much sense and logic in the South Carolina Democrats, and how other conclusions could have been reached it is not easy to see. Yet, in the same paper which gives us an account of this sensible conference, we find set forth a scheme, looking towards immigration, which would seem to show that the average South Carolinian landowner cannot rid himself of his desire to hold baronial possessions in land. The immigrants he wants are the lowest class of white European farm laborers, and he would have them distributed by bureaus and sub-bureaus to the planters as they are needed, employing them on an experimental farm till they are called for. We up here distribute laborers from Castle Garden, but we send out men whom we know to be seeking work first, and farms afterward.

That there is need enough that somehow South Carolina should get a new government, is not to be doubted. There is no dispute among observers of its performances that the Legislature which has just been adjourned was one of the most corrupt assemblages of men that ever legislated for a State, and one of the most contemptible in point of ability. The Senate was better than the Lower House, for, though it had members who looked for bribes, they did not make a show of their spoils, as did some representatives. No bill, however unobjectionable, could pass, it is said, unless it paid contribution to the "Forty Thieves"—an organized band, some of whom were white, some colored, some Democrats, and some Republicans. Luckily, this precious crew did not value itself at a high rate, and would legislate after being "recognized," or getting "light," to the extent of five or ten dollars a head. These gentlemen are said to have had a captain and other officers, to have regularly sold themselves, and to have divided gains according to rank in the organization. In this indulgent atmosphere, Mr. B. F. Whittemore, by-the-by, is now laboring to secure a return to his seat in Congress. The Republican leaders oppose him, and the meetings that he addresses are not so numerous as his audiences in old times nor so enthusiastic. In fact, they are rather quiet; but the feeling of the negroes is said to be, on the whole, in his favor. It is probable, then, that we shall have him back in Washington, in view of which probability, we would refer any member who wishes to look up Mr. Whittemore thoroughly to Mr. Dirk Teupken, of Salem, Mass., who reports that when Mr. Whittemore was chaplain of the 30th Massachusetts he had some dealings with Teupken, much to the pecuniary disadvantage of that foreigner, who had previously thought that clergymen could be trusted.

In North Carolina, also, the State Government is in a bad way, and its financial policy, to speak euphemistically of what seems to have been mere thieving, has been particularly unfortunate. What Governor Holden is most of our readers know. He is a small, astute politician, with a capacity for turning his coat when that performance can conduce to his comfort; and, though North Carolinians are neither the acutest nor the most suspicious people in the world, Mr. Holden was sufficiently found out, some years ago, to make it certain that, but for the advent of the negro voter, he would now be editing a feeble partisan paper, as he did before and during the war, or be engaged in some similar occupation. The Raleigh Standard used to be his paper; but when, after the war, he succeeded Jonathan Worth as Governor, he sold his interest in it to a man called Littlefield, who was hand-in-glove with a "member of the third house," called Swepson, and with these was joined a person by the name of Hawkins. Soon $16,000,000 in State bonds were issued by the Legislature and Governor—bonds to be used in furtherance of certain railroad projects. About $1,500,000 worth of these bonds, it is said, have been satisfactorily accounted for; but as to the rest, that their disposition is a matter open to suspicion, to say the least, has been made so plain—to say nothing of Mr. Swepson's having fled the State—by the investigations of the Legislature now sitting, that an act has been passed with these provisions: "All acts framed at the last session, making appropriations for railroad schemes, are repealed; all bonds of the State issued in pursuance of these acts are ordered to be at once restored to the State Treasury; all moneys levied and collected under the railroad acts are to be credited to the counties of the State, and to be deducted from the amount of the county tax for the current year." It will be a matter of some interest to watch the future political career of Governor Holden. The average white North Carolinian is an honest and fairly intelligent man, and, though not very literate, events of the magnitude of these "irregularities" may be presumed to be now known to him. Nor do we imagine that the Governor will find salvation at the hands of the negroes, though, to be sure, he has opportunely done some proclaiming of martial law.

"In the Northern States the English emigrant now finds himself not only in a foreign but in a hostile country." So Mr. Goldwin Smith writes to the London News. "A principal source of the ill feeling, no doubt, are the Irish," Mr. Smith goes on to say; and he is anxious that a counterpoise for the Irish North should be made out of a Virginia composed in great part of English immigrants. The native Virginians, he says, are the most English of Americans; they are very friendly to the mother country; and they informed Mr. Smith that they were very anxious that their State should be filled up by English immigrants; slavery is really dead and buried, and the new-comer who wished to work would not find in his way any of the old anti-industrial sentiment. So much of this letter as praises the natural resources of Virginia is to be taken as close to the facts. That State is one of the very finest in the Union, abounding in all minerals, from gold to gypsum; containing soils fitted for the production of almost any crop known to American agriculture; endowed with a climate probably unequalled by that of any other region on the continent, so far as concerns the breeding of healthy men; half-covered with noble forests; rich in water-courses and water-powers; beautiful for scenery, and so connected with the West and so fortunate in respect of harbors as to seem destined to commercial eminence as decided as its past political eminence. Slavery once thoroughly gone—and it is fast going—there seems to be no reason whatever why Virginia should not be among the chief States of the Union in population, in political influence, in manufacture, agriculture, mining, and commerce. But apart from what he says on this general head, Mr. Smith is very much out. All Englishmen are received here with kindness. Even Mr. Laird and his like, though doubtless they would not be received with effusion, except in certain small circles, would probably get civility. They would be as little likely to find themselves in a dangerously hostile country on this side of Mason & Dixon's line as Mr. Smith when he went down among the Virginians, whose dislike he may be supposed to have earned by his conspicuous zeal in behalf of the Federal Government. The England hated here—and not, as Mr. Smith thinks, most hated in New England—is an abstraction, and very few are the individual Englishmen identified in the minds of Americans with the England of the Alabama. Just as far out is Mr. Smith when he speaks of the influence of the Irish in making their American neighbors dislike the English. The example of the Irish is not yet potent with Americans. They may be considered good for any number of terrible "joint resolutions" from the hand of the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations—resolutions which the House may very likely pass, but which, nevertheless, Mr. Smith will do better to laugh at than to "keep awake nights" over. Both the Republican and the Democratic parties have much tenderness for the little embarrassments of General Banks and other gentlemen with many Irish constituents, and will not close their mouths when they make the speeches that are to do them good in their own districts; but, also, they are entirely free from anguish of mind when President Johnson prevents Fenians from going into Canada. English emigrants are as sure of a warm welcome from Northern Americans as immigrants from any other country whatsoever; and if we were to say a warmer welcome, we should not, we think, be far wrong.

We have got on so far from the days of the Ostend Manifesto, that the news of the death of one of the chief framers of that once famous instrument has almost an antediluvian flavor. There are some public characters—and in this country examples are only too plenty—whose end for usefulness and for notoriety in this world is reached so much sooner than the end of their days, that they enjoy a temporary resurrection in the very act of dying. Such will have been the curious fate of all three signers of the Manifesto, Mr. Pierre Soulé now having followed Mr. Buchanan. He was a foreign-born Southerner, and as minister at Madrid and plotter at Ostend did much to degrade the diplomatic service of his adopted country and to embroil us with foreign powers; but, except for the strength which his excesses lent to the development of the Free-Soil party, his influence on national affairs is hardly to be mentioned. Nor does he hardly deserve to be remembered as an American. Quite another epitaph must be written for Gen. George H. Thomas, who has also been removed by death during the week, at his post on the Pacific. He was not only one of the greatest soldiers—not the showiest—we have ever produced, but also one of the simplest and truest of men. His modesty was as conspicuous as his merit, while his clear good sense saved him from all the political complications of the last months of Mr. Johnson's incumbency. By birth a Virginian, he served in Florida and in Mexico with distinction, unconsciously in the service of the very power he was afterwards called upon to meet and overthrow. His fidelity to the Government, and his respect for his oath, at the breaking out of the rebellion, stand in vivid contrast to the action of Lee, and will long be a monument of patriotism to his posterity. His loss is almost a calamity, and will be sincerely deplored.

The "Irish Force Bill," as the latest coercive measure is called, has passed in the House of Commons by a large majority, only thirteen members in a full house voting against it. Its main features do not differ much from those of many of its predecessors, but it makes ample provision for imposing the responsibility of crimes on the district in which they are committed. Something of the kind appears to be absolutely necessary, as in many parts of the country society seems to be in danger of dissolution. Murders are committed or attempted every day, but witnesses will not come forward, nor juries convict, through sheer terror; and if the weakening of public opinion and mutual confidence went much further, there would be no knowing when it would be possible to set the peaceful machinery of society agoing again. No matter what reformatory measure is passed, its effects will not be felt for some time, and, in the meanwhile, either throats and skulls must be protected or the Government must withdraw and let the inhabitants fight it out.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte has been acquitted, as it became evident, as the trial progressed, that he would be. This result will doubtless be intensely exasperating to the Paris Reds, and, there can be little doubt, is a failure of justice, and, in some respects, a misfortune for the dynasty. It is due, beyond question, in the main to the thorough disgust with which Rochefort and his company have managed to inspire not only the class from which the jury of the High Court is drawn, but the most sensible and intelligent portion of the French people. In the first place, journalism, as the editors of the Marseillaise follow it—fighting, ruffianly, blatherskite, lying journalism—from which all sense of decency and responsibility is carefully excluded, is felt by the sane portion of the public to be a positive nuisance, which converts its conductors into enemies of the human race. For some years back, too, the wilder portion of the adventurers of the capital have drifted into it on one side or other, and produced papers for which the only possible excuse was, that late hours, and irregular meals, and intemperance had robbed the owners of their wits. This detestation of them on the part of the best Frenchmen was intensified by finding, last fall, that these gentry, far from being satisfied with editing silly newspapers, actually aspired to govern the country, and thought Rochefort, and Flourens, and Grousset fit to take charge of the affairs of a great people. As between Pierre Bonaparte and the editors of the Marseillaise, there is, perhaps, not much to choose, and probably the French public would have been well pleased if the three worthies who met to arrange the duel about their disgusting abuse of each other on the morning of the murder, had ended their differences by mutual slaughter. But when it came to a judicial process, of course the prince weighed far more in the scale than the journalist. Social influences worked for him with the jury, and court influences told with the judges, and, as if to make his escape certain, Rochefort moved that precious sheet, the Marseillaise, down to Tours during the trial, and Grousset and the others behaved as badly as possible in court. Rochefort, we believe, has admirers in this country whose enthusiasm ought now to be at boiling point. As we have remarked more than once before, the world of the future, which will be governed by some of the radical heroes, will be one of the queerest places in which humanity has ever toiled or sinned.

POLYGAMY.

Mr. Cullom's bill for the suppression of polygamy in Utah has been shorn of its most objectionable features in its passage through the House. As he introduced it, it bore a stronger resemblance to those edicts of Louis XIV. which produced the "dragonnades," than to any other piece of modern legislation. The provisions which allowed the testimony of the wife to be received against her husband, and confiscated the property of persons convicted under the act, and empowered the President to employ a large body of troops to harry the Mormons into monogamy, had little to recommend them except that they were such as the earlier polygamists were in the habit of employing against their enemies. To the modern monogamic eye, they bore all the marks of barbarism. As it stands, the bill is simply foolish—which is better than being cruel, but is still an objection. That virtue is at the bottom of it, we do not deny. It owes its origin to zeal for the purity of the family state, which is a very respectable passion; but then, unhappily, some of the silliest pieces of legislation the world has ever seen have come from excited moralists. We are satisfied, too, that the small amount of opposition the bill excited in the House was due to the terror in which so many members stand of the argument a gaudio infidelium. The way in which it would have touched opponents of the bill is this: The Mormons would have rejoiced over their speeches; this would have shown that they sympathized with the Mormons, especially with regard to the most striking feature of Mormonism, plurality of wives; therefore they must desire several wives themselves, which in a Christian community is one of the marks of impurity. Any man, therefore, who opposed Cullom's bill, exposed himself to the charge of licentiousness. Most members, of course, know as well as we do that the bill cannot be enforced, and is therefore on this ground alone a bad bill, but they not unnaturally preferred to appear being suspected of obtuseness to being suspected of libidinousness, besides which, the measure has nearly every characteristic likely to commend it to the woman's rights advocates, who are already, if not a powerful body, a body which it is just as well for timid Congressmen to have on their side.

The reasons why it cannot be enforced are easily stated. That juries can be got to convict men of a crime for doing what the great majority of the community consider not only lawful, but of divine ordinance, is very unlikely; at all events, they cannot be got to do so without being packed in the most careful and barefaced manner, and jury-packing is a device very soon exhausted, and which, like all prostitution of judicial forms, rouses popular indignation to an extraordinary degree. We know very well that it is maintained that polygamy is not an essential part of Mormon institutions; that it was Brigham Young that introduced it; but then this only removes the difficulty one degree further back. As long as the Mormon community yields Brigham Young unhesitating obedience as a prophet, we are made no better off by showing that an ordinance only emanates from him, than by showing that no trace of it is to be found in their Bible. Good Protestants have frequently tried an analogous mode of overthrowing some of the doctrines of the Catholic Church, but thus far with indifferent success. If it is he who keeps polygamy up, why not either kill him, or wait till he dies, before commencing an organized persecution of his innocent disciples?

If polygamy be practised as of divine ordinance, of course all attempts to extirpate it by law partake of the character of religious persecution; and religious persecution against a community inhabiting a remote territory, and one hundred thousand strong, is not a thing to be lightly undertaken in this age of the world. What the legislator has to consider, it must be remembered, is the light in which the Mormons will regard the measure. We may call it what we please; if they think it an attempt to interfere with the existence of an institution which they look on as sacred, the law of human nature, which has in every age proved the sure defence of despised creeds, will come to the aid of polygamy, and give it a hold on their affections and on their reverence and fidelity which, it is safe to presume, it does not now possess. That, in spite of this, polygamy will eventually die out, for reasons we shall state hereafter, we do not doubt; but the question, when will it die out? is an important one. It would be a very easy thing to give it a long lease of life, of which, if let alone, it has not a chance. The spectacle of one family, really attached to the institution, broken up, and its head put in jail under the bill, might, and probably would, breed in ten others a devotion to it which does not now exist at all.

Let us ask the authors of the bill seriously, too, how they expect to prove the new offence of "concubinage" which the bill creates; for on their ability to get evidence of course the whole value of the measure depends. It will hardly do to treat the presence of several women as residents in a man's house as evidence that they are all his wives, and unless we set up this presumption, the difficulties of getting a conviction will be well-nigh insuperable. In what relations he lives with the members of his family, only its members—that is, his reputed wives or children—can prove. Are they likely to come forward and do so? The Mormon women are all, or nearly all, foreigners, and so are the men. They have no special sympathy with Americans or American laws or manners. The United States officials appear to them as alien enemies and would-be persecutors. This bill will appear to be an attempt to break up their social and religious system. Moreover, every Mormon woman will ask herself what is to become of her in case the family, of which she is a part, is dissolved by law. She is five thousand miles from home, without money or trade, and has a howling wilderness between her and every civilized country. No monogamist husband stands ready to take her to his arms after she has cast off the polygamic yoke. The bill does not provide new husbands or protectors to take the place of the old ones. It offers to the Mormon women the alternative of Young and comfortable homes or Cullom and destitution. The more ignorant and helpless they are—that is, the more probable it is they have been seduced into their present position—the more likely it is they will cleave unto Young and reject Cullom.

The theory which one hears so complacently put forth at the East, that the Mormon women are sensible of their degradation and long for an escape from it, has thus far received no support from facts. It is opposed, if not refuted, by the history of Mormonism. The women are not locked up. The opportunities of flight are numerous; the community, it is admitted on all hands, is thriving, orderly, and industrious, which, with a rebellious and repentant female element, it could hardly be, and has grown, in spite of the fact that it collects its converts mainly from Europe, from a small sect of 4,000 members into a state containing a population of 100,000. The attachment to the monogamic family is clearly not altogether instinctive in women, or else polygamy could never have had the success it has had, and such establishments as the Oneida Community would never have grown as it is growing, and the marriage yoke would be borne more easily than it is borne in various parts of the country. We have no hesitation in saying that we believe the easy divorce of Indiana and some other States, by which the marriage contract is made to depend for its duration on the chances of fancy or of passion, and which gives some men half-a-dozen wives and some women half-a-dozen husbands in the course of their lives, is more destructive of domestic purity and more unfair to children than Mormon polygamy, because it is more specious, and because it involves what must, as society is and must for ever remain constituted, make the family a mere name—frequent change in the head of it, the husband and father, or, if woman's rights advocates like the term better, the strongest member of it.

The true remedy for Mormon polygamy would seem to be the opening of the Mormon territory to the ordinary influences of American civilization, and the influx into it of a large Gentile population. The reason why polygamy does not exist as an institution in civilized countries is not that people are prevented by law from marrying several wives, but that public sentiment is opposed to it. If the great mass of the American people approved of it, large harems would be found all over the country, the statute against bigamy to the contrary notwithstanding. And not only does the general progress of society work against it, but the laws of the social organism. The numbers of the sexes being about equal, and wives being left perfectly free to compete for husbands, and husbands to compete for wives, each husband will have about one wife, no matter how much particular individuals may desire to have more. The practice of polygamy is only possible where women are either under a delusion or under constraint. Being left perfectly free, and being educated and decently treated, they will always be monogamists, not simply as a matter of prudence, but as a matter of passion. Even a woman who makes no objection to having several husbands in the course of her life, will rarely brook more than one husband at a time, or consent to form one of several wives.

COMMISSIONS.

THERE is a great outcry just now at Albany and elsewhere against commissions, and most people seem ready to admit that they are noxious excrescences on the body politic which ought to be got rid of. Nevertheless, those who have not wholly made up their minds either that commissions are conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, or that they exist by divine right, are here offered a few suggestions as to the nature and origin of these bodies, which may be of value as throwing light on the question of their abolition. Those who have hitherto looked upon commissions as forces of nature—unchangeable and eternal—must already have had their belief sadly shaken by the events of the past few weeks, and those who, with the Evening Post, are pledged to the creed that commissions violate a fundamental principle of democracy, will at least admit that such bodies are, like all other political phenomena, worthy of careful consideration and study. Twenty-five years ago, such a body as a "commission" had no existence in the United States. To-day, there is hardly an administrative function which in some one or other of the States is not in the hands of one of these bodies. Here the police, there the parks—here the harbors, there the hospitals—here the bridges, there the railroads, are administered and governed by a board of two or three men, holding long terms of office, sitting in secret, responsible not to the people but to the executive, and clothed with an almost absolute power within the spheres of the administration allotted to them. What is the explanation of this curious phenomenon? Is it that the original framers of the American system, in dividing all the powers of the Government between the Executive, the Legislature, and the Judiciary, omitted a necessary fourth branch—the bureau? Or is it, rather, that unforeseen changes in times and manners have produced the necessity of modifications in our political machinery which the creation of these commissions has effected? For many reasons, we incline to the latter solution.

One of these days, when the history of commissions shall be philosophically studied, it will appear, we think, that the explanation of the rise of commissions into influence and authority will be found in the contemporaneous decline in influence and authority of the executive. Few people will refuse to admit that in the last forty years the executive in all the States has been shorn of most of its prerogatives, not, perhaps, by any open attack, but by a series of covert and far more dangerous approaches. The chief powers of the executive are the veto and the appointing power, and in the appointing power lies hid the whole function of administration, as distinguished from legislation and judicial interpretation by courts of law. According to the system of fifty years ago, the executive appointed judges, sheriffs, and a host of inferior officers, who, together with their chief, made up an effective administrative body; in their hands lay the execution of laws, whoever framed them. To-day, owing to many causes which we have not space to enumerate, the veto is an empty name, and the appointing power is gone. It is true, the veto remains on the statute-book, but it cannot be exercised where it is most needed to check corrupt, partisan, or hasty legislation. This is so patent a fact that examples need hardly be cited, yet the signature of the Erie Bill of last year by Governor Hoffman is so much in point that we can hardly pass it by without a word. There was no reason to suppose that Hoffman cared much to make Fisk's board of direction a permanent one; under ordinary circumstances, he would probably have vetoed the bill; but he knew that, if he vetoed the bill, the pen that wrote the message signed his own death-warrant; of course he succumbed. His success in stopping the passage of ten or a dozen other corrupt bills meant nothing, for not only was the public in those cases on his side, but the politicians of the Ring were neutral. To be able to veto when every one wants a veto, is no evidence of strength; the test of the power is when its exercise becomes unpopular. We say, then, the veto power is an empty name because it can no longer be exercised, except in cases when it is of no use. As to the power of appointment, every one knows that in half the States every judge, every sheriff, every supervisor, every county commissioner, and every register of deeds is elected by the people; in those States such officers are responsible to no one but to their party caucuses. And even in the States which have not adopted the elective system to its fullest extent, the spirit of the times has made such rapid progress that the appointments are rather in the hands of the dominant party than in those of the executive. The popular belief that in the conservative States everything is just as it was a generation back is quite a mistaken one. For example, Massachusetts, though retaining the non-elective judicial system, has within the last few years been hovering on the brink of a system quite as bad as the elective—the system of partisan appointments, nominally made by the executive, but really dictated by a Republican or Democratic, a Prohibitionist or Anti-Prohibitionist caucus. It was only the other day that an attempt in this direction was made in a Prohibitory convention, by the introduction of a resolution condemning Massachusetts judges for their wickedness in construing laws as they thought they ought to be construed, instead of interpreting them as the mover of the resolution would have done in their places. The resolution was voted down, but that there could be a debate on such a point showed that there are plenty of persons in the most conservative portions of the Union who are quite as "progressive" as those who have their homes in regions where "progress" rides roughshod over all traditions. And generally throughout the country it may be said that the power of appointment, as exercised now, means nothing more than the power of selecting from among a worthless class—the cringing hacks of a dominant faction.

As soon as it became clear that the veto and appointing power had no longer any real existence, the executive began to decline in influence and authority, and, as the administration of the laws was of just as much importance as ever, it was necessary to find some appliance to take the place of the machinery which was falling into disuse. The appliance hit upon was the Commission. It was easily seen that commissioners with absolute powers of administration might be called into existence, who should perform within restricted spheres the duties originally devolved upon the executive. No party, no ring, no caucus could influence them. They would have full power to regulate, administer, appoint, remove, and veto, and would have no interest in doing anything except their duty; the office of commissioner would be a purely business office, and the tenure would depend upon ability and efficiency. The innovation once made, its benefits were readily seen, and the result has proved that the commission was probably the most effective agency that could have been chosen for the required work. It has been applied wherever the regular machinery of government has failed. Whether the object was to police a city, to collect statistics, or to build a State-house, the commissioner has always proved a safer public servant than any other, and it has only been when (as in this city) he has been tampered with and seduced into playing the rôle of a partisan that any evil results have followed, or much popular dissatisfaction has been caused by the enormous powers he has wielded. The case of Philadelphia is not unlike that of New York. Within a month the public has witnessed an attempt to place the execution of all the charitable trusts of that city in the hands of a single board, appointed by the judges, the mayor, and the councils. The attempt is very likely to prove a failure, but the creation of the commission is none the less curious as illustrating a tendency of the day.

Let any one select for himself those administrative bodies which in the last twenty years have done beneficial political work—work in the interest of the public and not of rings or parties, and he will find that his list comprises commissions and very little else. In this State, the Central Park Board, the Board of Health, the Board of Emigration, and the Police Commission—who will deny that these have been better than what preceded them? So, also, of the Massachusetts Board of Railroad Commissioners. And to turn to the Federal Government, have not the Indian Commissioners proved themselves better administrators than the old Indian agents? Has not the Special Commissioner of the Revenue done what no other official would or could have done? These facts (and numberless facts of the same kind could be adduced) must be taken into account and explained by those who say that commissions are inherently vicious. How long the bureau system will last it is of course impossible to predict, but it is certainly now in the plenitude of its power, and it is difficult to see, if commissions should disappear, where the country would be able to find in the future as much good government as they have furnished in the past.

FRANCE AND ROME.

PARIS, March 11, 1870.

DURING this temporary "recess" we have passed through every stage of political combination. The cabinet, at its birth, was called with one accord after the keeper of the seals: we undoubtedly began by the "Ollivier ministry." We then passed into a dubitative kind of state, where each minister tried, as far as in him lay, to cast off all solidarity with his colleagues. Next came the speech of Count Daru, on the 22d of last month, and it seemed that definitively the cabinet had a new master and a new name; it was likely to be known as the "Daru ministry." Upon that followed the two speeches in which Émile Ollivier threw the official candidatures to the four winds of heaven and, in some degree, reasserted his right to power. Then the chamber relieved itself of its labors by giving itself a holiday of ten days "to recover its temper," said a well-known diplomatist ("known" for his sharpness of tongue).

Four days since, the deputies met together again, and talked of Algeria! But no sooner had they reassembled in the "House" than one of them, the Marquis d'Andelarre, made a small attempt at cohesion, in the shape of a banquet at the Grand Hôtel, at which all "moderate" parties were to fraternize. Except the extremest Left and Right, all colors and all opinions met, and the first result was a tremendously freezing one. Count Daru was on the right hand of the host, M. Ollivier on his left, and, I repeat it, except the radicals of either shade, every deputy of any mark was present. M. d'Andelarre proposed the usual initiatory toast: "The Emperor and Imperial family." It was coldly responded to by his audience, and the whole thing seemed to hang heavily on hand. Then, Émile Ollivier rose, and with a certain instinct of cordiality, which he possesses in perfection, spoke a few short sentences, which produced a general thaw. He spoke warmly of "conciliation," and of the ease with which parties might come together; of the very slight differences that in reality separated them. Then he boldly touched upon the subject which, in fact, lay at the bottom of every conscience, upon the subject of his own shortcomings. "It is very possible," said he, "that I may have committed faults—every human being is liable to do so—but in truth there is one cause that I shall never cease to serve, and that is the cause of liberty! If, sometimes, when our friends approach us, we seem reserved or anxious or sad, let them not be discouraged—we ministers are fighting conscientiously a hard battle, and we may make many a mistake from our over-desire even to do the right thing—but let them return to us, and not weary of trying to win us over to their convictions. We are open to all honest beliefs, and we entreat of even our foes to be persuaded that, imperfect though it may be, this effort of ours to do the right and honest thing, and to draw men together into one large and strong group, will leave a great and luminous trace in the history of our country."

These few words, uttered with an accent of warmth and sincerity which is peculiarly Ollivier's own, produced an almost magical effect. The very men who at the beginning had held aloof one from the other sought each other out, and in reality M. d'Andelarre's seventy or eighty guests came to a thorough and cordial fraternization.

We are now, for this identical moment, living under the reign of the Daru-Ollivier ministry. The two ministers are perfect equals, and they form a manner of twin government. How long this may last is altogether another question. In this country "situations," as they are politically termed, undergo such perpetual transformations, that from one day to another the same man has a totally different value, and his name a different significance. Probably what will unite and, to a certain degree, knit the cabinet together will be the Roman question, for upon that, in its present state, there can scarcely be a dissension among moderate people. To the Imperial Government the result of the Œcumenical Council would have been a second Mexico had the Emperor still personally "reigned and governed." It is only the modified form of power introduced into France since the ministry of the 2d January that has saved the Bonaparte dynasty from a very severe defeat. No one can exactly foretell what Rome is on the eve of doing, for the form of the promulgation of the dogma of Papal Infallibility leaves some margin still to common sense; but it is evident that the tendency of the impending bull is a retrograde one, and one wholly and entirely at variance with the notions of modern policy above all as they have been adopted for the last century and a half in France. The danger being what it is, and the chances of Jesuitical encroachment being always what they now show themselves to be, Napoleon III. becomes unpardonable for not having recalled his troops from Rome. If the Emperor were still the personal despot he was for ten years after the coup d'état, his throne would be at this moment shaken to its base by the blind folly which virtually is protected at the Vatican by French bayonets.

Not only has the change of régime been made too late, but the present ministry allowed time to escape them before they resolved to act, and they are to a certain degree answerable for the pitch of insanity to which the Papacy has allowed itself to be dragged, and for the forthcoming heresies which are about to be proclaimed. Had the ministers on coming into office declared to the Pope that they were about to withdraw the French troops—the military occupation of Rome being hostile to universal public feeling in France—had they done this, Italy would promptly have settled the entire affair, there would not have been a priest left in the Peninsula, and all notion of the present idolatrous worship (which is absolutely impious) would have become impossible. But, far from that, M. Daru's despatches to M. de Bonneville were, in the beginning, quite colorless and vacillating. They were the messages of a minister who seeks to propitiate and to disarm, instead of one who is conscious of his own strength and who is determined to uphold the right.

The really admirable conduct has been that of the French clergy of the so-called Gallican school, and of the laity and clergy belonging to the "liberal Catholic" party. Father Hyacinthe led the van, and it is now beginning to be seen that he could not do other or less than he did. Not long after his forcible letter and retirement from public life, the Bishop of Orleans raised his voice in protestation, and the astonishment and scandal was tremendous throughout the Catholic world. Here, in France, families were implacably divided among themselves, and a sort of moral civil war was declared. But in Rome it was forbidden to publish what Mgr. Dupanloup wrote, so that once in Rome and under the Papal grip, the eloquent bishop was reduced to silence, and his arguments were to the world out-of-doors as though they were not.

This raised up in defence the most ardent disciple of Plato and St. Augustine, of Descartes and Bossuet, the Academician and Philosopher, Father Gratry, the Oratorian. In spite of ill-health and a constitutional horror of noise and dispute, Père Gratry plunged into the mêlée, and with his immense talent and science dealt the severest blows of all. He proved historically, and by mere facts and dates, the incontrovertible fallibility of the Popes! There being no possibility of refuting him, denial wholesale and stupid was the only weapon left, and to it his foes resorted, thereby disgracing themselves and lending him further force. Upon Father Gratry's four letters the dispute centred down and has raged till now.

Within the last few days M. de Montalembert has descended into the lists and dealt vigorous sword-thrusts all around. Perhaps in his whole long and illustrious career M. de Montalembert never committed a more courageous act nor ever clothed lofty and noble thoughts in nobler and loftier language. He boldly and uncompromisingly declares that he "glories" in counting as his colleagues in the Académie Française two such great and good champions of truth as the Bishop of Orleans and Father Gratry, and he denounces the Jesuit intrigues at Rome as "idolatrous," quoting in support of the word "idol," as applied to the Pope, a most remarkable letter written to him seventeen years ago by the (then) Archbishop of Paris, Mgr. Sibour.

Nothing so strong, so decided, or so eloquent has yet appeared on this terrible Roman question as this letter of Count Montalembert. It will be read wherever the French tongue is spoken, and it will support and console all right-thinking, high-minded Catholics—but the obloquy that will be cast upon M. de Montalembert by the Ultramontanes is indescribable. He perceives the bare truth when he says that the "Litany of Abuse" will be lavished upon him. It will be so unlimitedly, and it will require all the genuineness of his faith and all the chivalry of his nature to bear what will be his inevitable fate. However, if Rome should go on blindly to her own undoing, it is scarcely possible that the Church should escape a schism as in the sixteenth century.

Correspondence.

THE VEXED QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In speaking last week of the equality of the sexes, I intimated a purpose to recur to the subject at another time. Allow me, then, to say that, when the admitted natural equality of man and woman is made the ground of demand for identity of political privileges, or when the demand is put into the shape of a watchword, and urged with passionate earnestness, the mind of a sceptical enquirer cannot help but be unfavorably affected toward the argument; and that both on the ground of taste and reason—if the two things can be separated. For taste in its best meaning is not the finical, dilettanteish sort of thing which some fancy it; it is that instinct, partly moral, partly intellectual, which John Foster had to encounter when he wrote his famous essay on the "Causes which render Evangelical Religion unacceptable to Men of refined Taste." A natural reply to him was—I do not say with what justice—the causes are inherent in the subject; the manner is an outgrowth of the matter; the taste which is offended is an intuition of reason In a controversy like this, in which the leading parties, on one side at least, are by nature at home in all that is becoming, all reasons urged in favor of the position become, in the mind of the doubting enquirer, arguments against it when urged in a manner that does violence to taste.

That "something is to be pardoned to the spirit of liberty," all admit. Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty, or give me death," was simply sublime. When De Tocqueville says, "I should have loved freedom, I believe, at all times, but in the time in which we live I am ready to worship it," our feeling is one of admiration and something more. But when equality is the theme, and equality with men the passionate demand, even the most allowance-making cannot help saying in his own mind, "On that point, the less emotion the more grace."

To quote De Tocqueville again (and for the same reason which he gives for citing Jefferson on the dangers from an omnipotent majority—"Because I consider him the most powerful advocate democracy has ever had"): "There is," says the French philosopher, "a manly and lawful passion for equality, which incites men to wish all to be powerful and honored; but there exists also in the human heart a depraved taste for equality which induces men to prefer equality in slavery to inequality with freedom. Not that they despise liberty; on the contrary, they have an instinctive love for it; but liberty is not the chief and constant object of their desires—equality is their idol." And again: "It cannot be doubted that democratic institutions strongly tend to promote the feeling of envy in the human heart. They awaken and foster a passion for equality which they cannot gratify." Now, I do not say, nor mean to imply, that the ruling sentiment of the woman's movement is not a noble aspiration. Taking it as a whole, from its "day of small things," twenty-five years ago, to its present imposing dimensions, it has meant freedom—equality with man being only its measure and definition. But I do say that the intense craving for the immediate possession and use of the ballot is not a very high aspiration, and that the liberty which is symbolized by ballot-equality is not the liberty which great men are ready to worship and die for, and which good women are warranted in devoting "life, fortune, and sacred honor" to obtain.

Now for the argument on which the demand is here based—the natural equality of the sexes. Equality of rights does not necessarily imply identity of rights. For if, because the sexes are equal, man has no more right than woman to vote and be voted for at our country's elections, he is, for the same reason, under no more obligation to shoot and be shot at in our country's battles. The arrangements of society, which assign to the sexes different obligations and immunities, cannot be charged with injustice, so far as these arrangements have their basis in a fitness of things which is universally acknowledged. That woman is not fitted for war is a universal admission. The fact that she can fight, and has fought, does not militate against the broader fact that she is not fitted to fight. Her exclusion, therefore, from the army and navy and from military and naval schools is never complained of. But woman has a conceded fitness for an equal part in all associations which are formed to promote the arts of peace; and laws which exclude her from her fair share in these are on their face unjust. That is to say, in war organizations women are justly "counted out;" in peace organizations they should of right be included. But how should it be in an organization half warlike, half peaceful? That is the question, we take it, which lies just back of the one in controversy.

Political society, in the highest form yet reached by any nation, is an organization of this hybrid character—half warlike, half peaceful. It is based upon military power, and daily uses the arts of war to ensure safety and success while cultivating the arts of peace. What, then, is a woman's proper part and place in a society organized both to fight and to "follow the things which make for peace;" in a society which employs interchangeably the ballot and the bullet; police regulations and policemen's revolvers, ministers plenipotentiary and ships of war, Congressional representatives and a standing army? A distinguished leader in the woman's rights movement—one, indeed, who may be said to stand at its very head—recognized the difficulty involved in this question when she said, in a speech delivered twenty years ago in Philadelphia, which has lately been republished: "Far be it from me to encourage women to vote or to take an active part in politics in the present state of our Government. Her right to the elective franchise, however, is the same, and should be yielded to her whether she exercise the right or not. . . . When in the diffusion of light and intelligence a convention shall be called to make regulations for self-government on Christian principles, I can see no good reason why women should not participate in such an assemblage, taking an equal part with man." How far, or in what way, the twenty years which have elapsed since the delivery of the address alluded to may have modified the views of its author, this writer is not competent to say. Certain it is, however, the position here taken is logically inexpugnable, while it affords a base of practical operations in behalf of woman than which none better could be chosen.

But to return to the argument of equality of privilege from equality of rights. As the Government is now constituted, women are not called upon to perform military duty, nor are they liable to conscription under any conceivable circumstances of national distress. But men are; and for this they have no correlative compensation as between the sexes, unless it be the ballot. It is true that in ordinary times it is only males of a certain age and condition that are actually called upon for military duty; but, nevertheless, the whole sex is liable at all times for whatever force may be required. In an extreme exigency boys in their teens and men of advanced age may be pressed into the service. The reproach of "robbing the cradle and the grave" had its sting not in the fact, but in the cause. Such sacrifices, when made by nations struggling for all that is rightfully dear to them, pass into history, and become monuments of honor.

Now, the immunity which women enjoy in this regard may not be a full equivalent for the lack of the ballot—of that they are to be the judges—but it is, nevertheless, no small matter. In the war just ended, rich men were ready to pay any sum required to procure substitutes; men not rich fled to other countries to avoid the draft, and new-comers joyfully waived all the privileges of citizenship in order to escape its masculine burdens. Still, some women will say: "We ask no favors; we demand our rights, which are the same as those of men, and we accept all the logical consequences." And perhaps they will add, as we have heard added: "Remember the useful part performed by women in the late war, and bear in mind the important functions to be performed in every campaign by persons who are non-combatants." Such talk as this is idler than the wind. These women cannot accept all the logical consequences of their position. The idea of their performing military duty, either as non-combatants or as fighters, is simply preposterous. If a change were made in our army and navy regulations which would fill all the non-fighting positions with women, giving us women surgeons, women musicians, women quarter*masters*, women ship-carpenters, women cabin-boys, etc., etc., there would still be three-fourths of the female militia who, for want of positions, would be liable to be sent to the front. Now, let it be borne in mind that this war reference is not meant as an argument against woman's right to vote, but as a reply to the argument for woman's right to vote on the ground of equality between the sexes.

But, it may be said, wars are unnatural; armies and navies have no place in a normal condition of society; the time is near when arbitration will settle the disputes of nations; meanwhile, one wrong-doing should not be made to justify another; the admission of woman to the suffrage would diminish the liability to war. Passing over the premises here laid down just as though they were unquestionable, the doubter accepts the conclusion for all it is worth. He owns that on its face it is reasonable. But, being of a Socratic turn of mind, he asks for the proof, which is, of course, of an à priori kind, and not at all conclusive. Meanwhile, his thoughts revert to salient facts in the late war, when the women of the North waved their handkerchiefs as our battalions marched through the streets, and when the women of the South, including the most highly educated, having goaded on the leaders before the war broke out, aggravated its ferocity when it was once begun, and protracted its continuance beyond the period at which these same leaders would have gladly brought it to an end.

There is another thing in this controversy that affects unfavorably the thoughtful enquirer. It is the extravagant estimate put upon the value of the vote. The ballot is invested in imagination with a sort of magic power; it is sought after as the pearl of great price, and its possession magnified into the end of the law for (political) righteousness. It is called a "symbol of equality," a "synonym of power," a "guarantee of right," and other poetical names, showing it to be regarded as little short of an actual talisman and open-sesame. Now, certainly, with the French, in the case referred to by Mr. Mill, as quoted last week, the ballot was both a "synonym of power" and a "symbol of equality;" but the power which it represented was one which was conveniently used by a despot for his own purposes, and the equality symbolized was that of a dead level of degradation occupied by a whole people.

On this point, at least—the exaggerated estimate put upon the value of the ballot—the objector whom I have been trying to represent is clearly in the right. Twenty years ago, the greatest organized power on this continent, and one of the most formidable in existence, was the Slave Power. Its most effectual antagonists, on every arena, were a band of men and women politically disfranchised. They were the old abolitionists, at that time at the zenith of their power. Holding that the compact to return fugitive slaves and shoot down insurgent slaves was a covenant involving all parties consenting to it in guilt, a few men took their stand beside a few women and negroes, outside the Government, and, flouting the ballot, and spurning party machinery, boldly joined issue with their haughty adversary. They met him on every field—social, ecclesiastical, and political—and gave full proof of their ability to cope with him. To say that Wendell Phillips, at that time without the use of the ballot, exerted as much influence on politics as he now does with it, would be to speak the truth within safe bounds, and would only be another way of saying that the ballot has added nothing to his power. When Liberty Party said—as it did at that time—"In surrendering the ballot you have given up the staff of accomplishment," Mr. Phillips replied, "God did not send me into the world to accomplish an event; he sent me here to do my duty." Then turning with his polished blade to the common enemy, he showed that there was more strength in Truth's little finger than there was in the ballot's loins. Never did any voting anti-slavery man show the possession of greater political power than did the non-voting anti-slavery woman, Miss Abby Kelly, when, twenty years ago, she stood before a Philadelphia audience, and night after night, with maidenly dignity and more than masculine power, proved to politicians, statisticians, party-managers, and others that the anti-slavery cause had its basis in expediency as well as justice, and that it was destined to a certain if not an early triumph. And as for the power of Lucretia Mott, it would be very hard to show how the possession of the ballot could enhance it, politically or otherwise, or increase the influence which she now exerts for the benefit of her sex and for other good purposes.

As "there is a power behind the throne greater than the throne," so is there a power behind the ballot which is greater than the ballot. It is the power of public opinion; a power which ballots cannot effectually baffle nor bayonets resist. In this country it is sovereign; it controls the Government; it uses the ballot, as did Louis Napoleon, for its own purposes, no matter whose hands hold it. Hobbes said, "Words are wise men's counters; they do but reckon with them; but they are the money of fools." This aphorism, barring the contempt expressed in the last word, might with a slight change receive a different application. At any rate, the American Republic is, de facto, a government of public opinion. In it, as such, "every living, intelligent being," to use Mr. Beecher's phrase, has a franchise; and in it is largely realized the favorite idea of Mr. John Stuart Mill—that the franchise should be proportionate in power to the moral and intellectual weight of the person using it.

I will here stop, intending to resume next week. Meanwhile, as preparation for a new departure, let me quote, with approval, the following expression of opinion from the author of the "Subjection of Women:" "The principle which regulates the existing social relations between the two sexes—the legal subordination of one sex to the other—is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement; and it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality, admitting no power or privilege on the one side, nor disability on the other." This, as I understand it, is my doctrine. M.

ORANGE, March 24.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN SHIPPING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was much pleased by your fairness, a few weeks since, in publishing my plea that the doctrine of protection should be extended to the domains of thought. Your editorial comments, of course, were other than I should have wished; but, provided your readers will listen, it matters little in the end whether you ridicule or discuss. Again, as a protectionist, I venture to trouble you with another letter; and I do so because I know that through your columns my reflections will reach the class I want them to reach—those from whom I differ.

I am glad to number General Grant among those who appreciate the true doctrines of protection to American industry. Neither Mr. Carey nor Mr. Greeley himself ever stated a great economic truth more succinctly or boldly than does the President in his recent message on the decline of American shipping. There he lays down a principle, which I hope will pass into the future elementary political economy of this country;

"It is a national humiliation that we now are compelled to pay from twenty to thirty millions of dollars annually, exclusive of passage money, which we should share with other nations, to foreigners, for doing work which should be done by American-owned and American-manned vessels. This is a direct drain upon the resources of the country of just so much money, and equal to casting it into the sea, so far as the nation is concerned."

This has the true ring—the "fight it out on this line" tone; at last the Executive emits no uncertain sound. I am tolerably familiar with the treatises on economical subjects, but never have I seen this principle stated so clearly before. The President takes the broad American ground that our money is absolutely thrown away where we pay others to do that which we could do ourselves. Every one recognizes and acts on this principle in his daily life, and yet it is denied by many teachers of economy as a science. The distinction, I take it, lies here: If we import tangible property from abroad which we might produce ourselves, we do, indeed, a very foolish thing; but we at least have the property to show for our bargain. If, however, we pay others for intangible services which we might have rendered ourselves, "it is just so much money cast into the sea, so far as the nation is concerned." For instance, to use a homely illustration, if you, as editor of the Nation, employ another to do your work, while you sit idle and look out at the window, the loss is absolute. This is just our position as a people. It is notorious that our dockyards are now empty, that our mechanics are idle, that our shipping has gone to decay; it is equally notorious that other nations do our carrying trade, that that trade was never more profitable, that great foreign lines of steamers are coining money out of our paralysis. You free-traders insist that they only do this for us because we are more profitably employed in doing something else. Unfortunately, the facts are against you. I see, by to-day's paper, that "100,000 able-bodied men are without occupation in New York alone," rents are falling, our ships are sold because they cannot be employed to a profit. We are, in fact, sitting idle and looking out at the window, while we pay others to do our own work. Why is this? Why do two noble American steamers lie rotting at their wharves here in Boston, while the Cunarders go in and out before them, ladened down with freight and passengers? Whence this anomaly? Wherefore this unpatriotic absurdity?

If I have not reflected in vain, I think I can at once explain it and point out the remedy. We have not protection enough—our American school of economy is too timid, even in the treatises of its most advanced teachers. Neither Mr. Carey, nor the Tribune, nor President Grant suggests what is, to my mind, the one effectual remedy. They lay down several premises, but they do not draw logical conclusions; would they but do so, I do not doubt that the intelligent patriotism of the country would triumphantly sustain them. In this very message of the President, after exciting the highest hopes by a lofty and well-reasoned opening, we are led only to a lame and impotent conclusion. A system of subsidies and drawbacks is suggested. This is at once expensive and corrupting—by indirection they would make directions out. What we want is a vacuum—a demand to stimulate a supply. How to create this in regard to our shipping is the question now, as before it was the question how to create a similar demand for a national thought. I then tried to demonstrate that you could not hope to create a masculine native literature till you excluded wholly and entirely the results of foreign thought. It is the same as regards our shipping. We must exclude all foreign vessels from our ports, and then native vessels will do our carrying trade. Of course, I would not violate the laws of humanity. Foreign ships in distress should always find a haven and assistance on our shores. Mercy, however, is not trade. So far as landing cargoes, whether of passengers or merchandise, in the ports of this country is concerned, the privilege should by law be confined to American-built ships, manned by American crews. Though you and those who reason like you try to ignore it, I think I clearly see that it is to this that we are steadily tending. General Grant's message, even you will allow, is a long step in this direction. Neither do I think you can honestly escape from the logic of my reasoning. Frankly and fairly, would not a prohibition of any carrying trade to or from this country in foreign bottoms stimulate a prodigious activity in our native shipping and set in busy action every dock-yard in the land? I myself cannot doubt that it would. As a protectionist, I accept gladly subsidies and drawbacks when I cannot get prohibition; but I cannot but lament that inconclusive logic which halts on the threshold of a complete and final remedy.

Before closing this communication, there is one other aspect of the case I should like to touch, though I fear you will hardly care to print even what I have already written, diametrically opposed as it is to the views you wish to inculcate. The vast majority of our carrying trade is now done in English bottoms. In view of the inhuman conduct of an English mail steamship to the unfortunate Oneida, I, for one, should not regret to see the red-cross flag excluded from our waters. This is, I am aware, no economical argument; but when at once an act of just retribution can be accomplished and an unlimited demand for American industry created, I hold that we should not hesitate. Let Congress but apply the knife where the President recommends a poultice, and we shall not have long to lament the decline of American shipping or wince under the arrogance of British mail-captains.

I fear you will not print such protectionist doctrines. The Nation has, however, as I am glad to acknowledge, been always tolerably fair, even when most, as I think, mistaken. Now, as before, you are welcome to refute or to sneer if you will, but publish.

A Poor Author.

Boston, Mass., March 24, 1870.

[The "Poor Author" has evidently not given close attention till now to this class of subjects, but he is nevertheless on the right track, and we invite the people to rally round him as a man who, whatever becomes of his head, will always have his heart in the right place. His want of familiarity with international usage, not unpardonable in a mere littérateur, has led him, perhaps, to overlook the little circumstance that if we exclude foreign vessels from our ports, foreign nations will exclude our vessels from their ports. The "Poor Author" will probably reply that this will make no difference, because although it would prevent our ships from unloading except in the home ports, it would not prevent their carrying goods up and down on the sea, which of itself would be a great gain, as it would encourage ship-building and train seamen for the navy in case of war, and at all events show our flag on the ocean. This may be true, but then we doubt whether the country would be long content with a "carrying trade" which always brought cargoes back to the place they started from, or which, indeed, would make one cargo suffice for each ship as long as she was afloat. The moving of things from one place to another place is inseparably associated in the minds of our people with the "carrying trade," and no "carrying" from which this idea was excluded would, in our opinion, long satisfy them. The best mode of applying our "Author's" principle, which we reluctantly admit to be sound, is to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, by which each nation shall have the exclusive right of "carrying" whatever leaves its own shores. This would, of course, bring our ships back from Europe in ballast, but it would diminish the cost to the country of their outward voyage. It would save our "Author," for instance, who is a poor man and has to work all the year round, some of the expense of providing Americans going to Europe for a summer trip with a passage in an American ship, when they might go cheaper in a European one. Smith, for instance, is going to Europe for a year with his wife and four daughters, says he is ashamed to go under a foreign flag, and demands an American bottom for his transportation, but declines to pay any more for it than he would pay for an English one or French one; at this rate he cannot be accommodated, however, so our "Poor Author" has to help to make up the difference out of his scanty earnings. Now, if we had only to pay the cost of getting Smith out to Europe under the national flag, and he had to get home as best he could, we should undoubtedly save something.—Ed. Nation.]

POPULARIZING SCIENCE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It is really too bad what you said of "Professor Richards, of Chicago." In the first place, I am persuaded you have not the right idea of Professor Richards himself. Though I had not the pleasure of listening to his lectures, yet I heard them well spoken of by those who have some discrimination in such matters. Professor R. is a man of respectable scientific attainments, having been some time a lecturer on chemistry in a medical school in New England, and certainly possesses in a remarkable degree the power of presenting scientific truths in an attractive form. I am sure the editor of the Nation does not mean to speak with ridicule of the attempt to "popularize science," and can only be understood as applying a wholesome castigation to charlatanry. To this I am the last man to object, and wish simply to assure you that many persons will think you have applied the whip to the wrong back.

But, Mr. Editor, "the unkindest cut of all" was to "locate" Professor Richards "in our midst." After drawing such an ugly portrait—many will think, a complete caricature—to call it "Professor Richards, of Chicago," that is too bad. We have many things to be ashamed of here in Chicago—and some things, you know, to be proud of—but we can neither be ashamed nor proud of the gentleman in question. He belongs to us no more nor less than to Gotham, or any other city of the country. He is, in fact, by birth and present residence "an Eastern man." He does not, I believe, live in the same town with the popular lecturer, Dr. Lord, to whom you so flatteringly allude; and I am sure he lives a long way off from that eminent statesman, your particular friend, Ben. Butler; yet he is certainly "an Eastern man," and does not belong to Chicago at all, neither he nor the man of straw, to whom, under an erroneous impression, you gave his name.

Chicagoan.

POLITICAL PATRONAGE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your admirable article in the Nation of last week, on "Offices," suggests to me to hand you the following extract from a letter which I recently received from a leading member of Congress. It points out very clearly and forcibly one of the evils of our present system which I have not seen elsewhere alluded to. In fact, the contagion of "political patronage" is the source of corruption so various, and of injury to the body politic so multiform, that it is not easy for any one man to exhaust the subject. It is only by combining the experience of many that one can obtain an adequate notion of the complicated absurdity of the system, and of the perverse ingenuity with which it is industriously worked so as to visit full retribution on a public stupid enough and supine enough to permit its continuance.

When Swift described the requisites for official station in the empire of Lilliput, he supposed that his grim imagination had reached the furthest allowable limits of caricature; and yet his bitter humor failed to realize a tithe of the follies which are patiently endured by the shrewdest and most practical of nations. But I did not set out to write a leader on the Civil Service, and will merely ask you to call your readers' attention to the opinion of one who has had ample opportunity of observing how the work of legislation for forty millions of souls is practically carried on:

"Few people have any conception of the baneful influence of the prevailing system of apportioning Government offices and employment in accordance with political influence and exigencies. It enslaves the representative to the substrata of his constituents on the one hand, and to the heads of departments and bureaus on the other, and impairs his independence alike at home and when in the exercise of his representative office. Under this system, many members of Congress vote, not upon their own judgment, but upon the influence they are to have in procuring appointments or causing the removal of an influential constituent, or perhaps constituents."

L.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. Wm. Parsons Lunt, of Boston, announces a "Bibliography of the Local History of Massachusetts," by Jeremiah Colburn, a work which will probably serve, as far as it goes, as a useful supplement to Mr. Whittemore's "American Genealogist."

—The American Social Science Association has in active preparation a handbook for immigrants that is destined to exert a very marked and beneficent influence upon the future peopling of this country. It will contain information and statistics such as have never been brought together before in any similar work, and which will direct the intending emigrant as to how best to cross the Atlantic; the relative advantages of the ports of landing; the provision for immigrants there made; the dangers after landing; the routes and costs of travel to the interior; the inducements to labor in the various States; the means of education; the ruling prices of the necessaries of life, of land; the rates of rent and wages; climatic and sanitary conditions; the organic and statute laws of the Union and of the several States. This will all be done impartially, and without reference to any particular interest whatever, whether State, private, or incorporated. Editions will be issued for English, German, and Swedish emigrants, and in appropriate quantities—a total of not less than 100,000 being aimed at. The work will contain endorsements of its good-faith and trustworthiness from the highest authorities, and its distribution be so arranged that the emigrant shall be seasonably instructed as to the steps proper for him to take, and inspired with the fullest confidence in the hand-book itself. The undertaking reflects great credit upon the Association from which it emanates, and to whose character and other labors we would again call attention, recommending our readers to procure the second volume of its proceedings, just issued by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt. It opens, by the way, with an admirable paper on immigration by Friedrich Kapp, whose approaching return to Germany will be cause of regret not only to the Board of Commissioners of Emigration, but also to his fellow-citizens, both American and German. The same subject has since been treated with much greater fulness by Mr. Kapp in a pamphlet entitled: "Immigration, and the Commissioners of Emigration of the State of New York."

—We can promise any one his money's worth who buys Mr. Henry Stevens's Catalogue of the remarkable library which he offers for sale in Boston a fortnight hence. It is, to use the compiler's own words, "made . . . to stand square on its own taps, with a fashion of its own, full of odd titles, quaint conceits, originality, personal anecdote, disjointed historical connections, and general intelligence." The preface contains a very interesting and filial sketch of the late Henry Stevens, sr., the founder of this library, and under the head of "personal anecdote" would probably be classed the attention paid to M. Harrisse and his "Bibliotheca Americana Vetustissima," in their place in the Catalogue. The frank account of the general nature of the "compound"—hardly fair to be called a library, says Mr. Stevens, yet "just the collection by its dispersion to help fill important gaps in public and private libraries"—is full of good sense and the fruit of wide experience, especially in what relates to works pertaining to the early history of America. The notes and dissertations attached passim to titles that permit a little explanation or show of honest learning, are readable and instructive, and, together with the preface, ensure permanent preservation for the Catalogue among the appreciative. No. 2,487 (Hariot's "Briefe and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia" (1590), described as "the rarest and most precious book relating to English North America," and No. 2,519 (Nicholl's "Remarkable Life, Adventures, and Discoveries of Sebastian Cabot"), are notable instances of the author's scholarly discussions. The latter should be read in connection with his contribution to his brother's book on Tehuantepec, and the proposed railroad route across that isthmus, which, revised and emendated, was printed last summer by itself in handsome book-form, with numerous fac-similes of the oldest and most valuable maps depicting the Columbian and post-Columbian discoveries in the New World. The "Historical and Geographical Notes" is entered at No. 1,976 of the Catalogue.

—The death of Mr. Gulian Crommelin Verplanck removed the most venerable of the "Knickerbockers" who, half a century ago, gave to New York politics, literature, trade, and social life most of their distinctive features. He never ceased to be a useful and honored citizen, but it is long since he and his like ceased to be influential in politics, and the social and literary influence of the class of which he was so good a representative is so far from being supreme, that we see it fading away under our eyes and going completely out of existence. Old New York is swallowed up in the new more effectually than itself swallowed New Amsterdam. Politically, indeed, the city of his birth must long ago have ceased to be the city of Mr. Verplanck's affections. The New York which is owned by men like Tweed and Sweeny may well have disgusted a man who had taken part in administering her affairs when her politicians were men of honor and education, when a bought Recorder was undreamt of; when to hold the mayoralty was proof of the esteem of all the citizens; when the Common Council was full of character and talent instead of being a den of ignorant thieves; when there was economy instead of rapacious robbery and a riot of extravagance; when voters went to the polls without fear of their lives; when householders decorously cast their ballots, instead of murderers and pickpockets swamping the ballot-box with fraudulent votes; when a man might be an alderman without being presumptively a rogue—a sheriff's-officer without being almost certainly a brute, worse a thousand times than any prisoner he willingly takes to the Tombs—a judge, and not under suspicion of political subserviency—and, in short, a citizen without confessing that he lived under a government that disgraces civilization. Mr. Verplanck was born in 1786, and was therefore eighty-four years old at the time of his death, down to the day of which he was in the service of the public. He was graduated young, as was then the fashion, being but fifteen years old when his degree was given him by Columbia College. He chose the law for his profession, but before beginning its practice he "made the grand tour." Travelling in Europe was not so common among Americans then as it has been since, and when Mr. Verplanck returned he was of the small number of cultivated Americans, and became an authority in the literary circles of New York. On the whole, although he was not a man of extraordinary ability, he was probably better fitted for the censorship than any other of his local contemporaries, his tastes being wider than those of the Pauldings and Irvings by whom he was surrounded. This is attested by his edition of Shakespeare—a work which we do not think of Paulding, or Drake, or Sands as attempting. Politics attracted a good deal of his attention, and he got some reputation as a satirist by two or three volumes of squibs directed against De Witt Clinton and the Clintonians. With these we cannot say that we are familiar, but doubtless the public will, by-and-by, have an opportunity of estimating the author's poetic and satiric qualities. 1817 is the year of "Bucktail Bards," and in 1818 he delivered an address on "the early European Friends of America," in which he did justice to some of the Dutchmen, Huguenots, and others connected with the earliest ages of American history. His treatise gave its author a wide reputation. 1820 found him a prominent member of the State Legislature, and Chairman of the Committee on Education. All his life he was philanthropic and religious, and a worker in behalf of many reforms; very lately he rendered efficient service in the Board of Emigration, and when he died he was a governor of the New York Hospital as well as a member of the Vestry of Trinity, the most powerful of American church corporations. In this year he was called to a professor's chair in the General Theological Seminary of his church—the Protestant Episcopal—and his lectures appeared in 1824, under the title of "Nature and Uses of the Various Evidences of Revealed Religion;" and, in 1825, he gave further evidence of his versatility by publishing a legal essay on the "Doctrine of Contracts," in which he considered "how contracts are affected, in law and in morals, by concealment, error, and inadequate price." It was in 1825 that he began his eight years of Congressional life, and, as was to have been expected of a man of his character and abilities, he made them useful to his party and the country, and creditable to himself. Literary men are under obligations to him for the interest he took in their prosperity, and for his advocacy of the extension of the term of copyright, which before had been twenty-eight years, to forty-eight. Mr. Verplanck was a Democrat of the Jacksonian side of the House, but was not prominent among the leaders except for a brief period at the close of his last session, when in nullification days he brought in an anti-protection bill designed to placate the Southerners by reducing duties on imports. Mr. Clay, however, stole Mr. Verplanck's thunder, and suddenly springing his famous compromise measure upon the House, it was immediately passed; and we may imagine that even a professor of theology may have been easy to console when afterwards the great Compromiser discovered that after all he was not to have the Presidency. Mr. Verplanck, however, was himself a sort of a Whig not long after the murder of "Verplanck's bill," which occurred in 1833; for, in 1834, he was the Whig candidate for the mayoralty of New York, and was barely beaten. It would be long to tell of his after political career, which was never again distinguished by anything very noticeable. He was often sent up to the Senate at Albany, and he filled many local offices with satisfaction to his fellow-citizens. His leisure was spent in literary labor of various kinds, and in the enjoyment of the society of his relations and friends. None of his works will live after him, he himself had, in fact, outlived them; but he leaves behind him, to the shame of the politicians who have succeeded him and his school, and for the profit of the rest of us, the memory of a blameless life of many years devoted to honorable labor in the service of the country, the State, the city, and every good cause that had claims upon him as a citizen and a man. No citizen more generally esteemed or more worthy of esteem has recently died in New York. Mr. Verplanck was President of the Commissioners of Emigration from the time of their organization in 1848 till his decease, and a portrait of him accompanies the pamphlet of Mr. Kapp alluded to above.

